Over her, morning broke dimly and reluctantly. Everything in the landscape had suffered a snow-change; fences were buried out of sight, and all traces of highways were obliterated; the lake was no more level than the meadow beyond it; one-half of the benignant snow-image presented to view a misshapen obelisk, majestic still in disfigurement. On the northward and lakeward sides of the dwelling, there were embankments of snow against the foundation, darkening the cellar, and upon the roof, pediments and turrets never built there by mortal architecture, and white "pointings" of bricks and stones that were not there yesterday. On one end and the front the gray dawn could not penetrate the snow-encrusted windows, and the red shine of the newly-kindled fires showed murky from without, even after the inmates were up and stirring to make all ready for Uncle Roger's early breakfast.

The panes of the south chamber case-ments were clear. Facing that which looked toward the east—as one who watched to see the day break and the shadows flee away—with a smile that was not expectation, but fullness of satisfaction upon his lips, lay a pale sleeper who would not arise with the rest at the call of the new day.

"And so went our white king to his burial!"

CHAPTER XVII.

Like a blind spinner in the sun
I tread my days;
I know that all the threads will run
Appointed ways.
I know each day will bring its task
And—being blind—no more I ask.

I do not know the use or name
Of that I spin;
I only know that someone came
And laid within
My hand the thread, and said, "Since you Are blind, but one thing you can do."
—H. H.

Roger Lanier's loving thoughtfulness for his sister thrown so sadly upon his generosity and protection, and whom he had cherished fondly to the end, was further exemplified in his will.

The property bequeathed to her by their father, and judiciously invested by the son, was committed to the care of his fellow and surviving trustee, who was also his business partner. For himself, he devised to Alice Paull, and her children after her, Pinehurst with garden, orchard and woodlands adjacent—in all, thirty acres; ten thousand dollars for her own use in fee simple, and two thousand to each of her five children; Lanier's and Marie's legacies to be paid to them at once, those of the younger children to accumulate under their mother's management, until each should reach his, or her majority. There was a long list of minor bequests, including one hundred dollars a piece to Mary Williams and Elspeth Boyd.

He had forgotten nobody whom want or worth had brought to his notice. From the grave in which they laid, that white Christmas week, all of him that could die, he continued to exert the beneficent influence that had been an essential part of his nature. Being dead, he yet spoke of the Divine lavishness learned at the feet of him who gave his all for an unloving world.

Above that grave there arose in due time a stately obelisk, bearing upon one side of the base the last text upon which his living eyes had rested, and which his reverent tongue had uttered:

Mark the perfect man and behold the upright,
For the end of that man is peace.

Upon the obelisk, and beneath the brief record of his name and age were the lines:

I know thou wilt not slight my call,
For thou dost mark the sparrow's fall.

"He has fallen, as he would have wished—with his full armor on!"—wife and sister said to one another. "For him the exchange is all gain. For us—"

Words failed them there. Apart, and in her own home, each gathered her children under her wings, and, looking upon their helplessness, braced body and spirit to do a woman's part in her shattered life.

Upon the peaceful household of Pinehurst, the bereavement had fallen with terrible suddenness and weight. Mrs. Paull had herself gone to knock at her brother's door in season to awaken him for his breakfast and journey, and receiving no reply, entered, supposing that he had arisen and gone down stairs to make observations as to the depth of the snow-fall, and calculate the chances of reaching the city in time to keep his engagement.

When the numbness of the first shock passed before returning and poignant sentience, nurse, son and servant were alarmed for her health and reason. The exquisitely tender and vivid memories of Roger's latest words and looks, of the graceful play of fun and fancy that had enlivened the sweet counsel they had held together on that never-to-be-forgotten night; the full and affectionate confidence he had poured out upon her—his "Evangel!"—added keenest regret to natural grief at the loss of the strong staff of her worse-than-widowhood.

For ten hours after she had found her brother asleep, with the frozen sweetness of the smile that visits mortal lineaments but once, upon the finely-molded face, not a single tear softened eyes that were perilously bright; the flush of cheek and lips reminded Elspeth and Mrs. Williams of the earlier stage of the illness that had once nearly wrecked life and mind. Relief came strangely and unexpectedly.

Owing to the heavy fall of snow, not only the highway to Pedlington was blocked up, but the railway from that town to New York was not cleared for passenger-trains before the afternoon, and Mrs. Lanier did not reach Pinehurst until after dark. As the distant sound of sleigh-bells warned Mrs. Paull of her approach, she came out upon the piazza to receive her sister-in-law and espied the fallen bulk of the snow-image, hurriedly toppled over by the shovels that had removed the drifts, and now prone and unconsidered among the heaps thrown up in cutting a path to the carriage-drive. The arm, outstretched in welcome or benediction, was gone, and the lower limbs were confused with the surrounding masses, but trunk and head were distinguishable in the moonlight, and the indelible expression of majestic calm the effigy had worn while upright.

"It would not surprise me out of my wits if our venerable friend there were to break loose from his moorings and fall into step with us."

The gay laugh that went with the pleasantry rang anew in her ear, and the manly tones that were henceforth to be but an echo for all time.

"It is nothing but snow and it has outlasted him!" she cried out, and lapsed into wild weeping in her son's arms.

"Thank God!" said Dr. Lyell aside to his brother-in-law. "The worst is over!"

The two men, with Mrs. Morse, had been at the house, or attending to business connected with the sad event, all day. They accompanied the remains to the city and were present at the funeral and burial—quiet, unobtrusive and efficient, such friends and neighbors as prosperity seldom develops. The day of the interment was one of fierce tempest—an ice-storm long-remembered by those who were exposed to it. By request of the widow and sister of the deceased, Mr. Morse offered the prayer of committal at the grave, standing bare-headed during the brief service, and driving back to town in his wet clothes.

The next afflictive news brought to the mourners in the lakeside homestead was of his severe, and soon, his dangerous illness. Four weeks' suspension between his bed and the tomb left him the spectre of his hale and comely self. As soon as he could travel, his brother-in-law asked leave of absence for him of the church, which was instantly granted, and early in February he sailed, under Dr. Lyell's care for the south of France.

All had come to pass with terrifying swiftness—when one recalls the jocund spirits of the parsonage and Pinehurst households on the Christmas afternoon, removed into the far past in the imaginations of the participants in the innocent revelry. It required no common exercise of will to readjust domestic machinery and to lay again a firm hand upon the guiding lever.

As Mrs. Morse drove through the wood separating the Pinehurst house from the highway, one bleak March afternoon, she awoke abruptly to the conviction that, into the intercourse of the past few weeks which had ripened warm friendliness into intimacy, she had received, rather than imparted hopeful courage. She had fallen into the habit of repairing to Mrs. Paull when she was lonely or despondent because of her husband's absence and ill-health; when an expected letter did not arrive; when a parishioner was capacious, or over-sensitive, or there was sickness in her nursery—and she never went away unsatisfied. She was ingenuous with herself as well as impulsive with her friends, and her eyes once opened, she did not spare self-rebuke.

"One might suppose that I was deserted and bereaved—and not she!" jerking the reins upon the unoffending horse. "I have taken everything, and given nothing. I have talked of myself and my concerns like a selfish baby, and she has listened like a sympathizing angel. Just let me get a chance to turn the tables once—and won't I try to stand better in my own opinion?"

Not a human creature was in sight when she drew up at the lakeward front, and although the blinds were open, the dwelling had to her fancy a lonely aspect, enhanced by the trim order of grounds and outhouses, which generally relieved the isolation of the location. She was about to tie her horse to the hitching-post at the right of the house, when a door opened in the barn, and a red-haired Scotchman who had been employed upon the place for a year or more, issued from it.

"Is Mrs. Paull at home, Robert?"

"Na,—and she's not, ma'am. I'm just back from driving her to Pedlington—her, and the wee missie."

"Then,"—began the visitor, disappointed—

"Wull ye be sae guile as to walk in ma'am?" said Elspeth from behind her. "Robert! ye'll look after the beast. My mistress lett a word for ye, if ye suld call as she thoct like ye might. Wull ye step into the parlor, if ye please, ma'am?"

"Let me come right into the kitchen where you were sitting, Elspeth,"—suitsing movement to word. "I am always delighted to get a peep at it. Nobody else's kitchen is so neat and cheerful,—and indeed so pretty now, that your geraniums are all in bloom. How do you coax them to blossom all the time? This is more like a green-house than a kitchen. And, I declare, your roses are all in bud!"

An odd agitation in the woman's demeanor prompted her to talk on to give Elspeth a chance to resume her usual manner.

"Robert says that Mrs. Paull has gone to Pedlington and taken Gladys with her. Will she come home on the stage, or stay all night in New York?"

Elspeth tossed her apron over her head and sobbed chokingly, still standing bolt upright in the middle of the floor.

"What has happened? Is there any bad news? Tell me, quick!" demanded Mrs. Morse, her heart sinking desperately low.

"O, do try to speak!"

"Bad news, ma'am! There could hardly be waur for us a'! It's nane that wull mak' ye more than middlin' sorry!" faltered the handmaiden between the gulps that essayed to swallow her emotion. "She bade me not to keep back the truth frae ye, who ay lo'ed the misguided lassie weel and hae proven yersel' the true friend to us in a' our adversity."

Mrs. Morse whitened under an awful foreboding.

"You cannot be talking about Marie. She is not—dead?"

"Mayhap it wad be better for us and for hersel' an' she war!" hopelessly Gaelic in the sloughs of her distress. "She's gane, Mrs. Morse! gane awa' to join hersel' to him! God forgie me! but I could wish he had sunken to the bottom o' th' seas when he crossed them himsel', before, like the eerie de'il he is, before he temptit me bairnie wha I nursed i' these arms when she waur but ane hour auld—to follow him!"

Mrs. Morse felt the cold sweat ooze out upon lips and forehead.

"Elspeth, what are you saying? I cannot—I will not believe that Marie has eloped! she would not run away from home and friends to join any man alive. There is some frightful mistake in all this."

tion; but such was his faith in God and his confidence that the work would be divinely sustained, that in September of that year he had completed all arrangements for opening the Portland mission. It was in the highest sense a work of faith, and the result has shown that reliance on divine approval was abundantly justified.

The following shows the work of the Gospel Union Mission for the six months ending March 31, 1894:

Many pastors in Portland, irrespective of denomination, have united in commending the work of the Mission. Rev. Roland D. Grant, of the First Baptist Church, writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on this subject, says:

"I never saw any more striking evidence of divine guidance than in the coming of Mr. John C. Appel to our city, and the work done by him. The work began from the first evening, and began right. Novelties here are held off at arm's length as long as possible, and not given a very warm welcome. But there was no holding this off; it had not come for that purpose. Mr. Appel is perfectly adapted to every department of Christian work, well balanced and full of a beautiful faith. The poor, sinning men yield easily to his tender but firm appeals. Every body has perfect confidence in him, and it is now no longer a question of how much the Christian people can do for the Mission, but how much spiritual good and inspiration they can get from the Mission. I do not mean in the number of converts, but in the spiritual blessings to the workers in the different churches, who go so willingly and hungrily to the nightly services. Incidents of intense interest could be related. The conversions have been of the deeper and stronger sort, to encourage a high grade of faith."

One of the most gratifying results of the Mission work has been an earnest awakening among the local churches of Portland. In the First Baptist Church, a season of remarkably successful evangelistic services recently closed, at which many accepted Christ. The Second Baptist Church had a somewhat similar experience, with numerous conversions and substantial growth in membership. The First Methodist Episcopal Church of Portland held five weeks of revival services, at which upwards of 100 persons entered into the Christian life. St. Paul's M. E. Church and Grace M. E. Church also had rich spiritual awakenings. The First, Third and Fourth Presbyterian, Forbes, Westminster, St. John's, Cavalry, and Bethany, all Presbyterian, and the First United Presbyterian, all shared in the general revival and were materially strengthened in membership. While the meetings were in progress, the power of the spirit was made manifest in the many requests for prayer and the genuine conversions that took place at almost every service in the different churches.

The directors of the Gospel Union of Portland are: J. C. Appel, Superintendent; Finley McKercher, G. M. Weister, R. G. Hamilton, E. H. Moorehouse, W. J. McKean, W. J. Hunter, W. A. Currie, W. C. Lee. Mr. McKean is President of the Board, and Mr. Hunter is Treasurer. There is, in connection with the work, a highly efficient Ladies Auxiliary, of which Mrs. Amelia J. Mead is President. The headquarters of the Mission are at No. 37½ North Portland street, in the building formerly occupied as the People's Theatre, but which has now been consecrated anew to the work of the Lord. In this old playhouse—the scene, in former years, of many wild gatherings—hundreds of precious souls have been brought to Christ. A portrait of Mr. Appel, Superintendent and Founder of the Mission, and an illustration representing the theatre during service, accompany this article.

A CHINA WOMAN'S GIFT.

A touching story of liberal giving in a heathen country is that of the old Chinese woman in the town of Chiva, near Tokio. She was a Christian, and her church was making great efforts to obtain a regular church building. The members were assessed moderate sums and in most instances far surpassed the assessment, giving, as one of their number expressed it, "the double of the double." But this old woman, who had been wretchedly poor all her days, and had been saving money little by little for years to obtain for herself the fine funeral in which Chinese delight, gave to the church building fund all she had saved, the sum of fifty yen.

FIVE AND TWENTY YEARS.

(By a Reader of "The Christian Herald" in honor of Dr. Talnage's Twenty-fifth Anniversary of his Brooklyn Pastorate.)

FOR "five and twenty years,"
The banner's been unfurled;
The "Gospel of the Kingdom"
Has been preached around the world;
The voice that spoke it then,
Proclaims it still to-day,
While thousands are rejoicing,
And walking in "the way."

Up from the mines of earth,
And down from heights sublime;
From Russia's frozen regions,
And from Africa's sunny clime;
From far-off Australasia,
The islands of the sea,
These happy voices mingle,
And send good-cheer to thee.

What though the seas before thee,
And mountains round thee stand;
What though the powers of darkness,
Would push thee to the strand;
So soon as faith steps forward,
Those waters will divide,
For thee, a wall of safety,
To them, a whelming tide.

The jubilatic trumpets
Are sounding loud to-day;
While yet the cloudy pillar
Leads onward in the way;
The Marahs and the Elims
Will still thy spirit try,
But, Canaan is before thee,
And Jordan will be dry.

The shadows have departed,
The clouds have rolled away,
And God, in his good providence,
Brings in a better day;
Take courage then, nor falter,
But throw away thy fears,
And find thy compensations,
In "five and twenty years."

A MISSIONARY'S FAITH.

The Rev. Erwin H. Richards had labored in the heart of Africa for seven years, and not a single person had been converted. He was reading to the natives one day the passage, "Give to every one that asketh thee." The natives asked what that meant. Mr. Richards attempted to explain after the fashion of scientific charity. But the natives said that will not do. "Does your God not mean what he says?" And Mr. Richards said he would take some time to study what it did mean. He prayed to God for illumination, and when he returned to his class he told them that Jesus meant just what he said. Now the natives were the greatest thieves in the world, and when they heard what Mr. Richards said about God, they came to his house and began to carry his things away. Mr. Richards made no resistance. There was nothing left at last but the medicine chest, and his wife said, "Surely you will not let that go?" He replied that he guessed he would; that Jesus must have known what he said; and that he doubted not he would overrule the event for good. And the medicine chest went, and all was gone. That day was necessarily spent in fasting, but towards the evening one of the chiefs of the natives called the people together, and said unto them that he thought they were the most contemptible people on earth.

Here was the minister who believed in the word of his God and had not resisted when they took all he had. He proposed to give everything back that he had taken. All with one accord, followed his example, and before night Mr. Richards had more in the house than he had before. But that was not all. Three hundred of them were converted after that at one meeting, and from being the worst natives in Africa, they became the best, according to the testimony of Mr. Stanley. They had no locks on their

THE CONVERT'S ORDEAL.

Writing from Foochow, China, to the "Missionary Herald," Mr. Peet, the American Board's Missionary there, says that the mission was then at a season of the year which is particularly trying to native Christians. There is the sacrifice to this deity and to that deity; the worship of this idol and of that idol, so that during this time those who have professed the name of Christ stand out as marked men more than at any other part of the year. Two nights ago occurred the sacrifice to the kitchen gods. These idols are small in size, but are feared perhaps more than any other. I am told that they are the last ones to be given up. These households gods are supposed to start out on their annual visit to the supreme ruler to report to him the conduct of the people. The fortunes of a family for the coming year will depend on the account the household gods can give of the members of that family for the past year. It is highly important, therefore, that the gods should leave the earth with good impressions, and so feasts are gotten up in their honor, fire-crackers are set off, and incense burned before them. The students who have been connected with the mission school the past year, and who have been taught the wickedness of idolatry will be sorely tried, but we have good reason to believe that some, at least, will stand firm to their convictions. Two of the boys have already placed themselves on record by notifying their parents in advance that this year they will take no part in the ceremony.

THE TRUE EVOLUTION.*

PHYSICALLY, notwithstanding the great general likeness between man and the higher animals, there is a distinct difference; for man had the power of modifying his environment, and only in a slight degree does he need to modify himself. He does not need to develop defensive armor against the attacks of wild beasts, does not require to don scales against his enemy as the crocodile does, nor grow sharp teeth and claws as the tiger does, nor to mimic offensive and nauseous qualities as the butterflies seem to do. He does not need to be so strong, or so swift, or so cunning as other animals. He has found ways less expensive than organic modification, and he has acted on them. He does not need to lengthen or to strengthen his arm in order to be able to lift heavy weights; he has in effect done both by discovering and utilizing the lever. His eye is not so keen as the eye of the eagle; but with an eye less keen he can see farther, for he has discovered the telescope. His eye may not be so fitted for microscopic vision as that of the fly; but he can see things so small as to be invisible to the eye of any other creature. He cannot spring so far as the tiger can; but he has discovered that a rifle bullet is swifter than a tiger's leap and stronger than a tiger's muscles. In short, he has ceased to modify his physical organism, having found out that he can succeed as well by modifying tools and weapons and making them serve his purpose. In winter many animals have to modify themselves to protect themselves from cold. But man simply puts on a thicker overcoat. They build their nests, they seek out dens and caves of the earth, or they may use other means of a simpler sort to protect themselves. But man has learnt to build houses, to warm them with fire, to supply himself with light when the sun goes down and in a hundred other ways to make a climate at his pleasure. Not only has he ceased to modify himself, and modifies his environment instead; he has pressed the organic modifications of other animals into his service. He has directed the modifications of certain grasses until he has produced wheat. He has taken animals and moulded them into a form which makes them of greater use to him. He makes use of the swiftness of the horse, and of the qualities of other animals which he has tamed and made submissive to his wishes. He has chained the lightning, he has harnessed steam to his carriage, and there is hardly any limit to the use he has made and is making of the agents and powers of the world. As with tools and weapons and houses and garments, so also with the power of recording and transmitting experience, man has found a more excellent and a more economic way. He does not inscribe his experience in the convolutions of the brain; he writes them in a book, and books are less expensive than brains, and the supply of book-material is much more ample and more easily procurable than brain matter. It is also more lasting; for brains vanish with the individual, and books last for all time. There is a marked difference between this kind of evolution and that with which we are familiar in the organic world. Here it is not the physical organism that is evolved; it is something else. No one will say that there is a growth of the human brain or the nervous system which proceeds 'pari passu' with the evolutions of tools, of languages, of civilization. If in all physical characteristics man is man from the time when he first appears on the earth, then the evolution of arts, science, civilization has not been accompanied by corresponding organic changes. It would be well to recognize this, and for mental progress to devise a formula of evolution not now expressed in terms of matter and motion, but in terms of mind and reason. Not that we can dispense with mind and reason in the case of physical and organic development, for in it are discovered all the principles of a rational order; but in the latter kind of evolution both the order and the method of it and the thing which is developed can be expressed in terms of mind alone.

A Strange Demonstration.

Bands of Unemployed Men March to Washington—The "Coxey Army."

A MOST remarkable demonstration occurred in Washington, recently, when several hundred men, representing all classes of the unemployed, and organized under the title of the "Army of the Commonwealth," arrived in the National Capital, after a long and arduous march from Ohio. Their leader, Jacob S. Coxey, is an extreme reformer, and their avowed object is neither war nor disturbance, but the securing of work for the idle and aid for the distressed, by Congressional action. Simultaneously with the movement of the season, there are often heavy storms, yet they have never failed to appear. Now they have come to live here so as to attend day-school. They are nice-looking, well-behaved girls, very anxious to learn. To-night we have twenty-nine women and girls sleeping at the station on our side of the stream. Three or four are girls who usually sleep here Saturday nights so as to attend the Sunday services. The boys have started another preaching station. Mr. Currie is preparing four young men who will devote their time to evangelistic work—there are so many villages which we cannot reach.

MR. MOODY'S TRAINED WORKERS.

WHILE engaged in prosecuting his Columbian Evangelistic Campaign in Chicago, last year, Mr. D. L. Moody was fortunate in having at command one indispensable agency on which he could always draw in every emergency. This was the Chicago Bible Institute, a description of which appeared in this journal in January of last year. It was organized by Mr. Moody several years ago, for the training of Christian workers for all departments of service. There he found a small army of trained men and women ready and willing to serve at call. Some interesting facts concerning former students of the Institute have recently been collected, showing that 129 of their number have already gone forth into the field of missions; 64 into Africa, Burmah, China, Japan, Corea, India, Ceylon, Persia, Syria, Siam, Turkey, Micronesia, the West Indies, South America and Mexico, and 55 have taken up home mission work, in city and country, among Indians and Freedmen, and for Jews and Greeks. There are 28 engaged as secretaries of Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, pastors' assistants and church visitors. Over 70 have become pastors of churches, in eight different denominations; 41 have entered into evangelistic work, and 8 are Gospel singers. There are 23 in various positions of responsibility, as superintendents of Mission Halls, principals of Academy and College, secretaries of various Christian organizations, matrons of Industrial Schools, choir leaders, colporteurs, etc. A large number have also entered various Theological and Medical Colleges, to secure fuller preparation for home pastorates or foreign missions. Thus already have the working forces of the kingdom of God been mightily reinforced through the agency of the Chicago Bible Institute, while hundreds more are passing through the same courses of training to the same end.

A FATAL INHERITANCE.

A sad story illustrating the law of heredity is told by Dr. F. Horton of the Isle of Wight, England. He says that a bright little girl joined a juvenile temperance society and was very earnest in getting her young friends to join. But her crowning achievement on which she had set her heart was getting her father to sign the pledge. He was a confirmed tippler, but he loved his child, and to please her he signed. The man went away and broke the pledge, but the little maid would not be discouraged, and in a few weeks she induced him to sign again, and this time he kept it. When this child grew to be a girl of seventeen she was one day invited to tea by some of her friends, who thought her a fanatic on the subject of temperance, and had concocted a plot to have a joke on her. When the first cup of tea was passed round and she had tasted it she burst into laughter which was almost maniacal. They asked her how she liked it. She said, "Very much," "Do you know what was in it?" they said. "No," she answered, "but whatever it was I will have some more." They had put rum in the tea, and the girl took some more, and that night she was carried home drunk, and from that night she never could be kept from the drink. She wandered away to Portsmouth, and there she ultimately died an outcast on the street. The little maid had saved her father, but the virus of the father's sin was in the child's blood, and she perished through that taint.

A SUNDAY OBSERVER HONORED.

The command to honor the Sabbath is one which is so widely disobeyed in many parts of the civilized world, that it is refreshing to learn of any striking instance of obedience, even at the risk of great personal loss. Mr. Bond, a naval officer, began his career as private secretary to Admiral Sir Home Popham, who on one occasion while in Jamaica, directed him to prepare dispatches on the Lord's Day. "When are they required, Sir Home?" "For the home-ward mail," was the reply. "They shall be ready in time, but I cannot write them to-day," was the reply. "Mr. Bond, you should obey my orders." "I have done so, Sir Home, and will always, except when your orders interfere with my duty to God." Sir Home was greatly displeased, and abruptly left the office, and Mr. Bond joined his other brethren in their worship. When he handed in the dispatches, completed in ample time, Sir Home very generously said to him, "You were quite right; I sincerely regret speaking to you as I did, and you may rest assured that I shall not again ask you to do anything on the Sabbath which can be possibly avoided."

JACOB S. COXEY.

Coxey contingent, other bands of the unemployed gathered in several States, including California, Colorado, Illinois, Kansas, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Rhode Island, and set out for Washington, expecting to reach that city by May 1. Various causes combined to prevent the carrying out of the programme, and with the exception of Coxey's own band, none had reached the rendezvous at the time appointed. The latter, footsore and weary, came in with white flags of peace flying, and marched to the steps of the Capitol, where Congress was in session. The Washington police prevented them from going further and two of the leaders were arrested and the band dispersed. The leaders were afterwards released on bail. It was their purpose to submit to Congress a petition in the name of the unemployed men in the different States, asking for the enactment of various laws which they considered would improve the condition of labor and also demanding that the government give work to all.

This fanatical and misdirected movement, which has thus far happily been productive of no serious disturbance, has excited considerable sympathy for the men, who have experienced many hardships already. Coxey, the leader, is a resident of Massillon, O., where he has a farm and considerable other property. He, as well as other leaders, seem to have voluntarily devoted whatever substance they were possessed of to the Commonwealth cause.

It is unfortunate for the cause of the unemployed, and for the country generally, that such demonstrations should occur in a land where redress for all unjust burdens imposed upon any considerable portion of the community is more readily secured than in any other country on the globe. Such occurrences as that in Washington, far from helping the cause of the toilers, must really operate as a set-back, since they array class against class, and allow the spirit of demagogism and discontent to take the place of that cordial, fraternal feeling which usually exists among the citizens of the republic.

EAGER LEARNERS.

A letter from Cisamba, in West Africa, where Dr. Currie is successfully laboring, comes to the "Missionary Herald" from Miss Johnston of that station. She says: This week seven new girls have come to stay at the station, from Kapitango, a district six miles away, where some of our evangelists hold a service every Sunday afternoon. These girls have walked that distance and back every Sunday to attend the morning service and Sunday School, in fine or hot weather, and this being the rainy

* JUBILEE AND CONFLAGRATION. *

After a Splendid Two Days' National and International Celebration, in honor of its Pastor, the Brooklyn Tabernacle is Destroyed by Fire—Rejoicing Turned to Sorrow.

ONCE more the Brooklyn Tabernacle has been temporarily overwhelmed by disaster, and its pastor and people plunged in the deepest sorrow. The glorious building, finest and largest among the Protestant churches of America, was destroyed by fire on Sunday, May 13th. The week just closed had been one of unusual joy in the Tabernacle. On the evenings of May 10th and 11th, the spacious edifice was the scene of a demonstration, in Brooklyn, and was made the occasion of a spontaneous popular tribute by the leading minds in the church, in literature, art, law, statesmanship and commercial life on two continents, expressive of the word-wide love and admiration in which the Tabernacle pastor is held. It was a tribute so spontaneous, emphatic and universal that it can be construed as nothing else than an inspiration on the part of the best elements of human society everywhere to cheer and encourage the world's greatest preacher to still higher, wider and, if possible, more consecrated effort in the Master's work. Such an outpouring of cordial appreciation seldom has fallen to the lot of any man on a public platform; a testimony so varied that it may be said to have come from all religions and all classes and conditions of men. The story of the reception is given here; that of the terrible conflagration that followed two days had not reckoned on the many thousands of Dr. Talmage's friends in the different States, who for years, have read his sermons in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and who lovingly lay claim to be considered as a part of his audience and congregation. These friends naturally wished to share in the tribute to the great preacher, and so also with the still other and more remote thousands in distant lands, north and south of us and across the seas, who also wanted to be represented. Thus, as the arrangements progressed, the proposed tribute assumed a national and international character.

A BRILLIANT SCENE.

When the doors of the Tabernacle were thrown open on the evening of May 10th, and the vast crowds that had assembled outside pressed for admission, a brilliant scene greeted their eyes. The whole interior of the great building was richly decorated with flowers and bunting; the galleries were draped with plush, and encircling the auditorium were panels on which were the flags of the different nations of the world.

"The Tabernacle Parish, Eastern District," and the left representing the western hemisphere, and inscribed, "The Tabernacle Parish, Western District." Above the platform, in front of the great organ, was a portrait of Dr. Talmage wreathed with international flags and inscribed with the words, "Our Pastor," while on either side in large letters of silver on a ground of dark velvet, were the dates 1869 and 1894, with the two expressive legends, "The Tabernacle His Pulpit," "The World His Audience."

The front of the platform was rendered still more brilliant by a floral display. Wherever the eye lighted on any part of the great building, flags, bunting, the glitter of silver or the sheen of rich velvet draperies of royal purple were visible.

ON THE PLATFORM.

It had been arranged that the first evening celebration of the Silver Jubilee of Dr. Talmage's pastorate should be of a civic character. Such an audience had never before been seen in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

THE CIVIC, STATE AND INTERNATIONAL RECEPTION TO REV. DR. TALMAGE, MAY 10 and 11, 1894.

which for magnitude, representative significance, and enthusiasm has never been equalled in any church in America. Over twenty thousand persons took part in it. It was the twenty-fifth anniversary of Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's pastorate later, appears on another page of this issue. Several weeks ago, a number of gentlemen undertook the preparation for what was at the outset intended to be an expression of local esteem by the people of Brooklyn, but the movement quickly developed. They

The background of the platform was hung with royal purple velvet, dazzling with stars of silver. Flanking either side of the platform was a large representation of the globe, the right representing the continents of the Old World, and bearing the inscription,

It was as closely packed and eager as ever was a national convention, and was quite as appreciative, both sexes being equally demonstrative in the applause that greeted the speakers.

Six thousand persons were quickly seated

In the auditorium and galleries, and still the thousands kept coming, filling the aisles, crowding the halls, and blocking the Tabernacle steps on Greene and Clinton avenues. It was impossible to repress the enthusiasm of those who sought admission. On the platform was a large and most distinguished gathering. In the chair, as presiding officer of the evening, was Mayor Schieren of Brooklyn, and on his right sat Dr. Talmage as the guest of honor. Prominent clergymen without distinction of race or creed were there, including Jew, Catholic, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian and Dutch Reformed. Side by side with Rev. A. C. Dixon, of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, sat Rev. Sylvester Malone, the Regent of the Catholic University, and Rabbi deSola Mendes, a Hebrew; ex-Mayors Booth, Boody and Howell, all of Brooklyn; Rev. Dr. Louis A. Banks, Hanson Place M. E. Church; Gen. John B. Woodward; ex-Congressman Hendrix; S. B. Dutcher; Revs. David Gregg, John F. Carson, John A. Roche, and Jas. W. Farrar; J. S. T. Stranahan; Leonard Moody; Stephen V. White; Judge Clement; Assemblyman Burtis; Rev. Chandler A. Oakes; Isaac J. Lansing; Coleman Benedict; Joseph Sanderson; Rev. Thomas J. Evans, George Ostrander; Charles Minor, of London; Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and over a score of others, prominent in religious, official and private life. On the right, screened in a bower of palms, was the band of the 13th Regiment National Guard (the regiment of which Dr. Talmage has been chaplain for a number of years), and its strains enlivened the proceedings throughout the evening.

MAYOR SCHIEREN'S REMARKS.

When the wave of applause that swept over the vast audience, as it greeted Mayor Schieren, Dr. Talmage and other well-known faces, had subsided, Rev. Chandler A. Oakes, Assistant Pastor of the Tabernacle, invited all present to join in the long metre doxology, after which prayer was offered by Rev. James M. Farrar. Mayor Charles A. Schieren then made a brief and very appropriate opening address, in the course of which he declared that the name and fame of the Tabernacle pastor as a preacher and writer were known not only wherever the English language is spoken, but into many foreign languages his sermons and books have been translated and are eagerly read by citizens of all countries, irrespective of creed or denomination. Even in Germany, that land of profound thinking and great learning, which has attained the highest reputation in theological literature, Dr. Talmage's sermons are translated and reprinted in the religious periodicals. Surely you are justified in claiming "the world as his pulpit." Brooklyn is indebted to Dr. Talmage for his genius and his energy and his never tiring efforts to spread the Gospel truths of Christ before the people and spread them broadcast over the world.

A CATHOLIC PRIEST'S TRIBUTE.

After a short address, by Mr. Bernard Peters, in which he pointed out that Beecher and Talmage and Storrs and Cuyler and Abbott and Meredith, had made Brooklyn pulpits famous the world over, the Rev. Sylvester Malone, a venerable Catholic priest of great learning and eloquence, took the platform, and delivered a brief address. He began by saying that this was probably the first occasion in America where a Catholic priest had appeared on a platform in a Protestant church to honor a Protestant minister. This remark was loudly applauded. He added:

Here I have the honor to be present and add my poor words to the praises that are so justly merited by your worthy pastor. He is the friend of all. Where did he ever drop the word that would be offensive to any Catholic priest? I have never read of it nor any other Catholic ever read of it. My religion has never been insulted by him. He had advocated his own religion on such broad Catholic principles that it is true of him that 25,000,000 of readers has he every week throughout the English-speaking world. It is because his principles are thoroughly Catholic that he carries with him the deep, fundamental principles of the Christian religion. He carries with him the profound reverence for the Master of us all, the Saviour of the world and it is in this as in his generous and kind nature that he has the mastery of all these minds and these many souls and is so great a success in the magnificent work he has done in the past and I hope he will live long years to continue it.

A PRESBYTERIAN TESTIMONY.

The next speaker was Rev. D. Gregg, a Presbyterian clergyman of Brooklyn, whose remarks frequently elicited applause from the great audience, which filling every nook of the vast building even to the highest galleries, listened with rapt attention and quick appreciation to the addresses. Dr. Gregg, among other remarks, said:

As Dr. Talmage's nearest Presbyterian neighbor, and as one of the delegates of the Brooklyn presbytery appointed to stand on this platform, I bring to Dr. Talmage and his great flock, the good will and the prayers and the good speed of the Presbyterian community in this city of churches. I have come to this meeting to-night for another reason. It is a reason which all the ministers here have for coming. I come, as my brethren here come, to demonstrate to the public the freedom from jealousy which characterizes the men of the American pulpit. [Applause.] We heartily rejoice in the success of every true man of God, and we are glad of the opportunity to pay to every such man the tribute which he has lawfully earned.

In conclusion, he eloquently described Dr. Talmage as the greatest word painter of any continent on earth. "He paints for Christ. He paints with a large brush, with colors that burn and glow, and nations gather around his pictures and feel an uplift and a holy thrill."

"THE OLD STORY" THE BEST.

Rev. Dr. John F. Carson, also a Presbyterian, followed. He declared that the sermons preached from the Tabernacle pulpit had emphasized the abiding power and vitality of the Gospel, and stimulated ministers everywhere to preach the old story.

After paying tribute to Dr. Talmage's "broad churchmanship," Dr. Carson went on to add:

We honor Dr. Talmage because of his faithful presentation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Were I asked to express in a sentence the substance of the preaching of the Tabernacle Pulpit I could find no better sentence than this, "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." From this pulpit there has gone out into all the world the ringing message, "I am not ashamed of crown the quarter century mark of a noble career of public usefulness would have been somewhat incomplete had not a Jew been actively present. We Hebrews feel gratefully at home when it comes to honoring Dr. Talmage.

Much more the learned rabbi said in this strain. He admitted that there were many differences of opinion between Dr. Talmage and himself, but added "whatever our differences of belief, there is no difference between us as to what constitutes a noble life, well spent in honoring the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

THE TABERNACLE A GIBRALTAR.

After a brief musical interlude, the speeches were resumed, Rev. Louis A. Banks, of the Methodist Church, taking the platform. Dr. Banks said he had come with a handful of wild flowers from the Oregon hillsides to add to the chaplet upon the head of the chieftain of the American pulpit, the most universally read of all preachers now living in the world. He believes Dr. Talmage had done more to revolutionize preaching and make it entertaining and interesting than any other man now among us. No other minister had done so much to give consecrated individuality the right of way. During all these twenty-five years the Tabernacle pulpit has stood as a Gibraltar for a cheering faith in God who, having made the world, was able to take care of it and bring it at last to a successful issue. Though Dr. Talmage has preached much of the sins and vices of the community, he has never failed to present a Christ, mighty in love and power and wisdom; one able to save the lowest and the vilest and bring them to spiritual health and saintship.

the Gospel of Christ." Who can tell the effect that has been wrought by the simple fact that the Tabernacle Pulpit has found the old Gospel all sufficient for man's comfort and man's salvation and rich enough and full enough for thousands of sermons of rare beauty and power and richness.

We honor him for his broad philanthropy. What does the Tabernacle pulpit stand for? A loving Gospel where there are souls to be saved; a world-rending protest where there is oppression, bread where there is famine. If there are starving people in Russia, Dr. Talmage starts a movement to feed them, and goes to Russia to superintend the distribution of the food. If there are starving people in Brooklyn he gives them bread and meat. If there are starving people in New York, he raises through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD $25,000, and their destitution is relieved. Hundreds who have been fed when hungry, greet Dr. Talmage to-night.

RABBI MENDES SPEAKS FOR THE JEWS.

Every eye in the vast throng was fixed on the platform when Rabbi deSola Mendes, was introduced. His address throughout was brilliant and interesting. He began by thanking the audience for the privilege, in behalf of the Jews, of "interweaving a leaf of recognition in the silver chaplet this night so gloriously placed upon the brow of this distinguished laborer in God's best vineyard." He continued:

What with a Christian bishop elbowing his way through the throng to do honor to the obsequies of a Jewish banker last week; what with an invitation to me, of the least of the Hebrews to come and speak a word here to-night, it does seem as if the words of the prophet were approaching fulfillment. "In those days ten men of the nations shall take hold of the skirt of a Jewish man and say, 'Let us go with you.' [Applause.] I do not suppose that you are all quite ready to do that, but I verily believe you are getting to feel, as I feel, quite at home in each other's company, quite at home as children in the same Father's house. [Applause.] This is the first time I have ever spoken in a Christian church, and I must confess I am surprised that I do not feel myself more strange than I do. You are ready to grasp the Jew's skirt yet, but I should think you would find it difficult to say a harsh thing or do a hard one against the Jew, when you recollect the consoling relationship which exists between us. And this I know, that under the leadership of this large hearted, generous and faithful servant of God you have never been taught any but the tenderest sympathy, the most brotherly regard, for the members of the Hebrew race. Therefore, all this sublime spectacle of the uprising of thousands to dence of deep agitation. Then, in a voice trembling with emotion, he said:

"Forever photographed upon my mind and heart is this scene of May 10, 1894. Two feelings dominate me to-night—gratitude and unworthiness; gratitude first to God, and next to all who have complimented me.

"My twenty-five years in Brooklyn have been happy years. Hard work, of course. This is the fourth church in which I have preached since coming to Brooklyn, and how much of the difficult work of church building that implies, you can appreciate. This church had its mother and its grandmother and its great-grandmother. I could not tell the story of disasters without telling the story of heroes and heroines, and around me in all these years have stood men and women of whom the world was not worthy.

"But for the most part the twenty-five years have been to me a great happiness. And the question is already absorbing my entire nature, 'What can I do to repay Brooklyn for this great uprising?' Here is my hand and heart for a campaign of harder work for God and righteousness than I have ever yet accomplished.

"I have been told that sometimes in the Alps there are great avalanches called down by a shepherd's voice. The pure white snow is so delicately and evenly poised that the vibration caused by the human voice will send down the avalanche with overwhelming power. Well, to-night I think that the heavens above us are full of pure white blessing, mountains of mercy on mountains of mercy, and it will not take much to bring down the avalanche of benediction, and so I lift my voice to start it. And now let the avalanche of blessing come upon your bodies, your minds, your souls, your homes, your churches and your city. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting, and let the whole earth be filled with his glory! Amen and amen!"

THE LAST BROOKLYN TABERNACLE. BUILT 1891, BURNED 1894.

Brief addresses were made by Rev. Spencer F. Roche, John Winslow and Congressman Stephen V. White, Rev. A. C. Dixon (Baptist) and several other gentlemen. Dr. Dixon thought that as Dr. Talmage for the last twenty-five years had had the world around him, it was but fair that he should now go round the world. He is the world's chief dispenser of Christian sunshine. He added:

Among the first things I ever read from Dr. Talmage, was his illustration of a child trying to eat sunshine with a spoon. He has learned the secret of living on sunshine, and dealing it out to others. I suppose he has his ailments, his worries, and his troubles, but I have not heard of them. Sydney Smith wrote to a friend, "I have asthma, gout, and seven other maladies, otherwise, I am quite well." Dr. Talmage has taught us to look at the "otherwise," he keeps on the sunward side of every cloud, and therefore, sees the rainbow. He prefers gazing at the stars to peering into the darkness. This is an optimism of faith and hope and charity. His religion is like that of the old English farmer who wrote on the weather vane of his barn. "God is love." A neighbor remonstrated, saying that it was a very changeable place to write so immutable a truth. "It means," replied the farmer, "that God is love, no matter which way the wind blows." Such an optimism fills heart and home with good cheer.

LETTERS AND TELEGRAMS.

Letters of regret were read from a number of distinguished persons who had been prevented from attending the first day's celebration of the Silver Jubilee. They spoke in glowing terms of eulogy of Dr. Talmage's beneficent pulpit career.

DR. TALMAGE'S REMARKS.

All eyes were upon Dr. Talmage as he rose to face the great multitude. He stood silent for a moment, his face giving evi-

The eloquent response of the pastor was followed by a moment of profound silence, which was succeeded by an outburst of applause.

After listening to several other brief addresses, a hymn was sung, the benediction was pronounced, and the great audience dispersed to the strains of a triumphal march on the grand organ.

Second Day of the Jubilee.

A Glorious Demonstration at the National and International Celebration—Speeches by Many Distinguished Men—The Brilliant Assemblage.

WHEN the doors of the Brooklyn Tabernacle were opened May 11, the second evening of the anniversary celebration of Dr. Talmage's Silver Jubilee, the crush of admiring thousands who sought to enter was even greater than on the preceding night. Clinton and Greene Avenues, were packed for a considerable distance with a solid mass of people, all eager to witness the national and international services. Within, the great church had been rendered still more beautiful by additions to the decorations; and viewed from every point, filled to overflowing with a brilliant audience and brightly lighted, it now looked like a scene from some fairyland, with a thousand vari-colored hangings dazzling amid silk and silver and purple velvet. The church was fragrant with the odor of flowers and made cool and pleasant to the eye by the tasteful disposition of great banks of palms, ferns and hydrangeas. On the platform were many celebrated in national affairs, including Gen. B. F. Tracy, Ex-Secretary of the Navy; U. S. Ex-Senator Wm. M. Everts, U. S. Senator Patrick Walsh, of Georgia; Rev. Dr. W. H. Milburn, the chaplain of the United States Senate; Fessell Sage, Murat Halstead, Rev. S. M. Janson, of Denver; Hon. Joseph C. Hendrix, Rev. Thomas J. Evans, Rev. W. W. Ewlish, Rev. Joseph Sanderson, Rev. Luis A. Banks, Prof. R. Ogden Doremus, I. Louis Klopsch, Rev. R. S. Pardington, Fv. Louis Wolferz and a number of others. It was the end of a quarter century of service in the Tabernacle, and the great audience could have had no thought that it would be the last occasion on which such an assemblage would meet there. Everything was happy, and the brilliant scene, with its flowers, music and decorations, had an inspiring effect upon the orators on the platform.

THE BLIND CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER.

When the whole audience had sung the evening hymn, the venerable blind chaplain of the United States Senate, Dr. Milburn, offered the opening prayer. Referring to the tribulations of the pastor, he said: "Although his faith and that of his people is now and again been tried 'so as by fire,' as silver is refined and gold purged, we bless thee that in the midst of the fierce glare and heat of the flames, one like unto the Son of God hath been with them, and that the glory of this latter house is greater than was the glory of the former houses. We heartily bless thee for the brave, manly, kindly faith, the sweet, wholesome, life-giving Christian truth, so steadily preached from this pulpit whereby thousands have been converted from sin to righteousness, and thousands more confirmed in ways of 'well-doing and holiness.'"

Gen. Tracy, on assuming the chair as presiding officer of the evening made a most felicitous speech, in which he referred to the long-continued Dr. Talmage's ministry had taken upon the national scene. "No preacher," he said, "has ever been so widely read in his lifetime as Dr. Talmage. His sermons are regularly preached in 3,000 different newspapers, each of which has thousands of readers. Indeed, there is no town in this country, from Maine to California, from the Lakes to the Gulf, which has not a paper publishing his sermons in all every week. The same is true in England, and his sermons are, moreover, published in Australia, New Zealand, and other countries, being translated into many different languages. Therefore does it seem unreasonable to estimate that 6,000,000 people hear and read his sermons every week? He speaks in a language that finds a response in every human heart."

SENATORS EVARTS AND WALSH.

He was followed by Hon. Wm. M. Everts, the greatest of America's living lawyers, who was received with demonstrations of cordial approval by the great audience. He spoke briefly and eloquently of the power wielded by the pulpit in public affairs, and of the salutary and moral influence of the Tabernacle on Brooklyn and the whole nation. United States Senator Walsh followed in a brilliant speech expressing the sentiments of the people of Georgia "in commendation of a man whose labors have been devoted to the gospel of peace and good will." He said:

For two generations the name of Talmage has been respected and honored by the people of Georgia. The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage has devoted his life to the cause of God and humanity. He has been not only a hearer, but a doer of the word. When the South was prostrated by the isolation of war, when her homes were destroyed, her lands and industries wasted, when her sons and daughters were weeping for the loved and lost, when despair wrung the hearts of her people, his voice was heard appealing to the victors for justice to the vanquished, and from that day to this he has reached the gospel of peace, fraternity, liberty, and equality. His countrymen admire him for his splendid gifts. They admire him for the example of his noble life. We of the South honor him for his loving the sections into peace. His love of country is one of his strongest virtues. It is above party and above section. He is a patriot, deprecating the passions and prejudices of partisan politics and always contending for a united people and a united country. Dr. Talmage's benevolence has not been confined to his own country. Wherever humanity is suffering his heart goes out in sympathy to the afflicted of all races and all creeds. He would succor the heathen in densest Africa as he fed the poor in Russia. He would clothe the naked and lift up the suffering and oppressed in every land, because he is an American [applause] and believes that all men are created free and equal.

Ex-Congressman Hendrix, of Brooklyn, next spoke, in a strain that won hearty plaudits from the assemblage. He described Dr. Talmage as only one who knew him could do, and said, among other things:

He draws his illustrations from the great book of human experience. No one has ever questioned his orthodoxy. He has never sought to redress the old creed of his fathers. No one has needed a map or a guide book to find out his theological views. They are as old-fashioned and as plain as a country road. He has never lost any time trying to refit his doctrines to the passing tastes of men. His pulpit work has been consistent. His last sermon does not quarrel with his first. He hammers out the pure gold of the gospel in his own way, and is always willing to give the elbow room which he asks for himself. No one comes to his church for a Sunday morning nap. He keeps everybody awake. His sermons are never too long. Nobody goes away tired. He gives every one something to think about. He puts a little sunshine into every heart. He tries to do good in the world, tries earnestly and devotedly, and he succeeds.

GREETINGS FROM ALL THE WORLD.

Here the interest of the audience was aroused to a lively pitch by the reading by Dr. Louis Klopsch of a number of congratulatory letters and telegrams from prominent persons in different parts of the globe.

enriched by his labors. Many a life has become beautiful through his teachings. All classes have shared in the benefactions of his heart and hand. I trust he may have many more years of similar success in the great work to which he has been called. The Reception is one worthy of the man and of his church. Too much cannot be said on the occasion. What may be said in his praise will be only a stimulant for larger efforts and more heroic undertakings.

Letter from U. S. Senator John Sherman:

There is no one of whom I would more cheerfully express my sincere regard and hearty appreciation of his wonderful ability than Mr. Talmage. I have heard him, and heard of him for so many years, and have read so many of his sermons, that I hold him in my estimation as the greatest preacher of our time. All this and much more would I say for him were I at liberty to amend, but I fear that my official duties here will not permit me to leave at a time when so many interests are involved in the legislation of Congress.

Telegram from Bishop John H. Vincent, Methodist Episcopal Church:

I sincerely regret that ill health renders it impossible for me to make my engagements for the next two months. I rejoice in all successes which crown Dr. Talmage, the brilliant and loyal American preacher.

B. Fay Mills, the distinguished Evangelist, wrote:

No man, by tongue and pen, has preached the Gospel to so many people, since the world began. And the best of it is that it has been a Gospel of hope and good cheer; which, while never compromising in any way what you have felt to be true, has uplifted and strengthened countless multitudes of men and women of all climes and tongues and customs and religions. My own ministry has been stronger than for good, in the direction of public sentiment, extends beyond his own church and own congregation; it is felt all over our country, and even beyond the seas. Please convey to the Doctor my regards and congratulations.

In addition to the foregoing, many of which were loudly applauded, letters and telegrams were received from Gov. Northern of Georgia, Governor Rich of Michigan, Governor O'Farrell of Virginia, U. S. Senator Hoar, Governor Lewelling of Kansas, Governor Richards of Montana, Hon. Wm. Walter Phelps of New Jersey, Governor Smith of New Hampshire, Governor Osborne, of Wyoming, U. S. Senator Cary and others.

OTHER ADDRESSES.

After the reading of letters and telegrams, speaking was resumed. Rev. Charles L. Thompson, Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, very happily described the office of the preacher. "There is no possibility," he observed, "of honoring De Witt Talmage and leaving the Gospel out of account, or even relegating it to a second place." Continuing Dr. Thompson said: "Talmage indeed belongs to Brooklyn and New York, and our country and other countries—but the best title he can wear tonight, and the one I know he would bind closest to his heart, is that on which twenty-five growing and beautiful years have passed their accumulated seals—this, viz. 'God's man.'—I, who know him well, mistake him radically, if it be not better to his ear, than all the plaudits of men, to be called 'De Witt Talmage—the slave of Jesus Christ.' This, then, to my mind, is the crown of this celebration, that it is one more leaf in the laurel crown of Jesus Christ,—one more sign of the coming of that kingdom for which this man has fought so valiantly for more than a generation."

The speaker referred to the use of the Tabernacle sermons in many rural communities and prairie towns where there is no preacher and where the living words of Dr. Talmage, couched in homely phrase that reaches every heart, are read in rooms and school-houses to the conversion of souls.

DR. TALMAGE'S HAPPY REPLY.

At the conclusion of his remarks, the audience sang "America" and Hon. Murat Halstead spoke briefly, after which Rev. I. J. Lansing, of Park street church, Boston, made an excellent address which was listened to with rapt attention from beginning to end. It was 10:30 p. m. when the seven thousand auditors greeted the Tabernacle pastor as he came forward to deliver the last public address in the beautiful edifice, so soon to be consumed by fire, like its predecessors. He was greeted with tumultuous applause, lasting several minutes. Dr. Talmage began by referring pleasantly to the distinguished speakers who had preceded him that evening, and excited applause by the felicitous style in which he complimented each. Touching the honors paid to himself, he illustrated his own feelings by a story:

Dr. George Bethune, once a great preacher on Brooklyn heights, was stopping over night at a Pennsylvania farm house. In the morning the doctor sat at the breakfast table alone, for the good housewife felt that was the best way to honor him. And when the buckwheat cakes were put upon his plate the good woman stood by him with the molasses cup to pour the sweetness on his cakes, and she said to him, "How will you take this molasses on these cakes? Will you take it crinkle crinkle or all in a puddle?" Tonight to me the sweetness has come in the latter way, all in a puddle. [Applause.]

This is the supreme hour of my life. Many emotions stir my soul, but neither the Brooklyn city reception last night nor the national and international reception to-night, so far as I know my own heart, has created in me one feeling of exaltation or pride. It has only stirred in me a profound wish and prayer that I might hereafter prove myself worthy of all this kindness. Up till 40 years of age a man may have ambition for himself, but for the most part after that it is ambition for his children; and I shall hand over to my children in every form that I can preserve the memories of last night and to-night. I shall tell them never to forget the men who stood on this platform, and when the sons of these men come on the stage of action, to seek to cheer them as much as their fathers have cheered me. [Applause.]

Then followed a remarkable scene. The entire audience, auditorium and galleries, rose at Dr. Talmage's request to honor the illustrious guests of the evening and the air was a sea of waving handkerchiefs. Three times they waved and fluttered, in token of three cheers, and then when the demonstra-

Cablegram from Count Andre Bobrinsky, St. Petersburg, Russia:

Heart-felt congratulations from gratefully remembering Russian friends.

Letter from Herbert Gladstone, Dollis Hill, London, N. W.:

Mr. Gladstone being somewhat out of health, has to restrict his correspondence as much as possible, but he desires me to say for him that Dr. Talmage always has his best wishes, and that he remembers with much interest the occasions when he has had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Talmage.

Cablegram from London:

Cordial congratulations, grateful acknowledgment of splendid service in ministry during last twenty-five years, and warmest wishes for future prosperity. Signed by Arch-Deacon of London. Canon Wilherforce. Thain Davidson. Prof. Simpson of Edinburgh. The Bishop of London.

Letter from Bishop John F. Hurst, of Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C.:

By pen and on platform and in pulpit, Dr. Talmage has achieved a great and wonderful success. The church in this and all other countries has been it could have been without the influence of his matchless words, and I doubt whether there be a minister of Christ on earth who does not consciously or unconsciously, owe to him a real debt of gratitude.

Letter from U. S. Senator, Wm. F. Vilas:

Heartily thanks for the distinguished compliment of your invitation, which I regret my public duties prevent accepting. I cordially join in the congratulations which Dr. Talmage will have from millions of his countrymen.

Governor Smith, of New Hampshire, said in his letter:

Dr. Talmage's sermons are yearly commanding a wider publication, an evidence of the high esteem in which he is held by the people, and a test of merit which cannot be gainsaid.

Letter from the Earl of Aberdeen, Governor-General of Canada, Ottawa:

I regret that owing to engagements here, I am compelled to decline the courteous invitation extended to me, but I beg to offer good wishes in relation to this demonstration. Esteem and good-will toward Dr. Talmage.

Letter from Hon. Wm. McKinley, Governor of Ohio, Columbus, O.

While it is impossible for me to be present, I take occasion to give expression to the great respect and esteem in which I hold Dr. Talmage. His influence tion had subsided, the organ pealed forth the notes of "Old Lang Syne," and the thousands, with one voice, joined in the strain. The benediction brought the Jubilee to a close, and thus ended the greatest and most successful occasion ever witnessed in any church in America, as a testimony of the popular love and appreciation of a pastor who has been very dear to the countless thousands of Christian people in every country on the globe.

The Tabernacle in Ashes.

A Great Calamity Overtakes Dr. Talmage's Congregation — The Third Tabernacle is Destroyed by Fire — Already Planning to Rebuild it.

IT is one of those mysteries that will never be revealed this side eternity. Our church is gone; but we will trust in God.

These were the words spoken by Dr. Talmage, sitting in his own home in Brooklyn, bowed down by the burden of a great and sudden disaster. His beloved Tabernacle, the pride of the city and the largest Protestant church in America, had been swept away by flames, without a moment's warning. It mattered little to the devoted pastor that he had barely escaped with his own life. His church was gone—that beautiful temple of worship, which was known and loved to the ends of the earth—and the light of his life seemed for a time to be extinguished with it.

But great as was the disaster, still greater had been the mercy that prevented a worse calamity. Not a life had been lost, as far as was known. The fire occurred on Sunday, May 13, immediately after the close of the forenoon service. The sermon had held the audience with more than usual interest, since it was the pastor's farewell before departing on his long journey around the globe. In his prayer, he had been especially fervent and touching, and had invoked the Divine protection and blessing on all who had participated in the great Jubilee service of the preceding week. He had recalled all the kindnesses that had been shown toward the church on that occasion by other churches and their pastors, and his whole prayer was an outpouring of heartfelt gratitude for himself and his flock.

Dr. Talmage, at the conclusion of the service, had left the platform and was in the centre aisle, shaking hands with his people, as is his custom every Sunday. Almost all had passed out of the building, and the pastor, Mrs. Talmage, Assistant Pastor Oakes, and the officers of the church were also preparing to leave, when a faint puff of smoke was observed at the bottom of the organ. Mrs. Talmage was standing in her pew, the centre of a little group of ladies, who were on the point of leaving. The great Tabernacle was still en fête, the decorations of the Jubilee services not yet having been removed. The palms above the organ pipes waved and the air grew hotter, yet the glittering banners and rich velvet hangings flapped as though in a breeze. Some one called the attention of Mr. Dey, the sexton, to the smoke, and he at once set out to investigate. The entrance to the organ is through a room in the rear of the auditorium, and when the sexton, climbing up a ladder that stood there, pushed aside the scuttle over the interior of the organ, he saw through the thick smoke flames creeping around the pipes. Leaping back, he ran into the auditorium and gave the alarm. There were then only half a hundred persons in the church. Smoke began to pour out of the organ in dense volumes. Dr. Talmage heard the alarm and saw the smoke, but did not seem for the instant to realize his peril. Mrs. Talmage called out to him that the church was on fire, and those who stood by urged him to go, as the organ pipes were in imminent danger of falling. The pastor gazed upward toward the roof of his beloved Tabernacle, where the tongues of fire shooting upward had already begun to lick the fretwork on the ceiling. He ran up the platform steps, entered his study and emerged a moment later with his hat and overcoat. The church was now nearly empty. He started for the door, but at that instant the great pipes of the organ, already half consumed by the flames, fell outward with a crash and into the auditorium. Another step, and the pastor of the Tabernacle would have been buried in the blazing mass. As it was, he quickly turned and hastened to the exit from the study. At the last moment he would have returned to the platform; but friends conveyed him, safe and unhurt, but still dazed from his terrible experience, to the outer air on Greene avenue. Others greeted him joyfully on the sidewalk, believing him to have perished in the church, which was now a roaring furnace of flame.

There were several other narrow escapes, but fortunately all were out of the doomed building before the fire and smoke filled the auditorium. Mr. Frederick W. Lawrence, Treasurer Thomas Pittblado, Trustee T. E. Matthews and others were among those who were exposed to serious peril, and their escape was providential. Mr. Lawrence crept out on hands and knees to the open air, and Mr. Matthews and a few others were almost suffocated when they reached the street. Meanwhile, the fire had made tremendous headway and the interior of the great building was all ablaze. The beautiful decorations, hired for the occasion, valued at $15,000, were swept away in a moment; the organ was a wreck, and the woodwork of auditorium and galleries was all aflame. Flames shot through the roof in broad sheets, and the Hotel Regent, the finest in Brooklyn, was soon the prey of the fire. Vast crowds of spectators assembled in the streets, and the entire fire department of the city was summoned to the spot to fight the devouring element. But the efforts were unavailing. Soon the noble Tabernacle was a shapeless, blackened ruin, only the tottering and broken walls being left of the magnifi-

"But if we can feel sure that our dear pastor will continue to break the bread of life to us and to the great multitudes that are accustomed to throng the Tabernacle, we are willing to undertake the work, firmly believing that we can safely count upon the blessing of God and the practical sympathy of all Christian people.

"Will you kindly give us the encouragement of your promise to serve the Tabernacle as its pastor, if we will dedicate a new building free from debt, to the honor, the glory, and the service of God?"

"TRUSTEES OF THE TABERNACLE."

On reading the letter Dr. Talmage replied: "Thank you, my brethren, thank you! I have buried the dead, baptized the children, and married the young men and maidens of this people, and my heart is with them. I would rather serve them than any other people on the face of the earth. Under the conditions you name, I will remain the Tabernacle's pastor."

Although the cause of the conflagration cannot now be ascertained, it is generally believed that it was produced by an electric spark from one of the wires that supplied the power necessary to run the organ. The wire probably rubbed against a reel, wearing off the insulation. Prof. Browne, the organist, was seated at the instrument playing, until he was driven off by the smoke. There was considerable delay on the part of the firemen in responding to the alarm, and their conduct is to be investigated. Arrangements will be made at once by the Trustees to re-build the Tabernacle, either on the old site or a new one to be selected hereafter. The work will be pushed vigorously, and the co-operation of all Christian communities in America and Europe will be invoked. Already a substantial sum has been subscribed by the cent temple that had stood as a landmark for Christianity in America. The destruction was swift and complete. In less than an hour after the fire began, the interior of the great church, stripped of its glory, its rose-tinted cathedral windows, its carvings and gildings, all lapped up by the flame, lay a charred and smoking mass of ruins. The third Brooklyn Tabernacle had met the fate of its two immediate predecessors.

The flames had still other fuel to feed upon, for the Hotel Regent could not be saved. It was completely gutted and several dwellings nearby also suffered. A number of inmates of the hotel were rescued with difficulty. Sparks and blazing timbers filled the air for many blocks around. The Summerfield M. E. Church caught fire on the roof, and its trustees pluckily fought back the flames with a bucket brigade till the engines arrived. After a hard battle, the firemen were successful in preventing the destruction of further property.

At his home Dr. Talmage was the recipient of many condolences. Neighboring churches sent committees to tender the use of their pulpits; telegrams flowed in, and visitors came from all quarters. In the afternoon the Tabernacle Trustees met at the pastor's residence and Dr. Louis Klopsch submitted the following letter, which was adopted and tendered to the pastor:

"DEAR DR. TALMAGE: With saddened hearts, but undismayed, and with faith in God unshaken and undisturbed, the trustees of the Brooklyn Tabernacle have unanimously resolved to rebuild the Tabernacle. We find that, after paying the present indebtedness, there will be nothing left to begin with.

Trustees and other amounts are promised, so that a considerable start for a building fund is assured at the outset. The press is full of expressions of sympathy for Dr. Talmage and his flock. Says the New York "Morning Advertiser:

"If every sigh of regret for the loss of Dr. Talmage's beautiful new church could be coined into a penny, they would replace the burned Tabernacle with an edifice as fine as St. Peter's in Rome."

The New York "Tribune" has the following cheering words to the stricken pastor and people: "Dr. Talmage will have the sympathies of a host of well-wishers in his new reverse of fortune. The manifestations of hearty appreciation and respect which have been drawn out by his impressive anniversary meetings, can hardly fail to encourage him to face with calm confidence the calamity which has overwhelmed him on the eve of his long vacation journey. He has a work yet to do, and Brooklyn, which has been the scene of his trials, triumphs, disasters, and harassing financial anxieties, is the place for him to go on with it undismayed and unconquerable."

The Brooklyn "Standard Union," in a similar spirit, has these encouraging remarks:

"The officers of the Tabernacle congregation have met the occasion in a spirit worthy its historical and dramatic conspicuity. They have calmly resolved to go on and rebuild, and Dr. Talmage goes on the journey he had planned for his recreation and education, the accumulation of the material the world affords, as stored energy in his brain to give to the world again; not as if nothing had happened, but with a sharpened consciousness of duty and a augmented sense of devotion to his labor; and a spirit chastened, but not broken; bowed, but clearer and loftier in the conception of the breadth and glory of the work to be done."

The Brooklyn "Times" says: "The opportunity has been given, sooner than had been anticipated, to test the sincerity of all the friendly congratulations that were recently showered upon the Tabernacle and its pastor, and the 'Times' believe that the friendship so warmly expressed will stand the test of trial. Dr. Talmage and his people need tangible evidence of the sympathy of the Christian world, and such evidence should not be withheld or given grudgingly."

"The noble structure," says the "Mail and Express," "so suddenly destroyed, was not only the home-altar of Dr. Talmage's immediate followers, but also the heart-shrine of that larger congregation of uncounted thousands who received his inspiring words from the wings of the press." Similar expressions come from every quarter, and kind words are productive of equally kind deeds, the rehabilitation of the Tabernacle the near future is assured. It is the fourth church that Dr. Talmage has occupied during his twenty-five years' ministry in Brooklyn, and the third in succession that has been lost by fire. The first to fall before the flame was the Tabernacle in Schermerhorn street near Third avenue, which was built in 18 of wood and iron. On Sunday morning, December 22, 1872, it was consumed by fire. Next, a larger church, capable of seating 5,000 persons, was erected in 1874, near the previous site. On Sunday morning, October 13, 1889, it also fell a prey to the flame, having, as was believed, been struck by lightning during the night. The late Tabernacle was erected in 1891, at a cost of $450,000, including the site. The organ cost $30,000, and was the finest instrument in the country. The windows were marvels of the stainer's art. The loss by the recent fire is one that will bear heavily on the congregation. Out of the insurance, the existing debt will be paid, and the site will be sacrificed to do this, if necessary. The total loss on the Tabernacle building is estimated at $300,000; loss on decoration $15,000; uninsured. The loss on the Regent Hotel is placed at $650,000; partially covered by insurance, and the damage to other neighboring buildings will aggregate $700,000, nearly all being insured.

What the plans of the Trustees will be for the future are not yet decided. A building in some convenient neighborhood will probably be engaged for temporary use, until the question of a new building is decided. Dr. Louis Klopsch may maintain the Sabbath school intact and perhaps Rev. B. F. Mills, who was engaged sometime ago to conduct services during the summer, will preach to the Tabernacle flock while Dr. Talmage is absent.

The latter has departed on his trip around the world, as arranged, to return in October, when he hopes to devote himself to the Lord's service in Brooklyn, where he has already rounded out a successful quarter of a century of church work. Sermons, prepared specially for that purpose, will continue to appear regularly in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

DR. TALMAGE'S RESOLVE.

Dr. Talmage, before leaving for the West, wrote the following communication to friends and the friends of Brooklyn Tabernacle everywhere, to be transmitted through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

THIS church has again been halted by a sword of flame. The destruction of the first Brooklyn Tabernacle was a mystery. The destruction of the second was greater profound. This third calamity adjourns to the Judgment Day for explanation. The home of a vast multitude of souls, it has become a heap of ashes. Whether it will ever rise again is a prophecy we will not undertake. God rules the world and makes no mistake. He has a way with churches as with individuals. One thing is certain: the pastor of Brooklyn Tabernacle will continue to preach as long as life and health last. We have no anxieties about a place to preach in. But we ask for the prayers of all good people for the pastor and people of Brooklyn Tabernacle.

RECOVERED FAMILIES.

Rv. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday at Little Rock, Ark. Text:

I. Sam. 30: 4, 19, "Then David and the people that were with him lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no more power to weep. . . . David recovered all."

HERE is intense excitement in the village of Ziklag. David and his men are bidding good-bye to their families, and are off for the wars. In that little village of Ziklag the defenseless ones will be safe until the warriors, flushed with victory, come hne. But will the defenseless ones be safe? The soft arms of children are around the necks of the bronzed warriors until they shake themselves free and start, and handkerchiefs and flags are waved and kisses are blown until the armed men vanish beyond the hills. David and his men soon get tough with their campaign and start homeward. Every night on their way home, no sooner does the soldier put his hand on the knapsack than in his dream he hears the welcome of the wife and the shout of the child. Oh, what long stories they will have to tell their families, of how they edged the battle-axe! and then will roll up their sleeve and show the half-healed wound. With glad, quick step, they march home, David and his men, for they are marching home. Now they come up to the last hill which overlooks Ziklag, and they expect in a moment to see the dwelling-places of their loved ones. They look, and as they look their cheek turns pale, and their lip quivers, and their hand involuntarily comes down on the hilt of the sword. "Where is Ziklag? Where are our homes?" they cry. As! the curling smoke above the ruin tells a tragedy. The Amalekites have come down and consumed the village, and carried off mothers and the wives and the children of David and his men into captivity. The earthy warriors stand for a few moments transfixed with horror. Then their eyes glance to each other, and they burst into uncontrollable weeping; for when a strong warrior weeps, the grief is appalling. It seems as if the emotion might tear him to pieces. They "wept until they had no more power to weep." But soon their sorrow turns into rage, and David, swinging his sword high in air, cries, "Pursue, for thou shalt overtake them, and without fail recover all." Now the march becomes a double-quick. Two hundred of David's men stop by the brook Besor, faint with fatigue and grief. They cannot go a step farther. They are left there. But the other four hundred men under David, with a sort of panther step, march on in sorrow and in rage. They find by the side of the road a half-dead Egyptian, and they resuscitate him, and compel him to tell the whole story. He says, "Yonder they went, the captors and the captives," pointing in the direction. Forward, ye four hundred brave men of Israel! Very soon David and his enraged company come upon the Amalekitish host. Yonder they see their own wives and children and mothers, and under Amalekitish guard. Here are the officers of the Amalekitish army holding a banquet. The cups are full, the music is roused, the dance begins. The Amalekitish host cheer and cheer over their victory. But, without note of bugle or warning of trumpet, David and his four hundred men burst upon the scene. David and his men look up, and one glance at their loved ones in captivity and under Amalekitish guard throws them into a very fury of determination; for you know how men will fight when they fight for their wives and children. Ah! there are lightnings in their eye, and every finger is a spear, and their voice is like the shout of the whirlwind! Amidst the upset tankards and the costly viands crushed underfoot, the wounded Amalekites lie (their blood mingling with their wine), shrieking for mercy. No sooner do David and his men win the victory than they throw their swords down into the dust—what do they want with swords now?—and the broken families come together amidst a great shout of joy that makes the parting scene in Ziklag seem very insipid in the comparison.

Now they are coming home, David and his men and their families—a long procession. Men, women, and children, loaded with jewels and robes and with all kinds of trophies that the Amalekites had gathered up in years of conquest—everything now in the hands of David and his men. When they come by the brook Besor, the place where stayed the men sick and incompetent to travel, the jewels and the robes and all kinds of treasures are divided among the sick as well as among the well. Surely, the lame and exhausted ought to have some of the treasures. Here is a robe for a pale-faced warrior. Here is a pillow for this dying man. Here is a handful of gold for the wasted trumpeter. I really think that these men who fainted by the brook Besor may have endured as much as those men who went into the battle. Some mean fellows objected to the sick ones having any of the spoils. The objectors said, "These men did not fight." David, with a magnanimous heart, replies, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

This subject is practically suggestive to me. Thank God, in these times a man can go off on a journey, and be gone weeks and months, and come back and see his house untouched of incendiary, and have his family on the step to greet him if by telegram he has foretold the moment of his coming. But there are Amalekitish disasters, there are Amalekitish diseases, that sometimes come down upon one's home, making as devastating work as the day when Ziklag took fire. There are families you represent broken up. No battering-ram smote in the door, no iconoclast crumbled the statues, no flame leaped amidst the curtains; but so far as all the joy and merriment that once belonged to that house are concerned, the home has departed. Armed diseases came down upon the quietness of the scene—scarlet fevers, or pleurisies, or consumptions, or undefined disorders came and seized upon some members of that family, and carried them away. Ziklag in ashes! And you go about, sometimes weeping and sometimes enraged, wanting to get back your loved ones as much as David and his men wanted to reconstruct their despoiled households. Ziklag in ashes! Some of you went off from home. You counted the days of your absence. Every day seemed as long as a week. Oh! how glad you were when the time came for you to go aboard the steamboat or rail-car and start for home! You arrived. You went up the street where your dwelling was, and in the night you put your hand on the door-bell, and, behold! it was wrapped with the signal of bereavement.

A gentleman went to a friend of mine in the city of Washington, and asked that through him he might get a consulship to some foreign port. My friend said to him, "What do you want to go away from your beautiful home for, into a foreign port?" "Oh," he replied, "my home is gone! My six children are dead. I must get away, sir. I can't stand it in this country any longer." Ziklag in ashes!

Why these long shadows of bereavement across this audience? Why is it that in almost every assemblage black is the predominant color of the apparel? Is it because you do not like saffron or brown or violet? Oh no! You say, "The world is not so bright to us as once it was;" and there is a story of silent voices, and of still feet, and of loved ones gone, and when you look over the hills, expecting only beauty and loveliness, you find only devastation and woe. Ziklag in ashes!

I preach this sermon to-day, because I want to rally you, as David rallied his men, for the recovery of the loved and the lost. Do you want to join the companionship of your loved ones who have gone? Are you as anxious to join them as David and his men were to join their families? Then I am here, in the name of God, to say that you may, and to tell you how.

I remark, in the first place, if you want to join your loved ones in glory, you must travel the same way they went. No sooner had the half-dead Egyptian been resuscitated than he pointed the way the captors and the captives had gone, and David and his men followed after. So our Christian friends have gone into another country, and if we want to reach their companionship we must take the same road. They repented; we must repent. They prayed; we must pray. They trusted in Christ; we must trust in Christ. They lived a religious life; we must live a religious life. They were in some things like ourselves. I know, now that they are gone, there is a halo around their names; but they had their faults. They were far from being perfect. So I suppose that when we have gone, some things in us that are now only tolerable may be almost resplendent. But as they were like us in deficiencies, we ought to be like them in taking a supernal Christ to make up for the deficits. Had it not been for Jesus, they would have all perished; but Christ confronted them, and said, "I am the way," and they took it.

I have also to say to you that the path that these captives trod was a troubled path, and that David and his men had to go over the same difficult way. Our friends have gone into glory, and it is through much tribulation that we are to enter into the kingdom. How our loved ones used to have to struggle! how their old hearts ached! how sometimes they had a tussle for bread! In our childhood we wondered why there were so many wrinkles on their faces. We did not know that what were called "crow's-feet" on their faces, were the marks of the black raven of trouble.

Off the big, unbidden tear,
Stealing down the furrowed cheek,
Told in eloquence sincere,
Tales of woe they could not speak.
But this scene of weeping o'er,
Past this scene of toil and pain,
They shall feel distress no more,
Never, never weep again.

"Who are these under the altar?" the question was asked; and the response came, "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Our friends went by a path of tears into glory. Be not surprised if we have to travel the same pathway.

I remark, again, if we want to win the society of our friends in heaven, we will not only have to travel a path of faith and a path of tribulation, but we will also have to positively battle for their companionship. David and his men never wanted sharp swords and invulnerable shields and thick breastplates so much as they wanted them on the day when they came down upon the Amalekites. If they had lost that battle, they never would have got their families back. I have to tell you that between us and coming into the companionship of our loved ones who are departed, there is an Austerlitz, there is a Gettysburg, there is a Waterloo. War with the world, war with the flesh, war with the devil. We have either to conquer us. Who are they on the bright hills of heaven yonder? There they are, those who sat at your own table, the chair now vacant. There they are, those whom you rocked in infancy in the cradle, or hushed to sleep in your arms. There they are, those in whose life your life was bound up. They are watching from those heights to see if through Christ you can take that fort, and whether you will rush in upon them—victors. They know that upon this battle depends whether you will ever join their society. Up! strike harder! Charge more bravely! Remember that every inch you gain puts you so much farther on toward that heavenly reunion.

You say that all this implies that our departed Christian friends are alive. Why, had you any idea they were dead? They have only moved. If you should go on the 2d of May to a house where one of your friends lived, and find him gone, you would not think that he was dead. You would inquire where he had moved to. Our departed friends have taken another house. The secret is that they are richer now than they once were, and can afford a better residence. They once drank out of earthenware; they now drink from the King's chalice. "Joseph is yet alive," and Jacob will go up and see him. Living? are they? Why, if a man can live in this damp, dark dungeon of earthly captivity, can he not live where he breathes the bracing atmosphere of the mountains of heaven? Oh, yes, they are living!

Do you think that Paul is so near dead now as he was when he was living in the Roman dungeon? Do you think that Frederick Robertson, of Brighton, is as near dead now as he was when, year after year, he slept seated on the floor, his head on the bottom of a chair, because he could find ease in no other position? Do you think that Robert Hall is as near dead now as when, on his couch, he tossed in physical tortures? No. Death gave them the few black drops that cured them. That is all death does to a Christian—cures him. I know that what I have said implies that they are living. There is no question about that. The only question, this morning, is whether you will ever join them.

But I must not forget those two hundred men who fainted by the brook Besor. I look over this audience this morning, and I find at least two hundred who have fainted by the brook Besor—the brook of tears. You feel as if you could not take another step farther, as though you could never look up again. But I am going to imitate David, and divide among you some glorious trophies. Here is a robe, "All things work together for good, to those who love God." Wrap yourself in that glorious promise. Here is for your neck a string of pearls, made out of crystalized tears, "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Here is a coronet, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." O ye fainting ones by the brook Besor, dip your blistered feet in the running stream of God's mercy. Bathe your brow at the wells of salvation. Soothe your wounds with the balsam that exudes from trees of life. God will not utterly cast you off, O broken-hearted man, O broken-hearted woman, fainting by the brook Besor. God will see you all the way through, O troubled soul, and when you come down to the Jordan of death, you will find it to be as thin a brook as Besor; for Dr. Robinson says that, in April, Besor dries up, and there is no brook at all.

May God Almighty, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, bring us into the companionship of our loved ones who have already entered the heavenly land, and into the presence of Christ whom, not having seen, we love, and so David shall recover all, "and as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

THE PASSOVER INSTITUTED.

S.S. Lesson for June 3, Ex. 12: 1-14. Golden Text, 1. Cor. 5: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," fills all time. He is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." He appears in the early pages of Genesis in the sacrifice of Abel; and he is the central figure in the last pages of our Bible, the book of Revelation. It is the "Lamb as it had been slain," who is in the midst of the throne, and who is the centre of Heaven's worship (Rev. 5: 6-14); it is the Lamb whose wrath is dreaded (Rev. 6: 17); those who have come out of great tribulation, stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, they "have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, and the marriage, for which the Bride has been preparing for so many ages, and which is the culminating point of this Christian dispensation is

"The Marriage of the Lamb."

The children of Israel were yet in Egypt. God had wrought great signs, and wonders, and visited Egypt with all his plagues. But his people were not yet delivered; they were still in the land of their hard and cruel masters. God had sent by Moses, a message of judgment upon Egypt, that he would slay all their firstborn, throughout the whole land; a message which Moses, at first shrunk from delivering. But at the same time he sent a word of deliverance to his own chosen people, and this was the message of the Lamb of God.

So great, so all important, in God's eyes was this institution of the Passover, that he would have his people date everything from this time. "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months; it shall be the first month of the year to you." If we have learned to know "the Lamb of God," which taketh away the sin of the world," that knowledge cuts us off from the past; we cannot, we will not, have to do with that, from which the blood of the Lamb of God has separated us. Our life has a new beginning, a new birth; we are born again, and our new birth through his blood shed and believed in, is the beginning of all things for us.

The message of the Lamb was individual, it was to "all the congregation of Israel;" they must "take to them every man a lamb, according to the house of their fathers, a lamb for a house." Only in the case of a family being too small, two neighboring families might share their lamb. It must be without blemish, it must be a male, it must be one year old; just fully grown. That was to be a night of death in Egypt, a night of judgment which would eclipse all the terrible judgments which had preceded it. Death was to reign in every house throughout all the land of Egypt. But for his own people God would provide a way.

Through Death, to Escape Death.

All the congregation of Israel must slay their lamb, and eat the flesh, before the fatal blow should fall upon the Egyptians, and then, the moment of their unparalleled consternation should be the moment of deliverance to the people of God. But before the flesh of the lamb was eaten, every head of a family must take the blood of his lamb, and "strike it on the two sideposts, and on the upper door post of the houses, wherein they shall eat it." It was the token that a death had taken place; and that the destroying angel had no mission there. It was a token that God could be justified in delivering a people who deserved death as the Egyptians deserved death. The slain lamb, with its sprinkled blood, was an appeal which Divine justice could admit, and it was no outrage to the holiness of God when the sheltered family within and the destroying angel without were separated by an impassable barrier; the blood of the slain lamb. "And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are; and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt."

How far do we understand and appreciate the Lamb of God? It was no virtue of the children of Israel which saved them from the sword of the destroying angel; the fact of their being God's chosen people was not that which wrought deliverance. Apart from the slain lamb, they were in the same danger and the same condemnation as the Egyptians; they too had lapsed into idolatry; and the reproach of Egypt was upon them. But "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world;" has voluntarily offered himself as our Representative, and "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53: 6); that he by the grace of God, should taste death for every man." (Heb. 2: 9.) Do we understand all we owe to the Lamb of God? how really he has died our death and borne our shame; but, also, how that very death cuts us off from our past shame and glory alike, so that to take him is the beginning of another life to us? The Lamb, to be anything to us, must be personally appropriated, but also must be for the household; "A Lamb for a house." When God brings one member of a family to know him, he has a heart for all the remaining members of that family. He would not save Noah without his family: "Come thou and all thy house into the ark" (Gen. 7: 1); Paul, in answer to the Philippian jailer's cry, said: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." (Acts 16: 31.) Is every member of our family under the shelter of the blood?

The children of Israel must also eat the flesh of the lamb, this was to be their food in circumstances altogether new, for which they must be prepared. "Eat it, with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand." (verse 11.) Are we ready at a moment's notice to turn our back upon our past and be led through a pilgrim life to "a city of habitation."

The lamb was not slain to save any Israelite who chose to remain in Egypt; God's people were spared to be delivered from Egypt. Our Lord Jesus Christ gave himself for our sins, from this present evil world (or age) according to the will of God and our Father: To whom be glory for ever and ever." If we are not delivered from the world, from its spirit, from its hopes, from its fears, from its opinions, from the "vain conversation (or manner of life) received by tradition from our fathers," (1. Pet. 1: 18) what has the blood of Christ, the slain Lamb, done for us? Are we not still in Egypt?

The children of Egypt must eat no leavened bread when they kept the passover, nothing which had a tendency to corrupt, no mixture of flesh and spirit in the worship offered to the Lamb. But the same precious blood which calls to us to be separate from the past is in itself the power which makes a new life possible; a life which has its source, not in ourselves, but in him who says: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Just in measure as we prize our redemption, and value the blood which bought us, just as we enter into, and understand what would be our danger and ruin, but for him who shed it,—we are brought to trust him only, but wholly, for the grace we need each moment of the day to walk in "newness of life."

and deliverance came. A cry of terror and despair arose from every house in Egypt, for "there was not a house where there was not one dead." Egypt knew where the blow came from, and by the royal command of Pharaoh the children of Israel went out of Egypt. Their slavery was at an end, their bonds were loosed; the Egyptians hastened their departure, and loaded them with anything they asked for, so that "they spoiled the Egyptians." When God's moment is come, he knows how to deliver. Until the lamb was slain, every Israelite was a slave, detained in Egypt by the power of the oppressors; now, not one of God's people was a slave. He led them out with a high hand. Understand the power of the blood of Christ, and doubts, and fears, and self-distrust vanish. Another has taken up your cause; his blood bears the past, His blood is the guarantee for the future. "They overcame him (Satan) by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto the death." (Rev. 12: 11.) If the blood of Christ shows us the truth about ourselves, there is no longer any possibility of our being discouraged; we are too low down in our own eyes to expect anything from ourselves.

AN ANCIENT EGYPTIAN HOUSE.

THE observance of the feast of the Passover marks the beginning of the national life of the Hebrews. From a family they were to become a nation, and this ceremony stood at the threshold of the nation's life, momentous and memorable. The dread night on which it was first celebrated was probably about a year and nine months after the call of Moses. To Pharaoh and his people it had been a period of dire disaster. He may in the beginning have refused to regard the calamities as anything more than natural phenomena, or the product of magic. But his magicians, who had duplicated the first two plagues, failed in their attempt to duplicate the third and told him that it was the work of God. Still later his officers and counsellors, appalled by the succession of evils, went to him and implored him to let the people go. "Knowest thou not yet," they said, "that Egypt is destroyed?" There was no doubt in their minds about the cause of the trouble, and they wished the king to yield, before other and worse evils befell the country. But still he remained irresolute and vacillating, promising under the pressure of calamity to let the people go, and breaking his promise when the pressure was removed. People often do that now, when in severe illness, or when some disaster seems to be impending, making vows to God which they break after they are relieved of their dread. After nine plagues had failed to bring submission and Pharaoh had threatened Moses with death if he came before him again with warnings and appeals, the approach of the tenth calamity was made known to Moses. This, he learned, was to end the long conflict. Pharaoh would yield and the Hebrews would be thrust out of the country eagerly and precipitately; the king and people caring not on what terms they went, so long as they went quickly. Here was a test of faith. They were to prepare for a sudden journey. If they believed Moses they would obey; if they trusted to appearances and experience they would think that the king would act as on former occasions and there would be no journey. There was another and most momentous test. Their houses were to be sprinkled with blood. Death would visit the houses of Egypt that night and seize the pride and hope of each family as its prey; but into any house with blood sprinkled hither he would not enter. There, was the plain and visible proof of faith. Any Israelite who thought the command unimportant, who doubted Moses in any way would not trouble himself with an act apparently so meaningless, yet really so vital. The scene on that night has had no parallels. The meal spread in each house identical in character; everyone eating as they stood, ready shod for the journey and at each door the sentinel of blood. Most minute were the instructions as to the preparation and consumption of this strange meal, and it was to be observed annually while they remained a nation. It is still observed by the Jews the world over, with modifications in some particulars.

The beginning of months. This was to be the great era of the nation, the beginning of the Jewish year. The Jewish civil year begins in October, but they still continue to reckon their ecclesiastical or religious year from the celebration of the Passover, which occurs at the same time as the Christian Easter. Thorwaldsen, the famous sculptor, was asked the time and place of his birth. "What matters either?" was his reply, "I arrived in Rome March 8, 1797," thus intimating that the beginning of his life as an artist, which was his real life, was of more moment than the beginning of his physical life. So an aged Christian left directions at his death, that when his tombstone was erected it should bear the words, "Here lies an old man seven years of age," implying that the time which had elapsed since he was converted, was the only part of his life worth considering.

The blood shall be for a token. Dr. Cuyler relates an old Jewish legend which as he says, may or may not be true, but is certainly not improbable. It states that on that fatal night, a young Jewish girl, the first-born of the family, knowing that her life depended on the command being obeyed, said to her father, "Are you sure that the blood has been sprinkled on the doorstep?" He replied that he had ordered it to be done. But the girl was uncomfortable and apprehensive. It meant so much to her young life. Finally, she could rest content no longer and went herself to see if the blood was there and lo! it was not there. The order of her father had been neglected and it was nearly midnight. The father made haste to sprinkle the blood and his child's life was saved.

All the firstborn. None in all Egypt suffered so much by the death of his firstborn, as did Pharaoh himself. If, as most Egyptologists believe, the Pharaoh was Menephtah, he was indebted to his son for his throne. From the Egyptian records, it appears that eight years after the great Ramesses died, a rebellion broke out in Egypt and Menephtah, his son and successor, fled with such of his army as remained faithful to him. He took refuge in Ethiopia and remained there twelve years. With him was his only son Seti-Menephtah, a boy six years old, the son of his father's old age. When this boy reached the age of eighteen, he put himself at the head of his father's royal followers and marched back to Egypt. He was successful in every engagement and his valor inspired the soldiers who had been disgusted by his father's cowardice. He subdued all Egypt and restored his father to his throne. He governed in conjunction with his father and the dread of his valor and genius was upon all the enemies of the government. Many pictures and sculptures of him beautifully executed have been found in Egypt and are now in the British Museum. He was evidently a young man of singular beauty and strength of character, with a profile strongly resembling that of Napoleon I. But there is this singular fact about him: None of the monuments represent him as becoming Pharaoh. It is always as a prince that he is depicted, with the insignia of that rank. The later sculptures of him end their list of his titles with the ominous sign signifying justified, or, as we should say, deceased. "The heir to the throne," one of the inscriptions runs, "the Royal Scribe, the Chief of Soldiers, the Great Royal Son, beloved, Seti-Menephtah, deceased." As this was cut by his father's order it is evident that the young man died before his father. There is no record of his death yet deciphered. Probably none is in existence, as the king would be reluctant to chronicle the facts, but the Bible tells us how it occurred. He was the victim of his father's obstinacy, for "at midnight, the Lord smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne," etc. (Ex. 12: 29). The expression, "that sat on his throne," exactly describes Seti-Menephtah's position, prince governing as a Pharaoh, while his father still had the rank and title. He was probably away from the capital at the time when the stroke fell upon him, but his father would have little doubt, as he saw the mourning families around him, that his beloved son, too, was dead. The blow was very bitter, as shown by the inscriptions caused to be cut on statues and monuments deploring his son and bewailing his loss.

EARTHQUAKE IN VENEZUELA.

A DISPATCH from our minister at Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, in South America, received on May 9, reports a most disastrous earthquake which occurred ten days before. There has been, according to his account, a terrible destruction of life and property. Complete devastation has befallen the four cities of Merida, Lagunillas, Chiguara and San Juan. Many villages also had been wrecked. The full details had not been learned at the time the dispatch was sent, but it was believed that the number of lives lost would exceed ten thousand. The cities mentioned are all in the State of Los Andes, in the north-west of the Republic. They are at the base of the spur of mountains called there the Sierra Nevada de Merida, which are a part of the eastern Andes. Merida is the largest of the four cities, and early in this century it was the largest in Venezuela, but in 1812 it was destroyed by an earthquake, and although it was rebuilt, it never recovered its former prosperity. The earthquake of that year did fearful damage in Caracas, the capital, where twelve thousand persons were buried in the ruins of the overthrown buildings. Last month was remarkable for seismic disturbances in widely separated parts of the world. Early in the month Japan was visited, and Tokio and Yokohama were severely shaken. Then came the shocks in Greece, extending over two weeks, with serious loss of life and property. Now comes the news from Venezuela. To those Christians who are looking for the coming of the Lord in the near future, the fact is full of significance, for "earthquakes in divers places" were to be a sign of the nearness of his advent. (Matt. 24: 7.)

Tenants in Peril.

The building inspectors in New York are in conflict with the occupants of an old house in Greenwich street. Their attention was called last week to the condition of the house and they at once pronounced it dangerous. The front wall, which is of brick, has bulged nearly ten inches out of the perpendicular and the rear wall which is of timber has been shored up. An examination showed also that the beams were decayed. An attempt had been made to anchor the front and rear walls together, but the anchors would not hold and they have slipped from their places. The building inspectors say that the movement of any heavy piece of furniture on an upper floor would cause the house to collapse. There are six families comprising thirty persons in the house and they were notified that the building was unsafe. They all, however, refused to leave. They said the house was no worse than it had been for several years and they believed it would not fall. Persuasion was useless, so the building inspectors have commenced legal proceedings for their eviction. In the meantime a policeman has been placed on guard, to call ambulances in the event of a collapse. It is seldom that people are so reckless of their physical safety, though similar recklessness about spiritual safety is all too common, although the consequences of disaster in that case are infinitely more serious. (Luke 12: 4, 5.)

Great Subterranean Rivers.

A remarkable discovery has been made by a sea-captain who is engaged in the Central American trade. He reports that in the Gulf of Mexico it is possible to obtain fresh water far out at sea. The report is confirmed by other captains, who say that two great streams of fresh water run at the bottom of the sea, one ten miles and the other twenty-five miles from the mouth of the Mississippi. They had formed the opinion that they boiled up from the ocean bed, but there is good reason to believe that they flow under Texas and are enormous subterranean rivers which have their source in the Rocky Mountains. That theory derives support from the fact that, between the mountains and the sea, many artesian wells have been driven, each of which has yielded an abundant supply of beautiful, clear, cold water. If it is really true that the rivers maintain their freshness so many miles out at sea, we can form some idea of the enormous momentum they must acquire on their long, dark journey from the mountains. At whatever point the force of that momentum is exhausted, there the waters of the rivers are absorbed by the water of the sea and become of its nature. So would it be with the lives of Christians, who are in the world but not of it, if the divine power which was in them at the beginning of their course were not renewed day by day, keeping them from the pollution which surrounds them. (John 17: 15.)

A Repentant Patient.

A strange incident has occurred in the Bicetre hospital in Paris. At a recent public fete, two Belgian workmen, who were warm friends, became intoxicated at a Paris cafe and quarrelled. The cause of the quarrel was trifling, but they were both violent tempered men and could not be pacified by their fellow-workmen who interfered. They left the cafe inflamed with their potations, and fought in an open space near by. One of them was severely beaten, and in his mad rage drew his knife and tried to kill his opponent. His blow was warded off, but it struck the side of the head and completely other. In his search he came to a place called Confederate Gulch, where he found two men who wanted to sell their claim. It had not yielded to their satisfaction, but gold in very small quantities had been found. They offered him the claim for four hundred dollars. He was disposed to purchase, but decided to take the opinion of a friend who was a mining expert. The friend tested the ground, examined the workings and reported unfavorably. The man therefore declined to purchase. He continued his search farther up the country but could not find any opening for his capital. As he turned toward his former home, he passed again through Confederate Gulch. He saw that there was some excitement there and going to the claim that had been offered him a few weeks before, he saw a mule team just setting out with a load of gold which had been taken out of the claim. Ten armed men were marching on each side the wagon which contained gold said to be worth more than twenty thousand dollars. How chagrined he must have felt as he reflected that he might have been the possessor of that gold if he had not relied on the expert opinion and rejected the offer of the mine! Infinitely more poignant sorrow will be felt at the last day by some who, when they were disposed at some solemn service to accept the offers of Christ and become his disciples, allowed friends to win them back to the world (II. Peter 3:17.)

Locating a Town.

The decision of the courts is awaited as to the position of a town known as Yuma. It stands near the boundaries of California and Arizona and there have been several disputes as to which of the two it be-severed the ear. Both men were taken to the hospital, where, when they became sober, they were ashamed and sorry for their quarrel. The one who had maimed his friend was especially grieved when he was told of the injury he had inflicted. He was but little hurt himself, and as he visited his friend, he again and again begged his forgiveness, and protested his sorrow for what he had done. The surgeon was present when he made these protestations. He asked the man if he was sincere, and was assured that he was. "Then," he said, "you would be glad to save him from disfigurement if you could?" The man said he would. The surgeon explained to him that it might be done if he would consent to give a piece of his flesh to replace the missing ear. It would be a painful operation, and it was optional with him whether he submitted to it. The man consented, and a piece of flesh the size of the ear was cut from his arm and attached to the wound. The surgeon gave it as his opinion that the flesh would unite and the patient would not be much disfigured. There can be no question now that his injurer was sincerely repentant since he voluntarily suffered to make such atonement as he could. It is such sincere repentance that Christ expects of those whom he saves. They must be ready to prove their sincerity by sacrifices painful as the loss of a right hand or a right eye, if they would enter into life. (Matt. 18: 9.)

A Mining Expert's Blunder.

In an obituary notice in a journal of Butte, Mont., is a story of a lost opportunity which the deceased used to relate with chagrin. It appears that he had been a gold miner in his younger days and had accumulated about a thousand dollars. His claim was worked out and he looked around for anno interest in life after she was dead: He grew gloomy and morose and, at last, became demented. He and his two motherless boys were taken to the almshouse, where he died about a year afterwards. The boys did not turn out well and, after staying in the institution about four years, the elder ran away, and soon afterwards his brother followed. No great search was made for them until a short time ago, when a letter arrived from Leipsic from an old lady who said they were her grandsons. Their father was her son. His letters to her had been few and at long intervals, so that when they ceased altogether it was some time before she became concerned about his silence. She did not know to whom to apply for information, and she has only recently learned of his death in the almshouse. She says she has considerable property, and if her grandsons will come to her, she will make them her heirs. But since they ran away all traces of them have been lost. Any man who sought them out and informed them of their good fortune, would be doing them a kindly service for which they would surely be very grateful. It is such a service, of infinitely greater value, that Christian workers are engaged in. They are taking the news of an eternal inheritance to wanderers from God whom he waits to welcome. (Hos. 14: 14.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Chicago Society for the Prevention of Crime have extended a call to Dr. Parkhurst to participate in the effort to suppress the crime in that city. It is the intention of the society to hold mass meetings in different parts of the city, at which Dr. Parkhurst is invited to speak.

The Presbyterian General Assembly which met at Saratoga, N. Y., last week will be asked to deal with a case similar to that of Professor Briggs. It is that of Prof. Henry P. Smith, of Cincinnati, which comes up from the Synod of Ohio on his appeal, and with it the questions of Old Testament criticism will recur.

The International Missionary Union will hold its eleventh annual meeting at Clifton Springs, N. Y., June 13th-20th.

In Fiji, which in 1835 was a heathen land, there is a circuit which has 16 ministers, 310 local preachers, and upward of 7,000 members, with 27,000 adherents. Of the ministers, all but one are natives.

Evangelist S. Hartwell Pratt has just closed a most successful series of meetings with the Immanuel church, Minneapolis, and is now holding special meeting with the First Church of that city, Dr. Wayland Hoyt, pastor.

During the Year 1893, Sixty-three new missionaries reached Shanghai, in connection with the China Inland Mission. There are others on the way, bringing the number dispatched since January 1, 1893, up to eighty-six, and at least one hundred young men evangelists are still needed.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's Services at Mobile, Ala., are attracting enormous audiences. On May 6th a service for young people was held in the Rink, at which over fifteen hundred were present. At this service two hundred and thirty-four solemnly pledged themselves to Christ. On the evening of the same day the Rink was again crowded by grown people, and Dr. Munhall preached a most impressive sermon. Two meetings are held each day.

The Receipts of the American Board for April were $54,813, a marked increase over April, '93, $38,282. The gain was, however, in legacies, which were $38,494, against $5,303 last April. The regular donations have fallen off from $29,320 to $24,842. The receipts for eight months have been $406,926 against $412,961 last year.

Gen. A. O. Howard, Speaking Recently of his life at West Point as a boy, said that his courage was never so severely tried in facing the enemy on a battlefield as it was in persevering in going to Sunday School and attending to his religious duties in the face of the sneers and taunts of his college mates. He added: "I gripped my Bible, shut my teeth hard, and went for my mother's sake."

There is now no Hope of the Safety of the Children's Missionary Ship, the "Robert W. Logan." She has not been heard of since she sailed from Ruk to Yokohama in Japan for repairs, more than three months ago. It is supposed that she foundered at sea. There were several severe typhoons shortly after leaving port, and probably one of them caused her to capsize. Happily, there were no missionaries aboard at the time.

Two Runaway Heirs.

Search is being made for two young men who, when boys, eight years ago, ran away from an almshouse in New Jersey. Their parents came to this country from Germany in 1876, and settled in Jersey City. The boys were then respectively one and three years old. The family made no friends, and no one seemed to know anything of their antecedents. They were poor, but the man was industrious, and by hard work managed to maintain his family. In 1879, his wife died and the man grieved intensely over his loss. He had loved her deeply in his dull, silent way, and he took

DELIVERANCE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning June 3.
John 8: 31-36.

NOT all are so ignorant of themselves as the Jews who, when Christ promised them freedom, answered, "We were never in bondage." In our better moments we know we are not always free. The rule of the spirit over human nature is feeble and irresolute. Some power forces us to do the things we had resolved not to do, and prevents our doing the things we had decided on doing. That power takes many forms; but it is the same power, and from it we need deliverance. It is the supreme need of our nature. A great philosopher has said, "If some great power would agree to make me always think what is true, and do what is right, on condition of being turned into a sort of a clock and wound up every morning, I should close with the offer." He was conscious that free, sentient power, involving responsibility, had been so utter a failure that right thinking and acting would be cheaply purchased by surrendering the power and accepting mechanical operation in its stead. The declaration was a humiliating confession. It implied the misuse or the non-use of power inherent in human nature. It was as though a man who owned a garden complained that it was full of weeds and wished himself a self-operating hoe that they might be rooted up. But he only voiced a common consciousness. Who is there, that waking in the morning and reviewing the events of the preceding day and his conduct in them, does not see that here and there he fell short of his ideal? With power over his thoughts, words and actions, they have not been what he wished and intended them to be. He has not been free. As the steel is drawn by the magnet so his nature has been drawn by evil. We may accept that situation as a settled fact confirmed by experience. Going one step farther we make the discovery that we cannot make ourselves impervious to this influence—we cannot deliver ourselves, but must be delivered, if we are to be delivered at all, by some power outside of us. This power exists and is at our disposal. Christ said, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." There was only one condition to this promise and that was the becoming his disciples and continuing in his word. The process is not very clear, though, doubtless, he saw it clearly. But the assurance is sufficient for us. Dropping all curiosity as to the means which may be, and probably are, miraculous, we have the solid fact that if we become Christ's disciples we shall be emancipated. It all depends then on being Christ's disciples and we have to find out what that means. Happily there is no difficulty in doing so. The directions are few and explicit. His disciples were called on to deny themselves and take up the cross; to love him so well that they were prepared to leave all to follow him; his word was their law of thought and conduct. That is the way to emancipation.

THE B. Y. P. U. IN GEORGIA.

At the recent convention of the Baptist Churches of Georgia, held at Macon, the subject of the Baptist Young People's Union was thoroughly considered and discussed. As Georgia is one of the strongest Southern States in the Baptist denomination, any action on the part of this convention was looked for as of deep significance to the future of the movement. "The Baptist Union" gives the full text of the resolutions passed by the Convention. The ministers appear to have thought a State convention or organization of the young people's societies premature and to have recommended waiting until the societies in connection with the individual churches were more generally organized. With all this conservative feeling and with the particularly cautious expression of the opinion that "There is danger in a great movement like this," the convention gave the movement "cordial recognition and hearty encouragement." It then went on to say: "It is not wise to refuse the help of a great movement of wonderful power because there is possible danger. We must take hold of it and give it right conditions and wise management. The organization of our young people for training is earnestly recommended under the following conditions: All Unions shall be strictly Baptist, not interdenominational. They shall be in and under the control of the local churches. All contributions of the Unions shall be through the local churches to the boards fostered by the churches. All matters of detail and of affiliations shall be left where they belong, with the local churches in which the Unions exist."

TWO DEVOTED KING'S DAUGHTERS.

Among the reports sent to the headquarters of the Order of King's Daughters and published in the "Silver Cross," are two from circles which may serve as specimens of thousands which are affiliated in this noble and Christ-like order. One of these is the Golden Rule Circle, of Allegheny, Pa. The President of the Circle is Mrs. J. M. Porter, whose portrait appears on this page. The Circle is now seven years old, having been organized in April, 1887. It was a small Circle at first, and contemplated chiefly spiritual work and mutual edification; but it speedily realized the value of the opportunities of usefulness within its reach, and its duty in regard to them. One of its members, Mrs. T. M. Morrow, had long been active in philanthropic work, and was in the habit of visiting the patients in the hospitals. Through association with her, one and another of her sister King's Daughters became interested in the same sphere of labor, until the whole Circle was engaged in the work. In the homes of the poor and in the three hospitals of the city, the visits of the King's Daughters are now events eagerly expected and joyfully welcomed. The kindly word, the sympathetic smile, the little bouquet of fragrant flowers, and in cases of need, more substantial help, have helped lift many a burden; while the sad and sorrowing have been pointed to the great Burden-Bearer in whose name his followers do their loving deeds. There are now thirty-two members of the Circle, all of whom are actively engaged in this beneficent occupation. They have recently furnished a room in the West Pennsylvania Hospital, at a cost of two hundred dollars, and have given time, labor and money freely in other ways in the Lord's service.

Another typical Circle is that at Hempstead, L. I., which calls itself the Charity Circle. It was organized in 1887, chiefly through the joint efforts of Mrs. Frances Payson and Miss Harriet Mulford, who have toiled unceasingly in developing the efficiency and directing the work of the Circle. Since Mrs. Payson left the town, Miss Mulford has continued the leadership alone and has been President for four years. Her portrait appears on this page. The members of the Circle belong to various denominations, for all Christians can work for the needy, in his name, but the majority are connected with St. George's Church. The late rector, the Rev. W. H. Moore, D.D., took a deep interest in the Circle, and gave its work the help of his counsel and co-operation. As in many other localities, the need of clothing and food has for many months past been the most urgent necessity at Hempstead, and the Charity Circle, true to its name and principles, has made strenuous exertions to relieve the distressed people. Subscriptions to the amount of $500 have been raised, materials purchased, garments made and provisions secured by these consecrated workers. In Hempstead, as in other cities and towns, the people who are outside the Christian Church have learned by actual experience, more than in any previous time of suffering, that Christ's people are moved by his principles and are living in his spirit.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN INDIA.

At the recent Central Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, held at Allahabad, the Epworth League was regularly organized. The Committee appointed to consider the step reported that: "We regard the Epworth League as admirably adapted to the needs and requirements of our rapidly extending work in this empire, and believe it to have great possibilities of usefulness to the young people of our Church. We urge on our presiding elders and pastors to utilize to the fullest extent the great advantages which the League offers; and by thorough organization, judicious administration, and earnest prayerful effort to make it a moral power throughout all our borders. To secure the largest possible measure of uniformity and most efficiently further the important objects of the League in India and Malaysia, we recommend that at this session a Central Conference Epworth League be organized." This was done and a full set of officers was elected, with Rev. E. W. Parker as President. A ringing address is made to Epworthians in the "Indian Witness," by Rev. H. A. Crane. He urges the vigorous prosecution of the movement by means of conventions. "In connection with our Central, Annual and District Conferences let us have Epworth League Anniversaries. And besides these let us have in every district an annual or semi-annual gathering in which we can come together for discussion of methods as well as for needed fellowship and inspiration. And secondly, let us get into closest touch with the Epworth League at home by regular enrollment." Mr. Crane also advises organizing as far as possible on the same lines and with the same constitution as in the United States, and sagely observes: "The model constitution recommended by the Board of Control, while not in all points obligatory is the product of the large experience of many successful workers among young people. It has been found admirably adapted to the work of the League all over the United States, in China, Japan, India, Bulgaria, Italy and Germany, and is not likely to be improved by the tinkering of novices."

The League at Rangoon, has a Sunday School at the soldiers' barracks which has been carried on faithfully during the year, the League furnishing the picture lesson papers. The Christian workers' department has also given considerable help in the services at the coffee rooms and on the river. All meetings of the League are well attended and considerable interest is felt in the work.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavorers of Memphis, Mo., have organized a mission Sunday school in the railway station.

Epworth leagues are being organized in nearly all of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal church in Italy.

At Xenia, O., ten converts were recently received into the Baptist Church who ascribed their conversion to God's blessing on the meetings of the Baptist Young People's Union.

Dr. L. A. Crandall, pastor of Memorial Church, Chicago, has been elected a member of the Executive Committee of B. Y. P. U. A., in place of Dr. Hulbert who resigned and is now in Europe.

The Golden Rule reports a Christian Endeavor union in Wales,—the Swansea Union, that already has enrolled 24 societies, with 1,100 members. This union was not in existence four months ago.

At the recent State Convention of the King's Daughters of Maryland, held in the Mt. Vernon M. E. Church of Baltimore, 210 delegates were present and forty-two circles were officially represented.

The Loving Service Circle of King's Daughters, of Baltimore, Md., connected with the Reformed Church, numbers fifty-three members, and has one member as a missionary in Japan, to whose support the home members contribute.

At a recent conference of the Madras Young Men's Christian Association it was proposed that daily at noon, when the gun fires, each member, wherever he may be, should pause for at least one minute and lift his heart in prayer to God for blessing on the Association.

Epworth Leagues everywhere will be glad to know that Messrs. Hunt & Eaton have published a series of responsive services, intended for testimony, exhortation, confession, and general use, with a special service for the installation of officers and a form of reception of members into the league.

Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston, Mass., has assigned to his company of the Baptist Boys' Brigade a part in the morning service. The boys occupy the front seats and sing one of the hymns. This not only tends to interest them in the church, but interests the church in them and their organization.

The Young Men's Christian Association in the Island of Malta has been holding its first anniversary, the reports at which were very encouraging. One hundred and seventy-three members had joined since formation, but as the members chiefly belong to the garrison, frequent changes reduced the average to eighty-three.

A Baptist Church has grown out of an effort made by the B. Y. P. U., of Omaha, Neb., to establish a Sunday School in a neglected quarter of the city. The Sunday School was organized, and its teachers, all of whom were members of the B. Y. P. U., persevered in its support. Then preaching services were held in the School, and now a regular church has been formed and duly recognized.

From an active member of a Christian Endeavor Society in Japan comes the following report: "Our work is increasing day by day. At first our fellow-Christians felt that we are those who like curiosities, and founded this society simply to imitate the foreign society without any good, firm reasons. But they have seen our work in Sunday School, prayer meetings, social meetings and work for the poor, and cannot help believing that we are in earnest."

From Nain to Jezreel.

Mud-Cabins and Ruins—A Child's Funeral—Camping on Esdraelion—The Traditional House of Elisha.

HE leaves of our Bible turn heavily, being damp with coming rain, as, guided by the 'Biblical Gazetteer' at the back, we look up Luke 7: 11-15, and read that on the day succeeding the healing of the centurion's servant, Our Lord "went into a city called Nain, and many of his disciples went with him and much people."

"Now when he came nigh unto the gate of the city, behold there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother and she was a widow, and much people of the city was with her."

"Where is the city?" we interrupt the reading to inquire. David points to a cluster of wretched huts, walled with clay and roofed with straw plastered over with mud. "A Moslem village!" we pronounce decidedly, as the scent of low-hanging smoke from hovel-fires is brought down by the moist wind.

Two kinds of fuel are in general use in such hamlets, chaff, and cakes of dried camel's manure, the latter predominating in regions where the ungainly "ship of the desert" is brought into the service of man. One of the most important branches of woman's labor in these circumstances is collecting the manure, moulding it into flat cakes, and spreading it to dry upon stones, walls, and house-tops. I have seen roofs literally tiled with the malodorous combustible, and whole rods of stone-wall caked with it.

We smell chaff now, and prefer it. "Did I tell you," remarks Alcides, reining back Massoud into a conversational walk, "what the Rev. Mr. Jamal, the Nazareth pastor, said of chaff fires? In the village ovens they never go out, day or night, but smoulder and smoke continually. He says that is the meaning of the 'unquenchable fire,' into which the chaff is to be cast—the fire that is not allowed to go out."

"Quite so, sir!" This from David, who is within ear-shot. "Matthew third chapter and twelfth verse. Likewise Luke, the third chapter and seventeenth verse. They are the words of John the Baptist. The end of chaff in this country is to be burned. I do not know what the poorer people would do without it."

We are gazing at the knot of poor cabins that look as if a sweeping rain might wash them down into the plain some winter night, and marvelling that no sign of a walled town remains, by the gate of which the funeral train may have emerged on their way to the rocky tombs we are told lie further down, and not so remote from the old Nazareth road as the ruins of the city—when something moves quickly across the lower plain directly within our field of vision. Four men hold aloft a misshapen burden, and half a-dozen others keep pace with them in the long lope swifter than a slow run would be.

Serkeese grunts and says something we judge to be contemptuous.

David translates:

"He says 'they have done up the dead man to look like our luncheon tent'—and the boy is right."

The luncheon-tent being swung across the very mule the "boy" bestrides at this moment, we can testify to the truth of the criticism. It is, nevertheless, a human body which the "fellaheen," (Svrian peasants) are carrying to the most desolate tract of a territory unrelieved by tree or shrub for many acres. Turning our horses in the direction they have taken, we come up with them as they deposit the figure, swathed in course matting, upon the naked earth, and begin with rude mattocks to make a hole among the stones—I cannot call the business "grave-digging." There are no mounds in what we now perceive is a cemetery, but ovals of round stones are set thickly all over the place, each designating a grave, and at long intervals we descry a low, upright block of granite, unlettered. The man who directs the gruesome task, answers readily and civilly the few questions put through the interpreter.

"It is a child who has died. A boy of eight. He has escaped much trouble. He is better off here than living. Allah is good!"

Other figures appear from behind the shoulders of the bleak hills, women, bare-legged, but shrouded as to heads and faces, in the dark-blue cotton mantles that uniform matrons and girls of the lower classes. They walk well and fleetly, and, approaching the grave-makers, without evincing the slightest curiosity at sight of us, seat themselves upon the ground about the motionless bundle and begin to sob in a subdued key, breaking finally into a chant, without beginning, middle, end, or the remotest suggestion of musical idea. The men pay no attention whatever to the performance. We characterize it silently as "the people making a noise," very much the same, doubtless as was kept up by the "much people of the city," winding down from the Nain which is no more, when the Master's hand fell upon the bier and those that bare it stood still. One woman, as we note, neither sobs nor chants but, her muffled face bowed upon her knees, sits at the head of the dead boy, motionless, as if as deaf as himself to all that passes.

David explains aside that the women of the neighborhood take advantage of each funeral to visit the graves of their own relatives, and shows us other, and smaller groups, now arriving and scattered over the face of the hill. All crouch upon the earth soaked by yesterday's rain, and the humid air makes the dissonant croon of each family, "mourning by itself apart," audible to all the rest. Almost under Massoud's forefeet, one woman has thrown herself face downward beside a long, egg-shaped round of stones, and cries out over and over, the same form of words to the newly-turned earth. David hearkens attentively, and interprets, line by line, in his grave undertone. Over against this translation, Alcides—having what he chooses to call, "a fatal facility for rhyme"—pencils a metrical version almost as literal:

I arose and came to the grave, at the breaking of day,
To the grave on the barren hillside where Abou, my husband, lay;
I called on him by his name, but no answer came again;
Once more I repeated the cry, but repeated it in vain.
No dear voice answered my cry, from the rough, forbidding stones.
He sleeps too deep beneath the earth to hark the widow's moans,
Who will help his children now, since my calls are all unheard?
O, form in the grave there, among the rocks! answer a single word!

The workmen step out of the shallow hole they have scooped, and lay the mattocks aside. Another relay cover the bottom of the pit with stones, and lay the uncoffined body upon them. Earth is thrown in until it is nearly level with the surface, and a second layer of larger stones to hinder the depredations of jackals and hyænas; more earth, which is beaten hard, and the ring of great pebbles defines the last home of the little fellow who "has escaped much trouble."

We were surprised, but not shocked, to learn that our informant—the dignified man in a brown-and-white "abieh" and gray beard—is the father of the dead boy. While the grave is filling, an aged man, whom we take to be a priest, sits near by upon a grave-stone and mutters fast some form of prayer, his hands extended, palms outward. Four old men respond, when he pauses for breath, their hands outspread in like manner.

Now that all is over, the priest rises, and approaching the father, kisses him solemnly upon both cheeks, an example imitated by all the men present. The mother has not stirred, nor has any one spoken to her that we have been able to see, when we ride away and resume our journey.

The funeral must have drawn to a centre all the population of the surrounding country, for during the next two hours, we pass no human being except a swarthy well-built "fellaheen" who is sowing grain in a field lately scratched over by the wooden plough used by the so-named husbandmen of Palestine. He has made a "lap" of his outer garment, and it is full of grain. There is promise of an abundance of rain to settle the furrows, and he may be that phenomenon in this old land—a "forehanded" man.

Tabor lifts a gently rounded crest upon our left, and the wide plain passed an hour ago was the field in which Barak and Deborah overcame Sisera. Whenever we rise out of the occasional "dips" in the road, which is nothing but a bridle-path—we look for and find the snowy brow of Mount Hermon upon the horizon.

TRADITIONAL HOUSE OF ELISHA AT SHUNEM.

"Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion, and the Amorites call it Shener," writes the author of Deuteronomy, parenthetically.

At Shunem we pause to get a picture that we do not, for a moment, attempt to believe is the house of Elisha, and to arrange to our satisfaction in which of the no longer fertile fields the boy, now grown to be a lad, was "making believe" help the reapers when the fierce sun struck the young head.

"Did you ever think?"—one muses aloud—"what a risk the poor mother ran in venturing out in the terrible midday heat that had killed her child? And in excitement and haste that were in themselves dangerous?"

There is no immediate response, but we know that the thoughts of all are with the solitary figure crouched together at the head of the flat, nameless grave in sight of the hill on which once stood Nain, and that each ponders upon the mother-love which is one and the same to-day with that which cast the Shunammite woman, bitter of soul and speechless, at the prophet's feet.

Our luncheon-tent is pitched within the ancient bounds of Naboth's vineyard. The threatening rain-clouds, after a spiteful shower, have rolled by to mass themselves beyond Hermon and the hill Mizar. The sun shines kindly upon a spot which no man in his senses would covet at this day. Earlier comers have pre-empted the ground about the well that may have been here and used to irrigate the vines when Ahab went down to survey the blood-bought plot, and met Elijah face to face.

One of my pet abominations, a camel, an uncommon ugly specimen at that, erects his head against the pale sky. His master, his master's wife and his master's child, and the family donkey are enjoying their "noon-ing." The human creatures stare stupidly at us; the donkey is stolidly indifferent to our vicinity; the camel is supercilious. Hardy grasses push their way between the stones of every form and size that cumber the soil, and rank weeds fringe a lazy pool where a woman sits upon her heels, alternately beating wet clothes against the rocks, and going through the form of rubbing them between her fists while she gazes over her shoulder at the "foreign animals" feeding in their tent.

The Plain of Esdraelion stretches beyond to the foot of the mountains; the gleam of standing water gives back the sunlight at a dozen different points; copes of scrub trees diversify the level growth. It is not a barren outlook; neither is it attractive.

"A garden of herbs!" reads Alcides from "the best Baedeker for Palestine." "That didn't mean parsley, summer-savory, thyme, sweet marjoram, or even rosemary-and-rue, I take it,—hey, David?"

"I have often reflected upon that, sir, and in my humble judgment, King Ahab had a fancy for ornamental flower-gardens—terraces and the like—that could have been well contrived here. He was a spoiled child—was King Ahab—and his wife kept him spoiled—and a child—for reasons of her own. What are we to think of a man of years, and the king of a great nation, who takes to his bed and will not eat his dinner because he cannot get a bit of land he has set his heart upon? There was something evil at work besides his own folly. And when the evil outside of a man is a woman—!"

He shakes the crumbs vigorously from the table-cloth at the tent door with the gesture of one aware of the impotency of speech.

The vineyard was close under the walls of Ahab's palace or "house" as he called it in bargaining with Naboth. There is as little vestige of one as the other now. From out of the shelter of the tent, as we lie luxuriously upon our rugs, we gaze up at all that is left of Jezreel—a ruined watch-tower. From that height the watchman spied the armed company approaching and recognized the foremost as Jehu the son of Nimshi, "for he driveth furiously."

"The marginal reading has it 'in madness,'" interpolates Alcides. "Hark!"

The thunder of racing hoofs is in the air; across the base of the hill rushes a drove of half-wild horses bred upon the Plain of Esdraelion; leaping tall boulders and broad pools; tearing up the slope within pistol range of us, wheeling, as at a spoken order, and dashing off, until lost in the scrub.

We laugh, consciously, before confessing that for an instant we had seen, as by a flash, the mad driving of the rude usurper, the intrepid old queen, her eyes defiant between the painted lids, the tiara upon her wrinkled forehead, looking from her high window to fling her last taunt, barbed with a threat, at the soldier of fortune in her court-yard.

Alcides looks at a cur who is nosing about in the grass for scraps, and shudders. "I don't fancy the breed—here!"

The text he has in mind is upon the open page before our eyes:

"In the portion of Jezreel, shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel."

Oriental Fountains.

The Famous Spring and Temple of Ain Abou-Nabout, at Jaffa.

WHEREVER one goes in the East he meets with evidence on every hand of a beautiful reverence that is paid to the aged. Whether he travel among Christians or Moslems, it is the same; the high respect in which all Orientals hold their aged relatives is found everywhere. To the devout dead, who have left behind them an honored name, there is paid the tribute of a reverence that almost amounts to worship. This is especially the case among the Mohammedans, who find in the memory of their ancestors who have been orthodox in the religion of the Prophet, a provocation to deeds of charity and to the rearing of monuments, fountains and other structures that stand as testimonies of their esteem for those who have gone.

Among the Moslems are a class of devotees, called "Wilies," who are credited with the possession of supernatural powers, by which they miraculously cure the sick by touching them only. They are believed to be the appointed mediators between the prophet, Mohammed, and his adherents on earth. Abou-Nabout, one of the greatest of these "Wilies," lived, died and was buried at Jaffa, many generations ago. The Jaffa Moslems built him a splendid tomb, which serves also as a place of worship. Attached to it is a fountain named in honor of the saint—Abou-Nabout—signifying "father of the great staff," a name denoting that the bearer was a warrior of prowess, and noted also for his administrative capacity. All who drink there are asked to remember the devotion of him after whom the fountain is named. Such fountains, at the graves of the Mohammedan great, are called "Sabeel," or "a place where for the great one's sake, water can be had freely and abundantly." Anyone who approaches is expected to repeat the Mohammedan creed, and implore God's mercy upon the soul of the deceased.

The tomb of Nabout, which is shown in our illustration, is open during the daytime for purposes of public worship. Such tombs serve also the rather incongruous purpose of a depository for merchandise, and if some one in the neighborhood has anything which he believes to be unsafe at home, he places it within the tomb. The Moslems believe that if a thief breaks into these places, the spirit of the dead one may rise and kill him; therefore robbers rarely dare to break into tombs. A worshipper may go in and see here a heap of apples, there a sack of figs, and yonder a large quantity of pomegranates, but he will not touch them.

Beside the tomb of Abou-Nabout are two graceful poplar trees, and to the right are others of a wilder variety, forming quite a bush. At one corner stands a mukari (mule or camel-driver) who probably came ahead of his caravan to see if there was room at the fountain for watering his animals, as he expects every minute his camels to come and drink. Near the mukari is a young man, probably a native of Jaffa, whose donkey has come to the fountain to drink. The whole picture is one that is essentially characteristic of everyday traveling experience in Syria.

Happy Dispositions.

A woman with a happy disposition is far more to a man as a wife than the woman with a great fortune, for riches take wings. Worldly prosperity has a way of altering, and if once money vanishes the gloomy individual does naught but sit down and is out of office, generally puts before him five to ten per cent. of the letters received daily. The rest are answered by her or her brothers, Henry and Herbert, when at home. Mrs. Drew also lays before her father such few books as she thinks will interest him and not take much time. Many an author owes to the early favorable notice from Mr. Gladstone's pen the popularity which he has obtained in later life.

Playing Dog.

Our youngster used to insist on our dropping the pen, and playing dog, writes Dr. Talmage. It seemed to be her model idea of sport. All that she demanded was that we get down on our hands and knees and advance rapidly, with a bark not natural to our human species. It being a moderate demand, we undertook to gratify it, and succeeded as well as could be expected.

We thought at the time how many are engaged unwittingly in this game of playing dog. They are so many men after each other in all occupations and professions, with sharp teeth and threatening bark, that it seems as if all the spite and enmity of men were being unkenneled; merchants after merchants; clergymen after clergymen; doctors after doctors; politicians after politicians. They are doing what our little girl demanded of us. They are "playing dog." They bite and devour each other. They get on the track, and run down their game. Sometimes it is the great mastiff after the small rat-terrier. Then it is little poodles after great Newfoundland. If men want to go a-hunting, why do they not go after that which ought to be hunted?

THE KING COMETH.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

I KNOW my Lord will come again, I know
The sky will kindle with supernal glow,
From east to west burn through our fading night,
With far-swept splendor of celestial light.

I know his feet upon the cloud shall rest,
With gold of heaven engirt his kingly breast,
His face shall shine refulgent as the sun,
Haloed with diadems his valor won.

I know the splendor of his eyes shall trace
The record of each life in every face.
Great King transcendent on the judgment throne,
Just with his foes, and tender with his own!

I know with lifted hands and bended knee,
I shall adore him whom my eyes shall see,
As the worn wanderer of Galilee,
Yea, as the man of tears who died for me.

—HARRIET WARNER REQUA.

THE HABIT OF OBSERVATION.

THE habit of observation may or may not enrich a soul; it depends upon the original gift of receptivity and the power of quick and wise selection. What shall seeing avail if we always see the wrong thing and always take from it a pessimistic impression? We are apt to find what we most diligently look for, and if we set out with a theory in hand the whole universe will seem built to nourish and coddle it. But the eye that is disengaged and has no theory as to the source of its light, finds wherever it turns, the precious well-springs of original, unbiased and unconditional inspiration. Science has taught us the value of the fact distinct from its connection with theory; a myriad facts suddenly coalesce and form a discovery; and it is with the imagination as with prosaic understanding; all things tend from the simple to the complex, so that what we come to at last is always a combination of simples. The poet who is nearest to nature at this moment, says "The Chautauquan," is most like the poets of twenty-five centuries ago who was weep, having no word of encouragement for the husband, on whom the blow falls most heavily. The happy-dispositioned wife will see a way out of the difficulty, or will accept matters as they are in a sweet spirit of cheerfulness that endows her husband with new zeal, and causes him to look upon her as the guiding star of his existence. If God has not given you such a disposition, cultivate it as far as possible. It does no good to brood over troubles. It doesn't help matters out a bit. Be on the lookout for bright rays, and you will certainly find them.

Mr. Gladstone's Daughter.

Mr. Gladstone has a great objection to signing autograph albums which come to him frequently. These applications are controlled and held in check by his second daughter, Mrs. Drew. At Hawarden Castle there arrive every morning by post an average of a hundred letters, many of them from abroad. Mrs. Drew, when her father

There are all the foxes of human deceit, and the roaring lions of infernal cruelty and hate that ought to be pursued. Whistle up all your dogs for this chase. Keep them in the leash till the right moment comes, and then, with clap of hand, and stamp of foot, and halloo of voice, set them on the black brood of death. When there are so many horned and hooved and tusked enemies of God and man to be overtaken and brought to grief, there is not much use in social life that men should spend their time "playing dog."

Sowing the Seed.

Not a word we say falls fruitless,
Not a deed we do decays:
Every thought and word and action
Will be found in future days.

Grant then, Lord of all the harvest,
That the seeds we daily sow
May refresh the hearts of others, Spreading blessings as they grow.

then very close to nature; for although there is no monotony in life, there is in it the fine, inextinguishable oneness of truth by which every change is referable to unchangeable law. Whenever we lay our ear to Nature's breast we hear back to the first throb that ever beat there.

Kingsley's Tender Heart.

As everybody knows, Charles Kingsley loved well "both man and bird and beast." This feature in his character was curiously displayed one Sunday in church. He was just about to enter the pulpit to preach his sermon, when all of a sudden he disappeared from the view of the congregation. What was amiss? It was soon seen, however, that nothing serious had happened. He had only stooped in search of something on the floor, which, when found, he had taken to the vestry. And what was that something? An injured butterfly which was fluttering about. Being unable to fly away, owing to its hurt, Kingsley was afraid it might be trodden on, and so he interrupted the service of the church until he had removed the insect out of harm's way.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

C. M. Hixon, Weiser, Idaho. 1. Can we, and ought we to forgive an enemy before he repents? 2. Does God forgive us before we repent?

1. The injunction to love our enemies implies forgiveness before repentance. Kindness and magnanimity frequently induce repentance more quickly and surely than any other method. Christ's prayer for his murderers is an example for us. The stipulation as to repentance before forgiveness in Luke 17: 3, 4 appears to refer primarily to church discipline when an offending member of a church should not be forgiven until he has repented. 2. God as a righteous Judge requires repentance, but he loves us while we are yet sinners, while hating our sin. It is his love which most frequently induces repentance. It is certain that unless we are sorry for our sins and forsake them, we shall not be forgiven. But this comes when we exercise faith in Christ, and God gives the grace of repentance. Frequently faith precedes repentance and leads to it.

Subscriber, Brownsville, Tex. Can we be Christians and sinners at the same time? Ought any one to join a church so long as he sometimes commits sin? If any one commits sin does not that prove that he is not a Christian?

Christians are not and do not profess to be perfect. They give themselves to Christ to be sanctified and purified and made holy. The process is often a slow one, but the trend should always be upward, and will be so in proportion to the degree in which the man yields himself to the Spirit's influence. The Christian falling into sin goes to Christ in deep sorrow, feeling himself unworthy to bear his name, hating his sin and pleading for forgiveness and more power to resist temptation. So there is this difference between two men who commit the same sin: One is unconcerned and has no remorse about it, so long as he escapes punishment; but the other grieves over it and strives against a repetition of it. In the latter case, the man may be a Christian while yet a sinner.

Truthseeker. 1. Should a minister preach what he does not practise? 2. What does Paul mean by saying he was all things to all men 1 Cor. 9: 22?

1. He should preach the truth as he sees it, and as the Holy Spirit reveals it to him. If his conduct is inconsistent with his preaching the power of his ministry will be impaired. He is nevertheless bound to preach the truth and is not relieved of that duty by any consciousness he may have that his conduct is not up to the standard he raises. A minister's conduct, like the conduct of his hearers, is not likely to be equal to his ideal. If he is not striving to attain his ideal he is better out of the pulpit; but he is quite right in preaching a standard that he is striving to attain even if he has not attained it. 2. Merely that he adapted himself to the condition and modes of thought of the people he addressed. When speaking to the Jews he talked of the law and the types as a Jew would, showing how Jesus fulfilled them. When he spoke to the Athenians on Mars' Hill, he spoke as a Greek scholar quoting their poets.

G. Hyllton, Elmwood, Neb. What, in brief, are the doctrines of the Universalists?

There are diversities of belief among them, but we believe all agree that all men will be saved in the end. Dr. Ballou, who lived at the beginning of this century, believed that all sin was punished in this life and there was no punishment after death. Many Universalists became his adherents; but the majority hold that there is punishment beyond the grave for all who die impenitent. That punishment, however, they think, is not eternal, but continues until the subject of it is reformed and is ready to obey God and love him. He is ultimately received into heaven, and in the end sin is utterly destroyed, and in all God's universe there is nothing offensive in his sight. There have been Universalists ever since the Christian era, and in modern times some eminent members of the Protestant Episcopal Church have held the doctrines of Universalism, while not uniting themselves with the Universalist Church. Frederick W. Robertson was, and Canon Farrar is, among the best known of these. The theologians of the Presbyterian and other evangelical churches continue, as a rule, to hold and preach the doctrine of eternal punishment.

HOW SWEET 'Twill BE.

HOW sweet 'twill be at even,
 When all our work is done,
 To view the rolling splendor
 Of life's descending sun,
 And think that on that morning
 Which soon shall greet our eyes,
 No storm-clouds of affliction,
 Or sorrow e'er shall rise.
 How sweet 'twill be in Zion—
 With no more to endure—
 To know that all our trials
 But served to make us pure:
 Just as the gold and silver,
 Their value to display,
 Must first go through the furnace
 To melt the dross away.
 How sweet 'twill be in heaven,
 Where endless morn appears.
 To meet our friends and know them—
 The lost of other years.
 And with them and the angels,
 Whose songs eternal rise,
 Sit at the marriage supper—
 The banquet of the skies.

UNEXPRESSED.

UNEXPRESSED! the word of kindness
 Which we might have said;
 But we, in our human blindness,
 Let it fall back—dead!
 And the heart which yearned for friendship,
 Pined and starved to death;
 When we might have satisfied it,
 Almost with a breath.
 Unexpressed, the word of anger,
 Which I almost said;
 But I closed my lips upon it—
 Let it fall back—dead!
 And the heart it would have wounded,
 Did not feel the pain;
 And our lives flowed on together,
 Peacefully again.
 Unexpressed! life's deepest feelings,
 For the lack of speech;
 Beauteous thoughts by God implanted,
 Which we never reach:
 But beyond the shining river
 In the land of rest,
 We shall speak our thoughts forever—
 Nothing unexpressed.

JEWISH RESTORATION.

A Rabbi's Declaration of his belief that the Jews will Return to Palestine.

AN impression prevails that the Jews are not expecting or desiring restoration to Palestine. It is based on the remarks of so-called reformed Jews, who have practically abandoned their ancient faith. The Christian who knows that the partial restoration of the Jews will be an unmistakable sign of the proximity of Christ's return, is interested in this question. He will, therefore, appreciate the significance of the following remarks which are part of an address recently delivered by Rev. H. Gollancz, M.A., a Jewish Rabbi, in connection with the Chovevi Zion Society at the Jewish Working Men's Club:

With regard to the arousing of your interest in the work of the society itself, it seems to me that you require no words of encouragement from me in order to increase your enthusiasm and love for the land assigned to us for an everlasting inheritance by the title-deeds of old, and hallowed to us by the joyous and sorrowful experiences of which that land has been the scene in ancient and modern history. It is not the work of a year, it may not be of decades of years, but it is a work of caution and deliberation, it is a work that, with God's help, is to succeed as the realization of prophecy.

Small beginnings have already been made in the matter of colonization, and where these have been made with prudence and extreme caution they have succeeded. But, my friends, it does not mean that because we cannot get the whole thing at once, we should therefore neglect everything towards the accomplishment of a hope which we pray will one day be realized. Let the Jew do his share in helping to bring about the word of prophecy and God will put his seal upon the work and bring it to pass in his own good time. Let us not be frightened or depressed because difficulties stare us in the face or crop up on every side. What earnest, believing Jew need be told to love Zion? What devout Jew need be told not to give up the hope of the promised restoration and the rebuilding of the Temple? Why this is part and parcel of his faith as a Jew.

That portion of prophecy has been fulfilled which predicted our dispersion consequent upon the destruction of the Temple and the desolation of our country. Why may we not hope that the other portion of the prophecy will be fulfilled which promised the return to Zion, and the restoration of Israel to the desolate and uninhabited cities of the Holy Land? Who does not call to mind the beautiful and pathetic dialogue adduced in the Midrash, which took place between Rabbis of different ways of thinking. The four Rabbis, Gamaliel, R. Elazar ben Azariah, R. Jehosuah and R. Akiba once came to Jerusalem. When they beheld the desolation round about they tore their garments; but when they came to the mount where the Temple once stood and saw foxes running wild on the very spot where once stood the Holy of Holies, three of the Rabbis wept bitterly, whilst R. Akiba showed actual signs of joy and began to laugh. They looked at him in astonishment and said, "We weep and you laugh: you are a perfect riddle to us." But Akiba replied and asked, "Why do you weep?" "Shall we not weep," said they, "when we see how literally has been fulfilled the decree, 'Upon the Mountain of Zion which is desolate, foxes walk upon it.'" "This is just the reason why I am joyous and glad; for I am convinced that, if the prediction which prophesied evil has come to pass in such dreadful reality, the prophecy of Zechariah (which foretold good things), will undoubtedly also come to pass: 'Thus saith the Lord, I am returned unto Zion and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem. . . . There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.'" And, dear friends, as far as we at the present day are concerned, might we not derive hope and comfort from the continuation of these words of the prophet Zechariah: "Thus said the Lord of hosts, I will save my people from the east country and from the west country; and I will bring them so that they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem."

IT'S heaven's ain truth, ma'am!" said Elspeth. "If the mistress had na' carried awa' wi' her to show to Mrs. Lanier, the bit letter that cam' by the day's mail frae th' puir childie herself, I could read it oot to ye unner her ain hand and seal. Sae shakey and scratchet-like, Mrs. Morse, I could guess she war greeting sair the while she wrote it. I had it in me hand, whilst I could read it twice over, and I mind weel how it ran. That wha' sinks far in the heart by way o' th' een, aye lingers there lang.

"It war maistly like this she wrote: 'Dear mither,—my feyther is ill in Paw,' (did e'er a Christian hear o' sic an ill-begotten name for a toun?) Verra ill, and mayhap like to dee. I hae been in correspondence wi' him sin' last September. He is puir and an invaleed, wi' naeboddy to care for, or be wi' him. In his last letter just received—the whilk I eencluse—ye wull see that he hae little or nae hope o' getting weel. I hae plenty o' money to tak' care o' him while he is alive, wha' wi' my Uncle Roger's legacy and the bit I hae contrivt to save thae two years.'

"Did ye ever hear the like o' that, Mrs. Morse? She will hae fair starved herself to put by siller for that—de'il!" sputtering with the vain effort to think up another and as forcible, if less hackneyed epithet.

"Poor, dear child! Go on! what else did she say?"

"That she had kenned a' th' while that he wad need her; that he had na askit her to come to him; that he war in nae eemmedeate danger, and that the medical man thought if he could get to Algeria, he might e'en recover. She kenned better than that, she said. Her feyther was trying to deceive her to keep her mind easy.

"At the last she set down this postscript: 'Mother, ve'll forgie me when ye reflect how ye ance lo'ed him yersel'. I hae lo'ed him allers—me dear, noble feyther! sae noble and sae unhappy! Ane day ye wull be convinced of his ennoquence, and wull bless me because I did na leave him to dee alane amang strangers. Kees the children for me and beg Lanier not to be fashed wi' me.' And at the verra fut o' th' page, 'Love to Elspeth. She maun na' scold me.'

Her voice went to pieces again in the surf of her sobs.

Mrs. Morse sat miserable and helpless for a minute, then a ray darted upon her mind. "Was the name of the place where Mr. Paull is, Pau?" she asked eagerly. "Why, my husband and brother are going there—so a letter from Mr. Morse, received to-day, tells me. They will look him up."

The fire in Elspeth's eyes dried the tears. "'Deed, ma'am, I've me doobts if he's ever been there, or ill at all. I've kenned him twenty year an' mair, an' the times he tellt th' truth war mair seldom than th' times he leed, an' kenned he war leeing. All he wants is to get mair siller frae the innocent baby. In the smooth, fause letter frae him slippet into hers, he speaks o' money she's sent him, and that it saved him frae starving, and gat him meedical attendance, an' that the sight o' it aye gared him greet—ah! ma'am, is it ony wonder I lose me wits an' me bonnie Engleesh in thinkin' o' my sweet, headstrong bairnie in the hands o' that mon, and his maister, the de'il, only kens in what manner o' companv beside?"

"It is all very sad—very terrible!" assented the listener, forced to collect her senses by the frenzied state of the whilom phlegmatic Scotchwoman. "But Mrs. Paull may get to New York in time to stop her. When was she to sail?"

"Yesterday. Mrs. Paull will gae straight to her sister-in-law, and the two will try to find by what steamer she's gane. They can do naught else. I'll carry the mither's face wi' me down to me grave. 'Twas like one wha' had gat her death-call. An' never a bitter word or look! Only, 'Elspeth, ve'll not tell the boys what's gane wrang.' I'll leave them at hame. I maun tak' the dochter he's left to me, with me to her aunt's. God will strengthen me for this day, also." There maun be summat far agley in the world, Mrs. Morse, when sic a mon can mar the life o' sic a woman."

"I cannot but hope that Mr. Morse can be of some service to her, and to our poor little Marie," said the pastor's wife consolingly. "I will write to him to-night, and the letter will go out by Saturday's steamer. Whether her father is at Pau or not—(the word was spelled P-a-u, wasn't it?) Marie will go straight there, expecting to find him. What a wild, imprudent idea it was—flying off to the ends of the earth alone! A young, pretty girl, who has never been a hundred miles from home?"

"She was aye as brave as brawss—her mither's ain bairn for speerit—and wha wad gae through fire an' water for love's sake. Ance he gets hold o' her, he'll ne'er let her gang till every bit and bittock o' her hard-got siller is in his pouch. God forgie me, a sinner, Mrs. Morse! but when I think o' it, I could stop his fausse breath wi' me twa auld hands, if he stood here before me!"

Mrs. Morse was a peaceable Christian woman, yet she did not look horrified at the blood-thirsty outburst. She asked, quietly: "Where are Tom and Edwin?"

"In their play-shop in th' attic, happy as kings, wi' never a thocht o' what's come to their sister, an' th' mither's heart-break."

"Let me take them home with me for the night—until their mother comes back. My boys will be overjoyed to have them, and you will be more comfortable to have them away while you are so unhappy."

She bore the two lads off with her, delighted on their parts with the prospect of the visit, leaving Elspeth to nurse her grief and wrath, or to reason and pray herself into a gentler mood. There was literally nothing for her hands to do until it should be time to set about getting supper for Robert and herself. It was but four o'clock when Mrs. Morse departed; the house was in perfect order; the kitchen, her especial domain, was speckless and shining from the polished floor to the copper boiler to the left of the range, and the row of tins gracing the shelf above the dresser. Moreover, for perhaps the first time since she was a woman grown, she had no heart to work. All the inherited savagery of her Gaelic blood was in a ferment. The stern integrity and uncompromising judgment of her Covenant forbears were arrayed with her love for her stolen nursling and fealty to her beloved mistress against the author of this latest and foulest wrong to an unoffending household. She had never really believed in Earnest Paull, even when he won the unquestioning devotion of Alice Lanier's heart, yet in all her years of service in his family, she had held her peace as to this, her private opinion. Now, she felt as if her soul were swollen blackly with the accumulated distrust and dislike of twenty-five years. He was the impersonation of all the sorrow that had followed her mistress, until, but for Divine grace and the gallant championship of him who was now no more, she must have been hounded into her grave. At the thought of Roger Lanier, an odd constriction closed upon the faithful heart; two tears forced themselves from her hot eyes.

"If he war here, this wad na' a come about!" she muttered. "It mak's me fair mad to think his money, that he meant sould be a peace-offering to the blind, doited bairn, sould fa' into sic dirty hands!"

A loud ring at the door-bell aroused her. She was sitting in the chimney-corner facing the windows that opened upon the piazza. When Mrs. Morse went away, the cautious care-taker had locked the main entrance-door, leading into the hall, and the two parlors upon the left and right of this. Never a tramp had been seen about the place, but the canny Scot always made provision for the unexpected. Glancing from the window nearest her, and seeing no vehicle in the carriage-drive, she decided to answer the appellant by way of the kitchen-door.

Opening it, and stepping beyond the threshold to get a better view of the visitor, she saw a well-dressed man standing with his back to the door at which he had rung. He faced the lake and looked about him with apparent interest in the landscape or premises; his profile was turned to Elspeth; one hand, cast carelessly behind him, was gloved; the other held a cane and was bare.

Elspeth believed, when she came to look back upon the scene and interview, that she recognized this ungloved hand and the easy grace of his attitude before she knew the face to be Ernest Paull's.

He had not heard her open the kitchen door. The March wind was blustering, and the pines made loud moan in his ears. When, drawn perhaps by the steady glare of her angry eyes, he looked toward her, she had shut herself out with him, and her heels upon the sill of the stout door, had the mien of one defending a fortress.

He walked quickly down the piazza, his feet ringing upon the brick pavement. She recollected his gait so well! the slight roll that never degenerated into a swagger, and a springy rise upon the toes—the carriage of a man who thought well of himself and was used to being thought well of by the world.

In nearing her, he changed the cane into his left hand and held out the bare right.

"Ah, Elspeth! I how do you do?"

She folded her arms so tightly that nothing but her own will or a crowbar could have undone them; her stare was stony, yet lurid, like the "slag" of a smelting-pot; her mouth was a grim, straight line that gave her the physiognomy of a North American Indian. She neither budged nor spoke.

"Why, Elspeth! my good woman!" with a laugh of friendly patronage, "Am I so changed that you do not know me?"

"I ken ye weel—mair's the peety."

Her voice rasped like the sharpening of a saw.

He laughed again, less good-humoredly, and with a scornful cadence, and spoke like one who had no disposition to dally with whims.

"Where is your mistress?"

"She's awa' frae her hame. Where is me mistress's dochter?"

"See here, Elspeth! You cannot impose upon me with any of your high-tragedy airs. We know one another of old, and I am less inclined to submit to impertinence now than then. I asked, civilly—more civilly than you deserve to be treated, where Mrs. Paull is."

"And I asked for Miss Marie that ye've tolled frae hame and freends and nateeve land to follow ye to the eends of th' airth, and ye here in free and eenlichtend America, whilst she's gane to speir after ye in a place where ye've never set a fute, for a' I ken."

His change of color was perceptible through the bronze of a recent sea-voyage.

"What under heaven are you talking about?" he interrogated, harshly.

"Just wha I hae tellt to ye! that my mistress wha used to be yer wife before yer pre-fairred Jeezebeel to Esther"—stingingly acrimonious—"hae gane to th' ceety for tidings o' her child wha sailit yestreen to tend ye on yer seek bed and mayhap to receive yer last breath—(heaven save and keep us frae sic awfu' prevarication and lees!) ye having fuffed the puir, blind lassie's haid wi' sic stuff o' yer poverty and seekness as micht turn the stummick o' a cast-iron pot!"

"Do you really mean"—coming a step nearer, and speaking hurriedly—"that the silly child sailed yesterday for France, hoping to see me there? Why did her mother allow it? Was there no one to stop her? This is abominable!"

"Ye have used the reet word for ance! If me relegion allowed me to put in a harder, I wud fleen it at ye. And the abomination is at yer door, the sin upon yer heid, where th' punctionment will be too in the Day when he maketh eenqueesection for the blood o' hearts and o' souls."

"Hold your tongue, woman! You say that Mrs. Paull is in town? Where?"

Elspeth was mute.

"Can't you understand English? Speak!"

No response.

"I'll make you answer!" Beside himself with anxiety and suspense, he put out his hand as if to take her by the shoulder.

Without shrinking so much as a hair's breadth away from him, she drew herself up to her full height, until she towered above him; her eyes glowed dangerously.

"Lay th' weight o' yer cowardly finger upo' me, and I'll stretch ye at me feet, ye fausse carle! Ye bade me 'haud me tongue!' and I hae haud it. I'll rend it oot by th' root before I'll tell ye where me mistress is. What are ye to her? What is she to ye, wha desairted her and deesgraced the bairns she had borne to ye, and wad hae let them starve had it na been for him wha made ye afraid to veesit America unteel his body wae unner th' sod, and his speerit in heaven, where the likes o' ye wull be lang in meeting him, while there's a God o' justice to rule the airth and th' heavens! If ye hae any ane grain o' good in ye, gae ye back to the far cuntry where ye hae been spending that poor lassie's substance in reetous leaving, and send her hame again!"

"When will Mrs. Paull be at home?" as if he had not heard a word of denunciation, or counsel.

"I dinna ken. If I did, ye wad 'be nane the wiser."

"Where are the children?"

"They're nane o' them within."

"Did they go with their mother?"

Obstinate silence again.

"Elspeth!" persuasively.

Not a syllable.

He walked up the piazza, close to the wall of the house, eying the closed shutters sharply in passing, his hands behind his back, turned at the far end, and came directly up to her, with the mien of a man willing to reason, yet resolved to end a debate by stringent action.

"You must comprehend, Elspeth, being an unusually sensible woman, that you cannot keep up this sort of thing with me. The children are mine, and I can get out a writ that will give them to me. If you go too far, I will do it. No power on earth can hinder me. It is as well that your mistress should know this. If she is in New York I advise you to communicate with her at once and inform her as to my intentions. If—as I more than suspect, she is in this house"—stepping back to survey the upper windows, and raising his voice—"you may tell her that I will call again in a week for her answer."

Misled by Elspeth's immobility and down-dropt eyes, he went on more threateningly:

"In point of fact, I have the right, legal and moral, to search the premises for myself. You certainly have not the right to prevent me."

"I'll tak' it then! Ye'll enter this door over my deid body. And suld ye try it, a skreel from me wad fetch a lang-legged laddie from yon barn wha think na mair o' tossing ye, neck and crop, oot into the loch over there, than if ye were a mad dog. I may not ken muckle o' th' la', but I ken wha hae the stranger body o' twa men, an' ye are nae Goliath o' Garth!"

"You run a great risk," returned Mr. Paull, with affected coolness. "I have warned you. Upon your head be the consequences. I have crossed the ocean to see my wife and to claim my children—and I shall do both. You may deliver my message to Mrs. Paull, or not, as you like. It makes no difference to me."

He sauntered deliberately off the porch and along the drive to the road leading to the highway, striking at stones and fallen leaves with his cane, in an idle, lounging fashion. Between tree trunks and naked branches Elspeth saw him get into a buggy in which sat another man, and the two drove away together.

She was left in victorious possession of the field.

For how long?

CHAPTER XVIII.

Be not deceived: God is not mocked: whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. St. Paul.

A pitiful thing the gift to-day
That is dross, and nothing worth.
"Though if it had come but yesterday
It had brimmed with sweet the earth."

M. E. Sangster.

In one particular, at least, Elspeth's scepticism with regard to the statements made by her former master, was, in a measure, unjust.

The man who strode moodily through the Pinehurst Woods on that blustering March afternoon was not in robust health. Had her excitement suffered her to use her eyes as faithfully as was her custom she must have observed that he was thinner than when she saw him last, and that a peculiar hollowing of the chest caused him to stoop slightly in walking. He breathed fast, and not regularly after swinging himself up into the hired carriage awaiting him; leaned back, slouched his hat over his brows, and remained silent until he alighted at the railway station at Pedlington.

The Mother of Washington.

The Monument, Which "The Christian Herald" Readers Helped to Complete, Dedicated at Fredericksburg.

There was a notable gathering at the historic town of Fredericksburg, Va., a few days ago, when men and women prominent in national affairs, in literature, in philanthropy and in art, assembled to witness the dedicatory ceremonies of the monument erected to the memory of Mary Washington, the mother of our first President, by the women of America.

THE UNFINISHED MONUMENT.

Among those who participated were the President and Vice-President, Chief Justice Fuller of the U. S. Supreme Court, Secretaries Gresham, Lamont, Carlisle and Morton, Postmaster-General Bissell, and a since for a long period she had labored earnestly and ceaselessly to interest the Maries of America in the completion of the monument. The occasion was made one of military display, and the whole town was en fete to greet the arrival of the visitors from different parts of the Union.

On a knoll a little distance above the town, is located the simple shaft which was to be dedicated. The inscriptions, "Mary the Mother of Washington," on one side, and on the other, "Erected by her Countrywomen," tell briefly to the world the story the shaft commemorates. Here the dedicatory party assembled, and the exercises were opened with prayer by Rev. Dr. J. P. Smith. Addresses were delivered by the mayor of the city, Gov. O'Ferrall, President Cleveland, Senator Daniels, and others.

The corner-stone of this monument (a photograph of which in its completed condition appears on this page), was laid by President Jackson in 1833, in the presence of over 10,000 persons. For sixty years it remained unfinished, the pedestal alone standing, while the obelisk which it was to have supported, lay mouldering beside it. It was the work of a private citizen who desired to honor the name and memory of the mother of Washington, and Marion Harland in her book entitled, "The Story of Mary Washington," indicates the cause that led to the temporary abandonment of the work. She was the prime mover in the attempt which has now been successfully made to rehabilitate and complete the monument, and it has been largely in response to her appeals through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and otherwise, that the patriotic Maries of America made so noble and generous a response. The entire cost of the monument was in the neighborhood of $11,000. It is fifty feet high, a monolith of Vermont granite rising from a base eleven feet square. The old monument, which had to be discarded, has been largely distributed as relics, and some of it will be built into the wall enclosing the finished shaft.

DEAF A QUARTER OF A CENTURY.

MAIZE, KAS., JAN. 28, '94.

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

TO BIBLE STUDENTS.

You will find the new Monthly Magazine "The Lamp of Life" indispensable in Sunday School, Mission and Church work. As its name indicates, its object is to give light. Many questions are asked in the present day to which Biblical students often fail to obtain answers. These relate to the meaning of obscure passages of Scripture; to the character of obnoxious events as indicated in prophecy; to the condition of the soul immediately after death; to the identity of the Lost ten tribes, and to many other subjects. "The Lamp of Life" sheds light on all these subjects. It also shows the significance of events in the political, social and religious world, and how prophecy is being fulfilled in our day, as in the past. Its method is exclusively Scriptural. It gives new translations by eminent scholars of different passages, and by comparing one Scripture with another, enables the reader to get a comprehensive and exhaustive conception of God's revelation. Sample copy ten cents. Annual subscription $1. All orders to be sent to Dr. B. O. Kinnear, 101 West Seventy-fourth street, New York.

WAITING.

Written after reading the words of Aunt Jane Brown aged 101 years in "The Christian Herald" of May 2nd: "I'm just waitin' till my place is ready for me."

I AM waiting 'mid the shadows
Of this dark and dismal shore,
I am waiting by the current
For the Lord to bear me o'er.
For a century I've wandered
Mid the murky shades of earth;
Now I long for heaven's glory—
World of happiness and mirth.

All my earthly tasks are finished—
I'm just waiting for my Lord;
Soon my journey will be ended,
And I'll go to my reward,
Soon the boatman o'er the current
Will come gliding, with his bark,
And he'll bear me o'er the billows
That are rolling, deep and dark.

Soon the sunlight of the heaven,
That is built for man on high,
Will, in beams of brightest glory,
Fall in triumph from the sky,
While I mount from death and darkness
To behold the glowing face
Of the Christ I love so dearly,
And to rest in his embrace.

Only waiting for the morning—
Waiting by the current, dark;
Waiting for the coming signal
For my mansion to embark,
And I know the boatman's near me,
For it seems I hear the oar
Of the boat that soon will bear me
To the bright, ecstatic shore.

Farewell, earth, with all thy shadows,
Farewell, darkness, death and pain,
I am going home to glory,
With the saints on high to reign.
There these eyes shall see the splendors
Of the city built on high,
Where these feet shall tread the pave-
Where none ever droop and die.

It bristles with good points.

And the minute they spy dirt they rise up and go for it. No matter what it's on—linen, laces, silk, woolens, flannel, marble, china, glass, wood, metal, or your own person, Pearl Line will get the dirt off with the least trouble and labor.

It saves that ruinous wear and tear that comes from rubbing. But there's another point to think about, more important still:

Pearline is absolutely harm-

Is unequalled for house, barn, factory or outbuildings, and costs half the price of shingles, tin or iron. It is ready for use, and easily applied by any one.

FOR SHED OR HENHOUSE.

On steep or flat surface. Excellent roof complete. $2.00—Per 100 square feet—$2.00. Send stamp for sample and state size of roof.

OLD SHINGLE ROOFS

easily made water-tight and fire-proof at small expense, with dark red slate paint. On decayed shingles it fills the pores, and gives a substantial roof, that lasts years. Curled or warped shingles it brings to their places and keeps them there. Genuine slate-paint requires no heating, and contains no tar.

ON TIN OR IRON ROOFS

It is acknowledged the best paint, has a heavy body, is easily applied, expands by sun, contracts by cold, and never cracks. One coat equals 4 of any other. Buildings covered with felt can be made water-tight at small expense. Write at once for Catalogue.

A VIRGINIA COLPORTEUR.

A WHITE-BEARDED, bent, old man, hat, clothes, boots, all looking as though they had never been new, astride a black horse which is never ridden out of a walk, and which carries also a pair of ample saddle-bags. Such are the Rev. W. F. Yarbrough, the Virginia colporteur, and his horse, "John the Baptist." These two are known throughout the state and West Virginia. They have been inseparable for the last sixteen years. No place is too wild and lawless for them to penetrate, to leave a Bible here, a tract there, or for the colporteur to preach a sermon in some mountain fastness, whose inhabitants never heard a church bell or the story of the Cross.

W. T. Yarbrough was born some seventy years ago in Albemarle County, Va., and there spent his youth and early manhood. His betrothed dying before their marriage, he has remained constant to her memory. He is a Baptist, but a most liberal one, and strong in the temperance cause. He sells a few books when he can, to supply his wants, which are few, as he finds a welcome to board and bed wherever his fancy or duty may lead him. An earnest, untiring, humble Christian, he has endeared himself to hundreds of his fellow workers of all denominations.

Though he speaks not with the eloquence of Apollos, his sermons carry the conviction that he is terribly in earnest and they are his honest opinions. While his lot is cast with the Baptist Church, he knows no doctrine but faith and recognizes all Christians as brothers. He has spent his life in hardships; his lines have not been cast in pleasant places; yet, he has passed the allotted period and is still full of cheer. All have some wish they hope to have gratified—and so with this faithful old worker. He said lately, to a friend,

"I think I will get some medicine to sell on commission. I want some money."

"Why, Uncle Billy, what do you want with money?"

"Well," said the veteran, "old John is getting too stiff to climb the mountains, and we'll have to part. I want to buy another horse, a blanket and a mattress, and make another trip through these mountains before I go home. When I'm called, I want to be on duty."

May this old servant of the Lord hear, at the last, the blessed words, "Well done," and find rest after his life of patient, humble labor.

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practiced by George Thomas Congreve.

SEVENTH INTERVIEW.

By our Special Commissioner

With Mr. William Hunt, The Grove, Newton Abbot, November, 1892.

Among the many people in Newton Abbot who have received marked benefit from Mr. Congreve's treatment for Consumption is Mr. William Hunt, of the Grove, who is in the employ of a well-known firm of the town.

This young man seems to have enjoyed fairly good health until a year or two ago.

"Then," he says, "I became seriously ill. My chest was affected. The doctor told me that my lungs were very weak indeed, that it was likely I should go into Consumption. He gave me medicine, but it did me no good."

"How long were you sick altogether, Mr. Hunt?" I asked.

"About twelve months; but during a part of that time I was able to go to work. But by and by I caught a chill, and I became very bad indeed. I had a great deal of pain about the chest; I raised a quantity of expectoration, sometimes with traces of blood. I lost flesh, and became so weak that I was compelled to give up work. Then I took to my bed, and remained there three weeks."

"Was it then that you applied to Mr. Congreve?"

"Just about that time."

"I suppose you commenced to take the medicine directly—what was the result?"

"It picked me up at once. I got stronger. In time I was cured and able to go to work again."

"Was it long before you were able to start work?"

"From three to four months."

In answer to my next question, he said:

"I have kept well ever since, and have kept at work."

"What is your occupation, Mr. Hunt?"

"I am engaged at a large business house in the town. Sometimes I have to lift heavy weights—not very often; and, of course, I am exposed to the weather a great deal."

"Now, Mr. Hunt, if you knew anyone who had any disease of the lungs, what advice would you give them?"

"I should strongly advise them to go to Mr. Congreve."

Owing to the impossibility of executing the numerous orders sent to Mr. Congreve in London, on account of the difficulties and cost of sending small packages through the Custom House, he has lately opened a depot at 211 Foster St., New York, and now wishes it to be known that henceforth all sufferers in America can promptly obtain, by addressing him there,

A CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, which even in advanced stages of that terrible disease may be used with certainty of relief.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read his book on Consumption of the lungs or decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 perfectly cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cents, or it will be sent gratis with every first order of $1.00 trial bottle of Congreve's Balsamic Elixir, if ordered direct from

We Have Discovered Something

What it is we hardly know, but that it is beneficial we have proven over and over again.

Because we do not thoroughly understand it, we may have made a mistake in naming it, but, be that as it may, Electropoise is a marvelous curative agent.

And now, before prejudice has an opportunity to enter, just stop and think what there is in medical science, so called, that is absolutely known.

Theories are constantly supplanting theories, are they not?

And have we not confessed that we have but a theory in reference to Electropoise?

But an ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory, and yet we have tons of fact for every ounce of theory.

We have selected four tons of fact in the shape of four letters of people prominent before the public.

CONVINCED OF ITS MERITS

NEW YORK, Dec. 20th, 1893.

Myself and family have derived so much benefit from the Electropoise, and I have become so thoroughly convinced of its merits, that I feel warranted in commending it without reserve to the public. A friend, a highly esteemed clergyman and educator, has said he "would not take one thousand dollars for his Electropoise."

REV. W. H. DEPUY, A.M., D.D., LL.D.,
Assistant Editor of Christian Advocate.

EFFECTS OF LA GRIPPE

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 4th, 1891.

I had a violent attack of La Grippe, which left me in a feeble state. I was persuaded to try the Electropoise; now, after a year (during which time I have used no medicine), I find myself in better health than for fifteen years, and all traces of La Grippe are gone. Its effects have been remarkable.

REV. WM. McDONALD,
Editor Boston Christian Witness.

COUGH—INSOMNIA

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 5th, 1894.

We use the Electropoise in our family, and would not part with it under any circumstance. I have found that no medicine will so quickly give relief as the Electropoise, and particularly is this the case with a cough or sleeplessness. I have taken frequent occasions to speak of its wonderful curative powers.

MRS. HOWELL E. JACKSON,
Wife of Associate Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court.

RHEUMATISM.

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 14, 1893.

I have suffered with constitutional rheumatism all my life; for several years I was compelled to use a crutch, and then could not walk fifty yards. I commenced the Electropoise with no faith in it; the good results have been wonderful. I can now walk without a crutch, and my heart trouble is cured.

DR. W. H. MORGAN, D.D.S.,
Former President of Nat. Dental Association.

FOUR

The wide range of disease mentioned in these letters indicates the fact that the principle involved is of corresponding application, and the so-called incurable cases have often yielded to the treatment in a remarkable way.

Electropoise simply reinforces vitality and conquers disease; not a battery or belt; no shock, but a simple, easily applied home cure without medicine.

Send for our explanatory book, or call at our office.

TRUE SHEPHERDS OF THE LAMBS.

The American Sunday School Union's Seventy Years of Labor among the Children of the United States—A Glorious Record of Successful Work.

Institutions were like human beings there would be something very sad about the anniversary celebrated last Sunday by the American Sunday School Union. It was its seventieth birthday, and its life has been so useful, so helpful and so blessed that we should all mourn if we had to say of it as of ourselves: "The days of our years are three score years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be four score years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow, for it is soon cut off and we fly away." The venerable organization renews its youth year by year, and its present strength and vitality have in them all the promise of centuries of life, not enfeebled by the passing of the years, but enriched and invigorated by the fruits of experience. The children, whom it gathered in its early years, have grown old and gray, and have gone to the tomb; generation after generation has been blessed; and still the patient, well-rewarded work goes on, and the men and women who will stand in the forefront of the battle, and march in the ranks when we are gone, will have among them none more valiant and steadfast than those who will have reason to bless the Sunday School Union. The recruits it brings to Christ's army are the best soldiers. We are thankful when we see a hoary-headed sinner converted to God, but it is chiefly for his sake; it is gratifying to see the middle-aged man quit the ways of sin and turn to Christ, but we lament the years he has given to sin; but when a child is converted, we have the best reason to rejoice, for there is hope in him of long service and of his winning many other souls for Christ. So in consecrating its work to the conversion of the children, the Union has a most delightful and most hopeful field. It is sowing the good seed in ground not choked with the cares of this world, the love of riches or the noxious weeds of evil habits. It is dealing with the spiritual material when it is most impressionable, before the evil days come when the soul says, it has "no pleasure in them," and when one and another plot of virgin ground is added to the vineyard of the Great Husbandman, we rejoice in the hope of rare and precious fruit. Every Sunday School teacher should realize that what the world will be twenty or thirty years hence, depends more on his fidelity and earnestness, and on God's blessing on his labors, than on the work of pastors and churches.

The Sunday School Union, which organizes, systematizes and directs this most momentous work was established in 1824. Already several local unions existed, some for States, and

Bishop White, Dr. Benjamin Rush, Dr. William Currie, Thomas Mendenhall, Peter Thompson, Matthew Carey, Thomas P. Cope, Joseph Sharpless and Captain Nathaniel Falconer. Honored names are they now, which ought to be known and revered in every Sunday School in the land. At that meeting was organized "The Society for the Institution and Support of First-Day or Sunday Schools in the city of Philadelphia and the Districts of Southwark and the Northern Liberties." The idea at that time was almost wholly educational and the schools were for the benefit of "the children of indigent parents, who had not proper opportunities of instruction previous to their being apprenticed to trades." Spelling-books and primers were used in the school for the more ignorant, and the Bible was to be read school. He was Rev. Robert May, a missionary of the London Missionary Society, who was on his way to India. He told his fellow-workers what had been done by Robert Raikes in England, where Sunday School work antedated the work here by about nine years. Mr. May was the first to introduce reward tickets and to bring the more distinct religious element to the front in the Philadelphia schools. The Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia was the first to formally adopt the movement and make it a part of church work. One of the teachers of the First Day Society suggested the idea, and his daughter, with several other ladies organized the first school in April, 1815 and became its teachers. The movement spread to New York, and in 1816 a society was organized in that city, with Dr. Isaac Ferris, as President. Mr. Eleazer Lord, who had removed from Philadelphia to New York in the previous year, had the honor of bringing the good seed of the Sunday School idea with him and introducing it to the attention of Dr. Ferris and others.

By 1817, there were forty schools in existence in the two cities, and two in South Carolina and one in New Jersey. In 1819, the number of schools had increased to 127, in which there were 10,550 white and 660 colored children.

Auxiliary societies reported to the Philadelphia Society from Massachusetts, Maryland and New York, and the project of forming a National Union was launched, which on May 25, 1824, was carried into execution.

The occasion was the seventh annual meeting of the Philadelphia Sunday School Union, to which representatives of other Unions had been invited. It is interesting at this day to read the resolution which defined the objects of the Union showing, as it does, how closely and faithfully the American Sunday School Union has followed the programme then sketched. It stated that the aim should be, "To concentrate the efforts of Sabbath School Societies in the different parts of our country, to strengthen the hands of the friends of pious instruction on the Lord's Day, to disseminate useful information, circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and to endeavor to plant a Sunday School wherever there is a population. With these objects, the Philadelphia Sunday and Adult Sabbath School Union, others for districts, counties, cities and towns. Sunday School work had been prosecuted for thirty-four years. It dated from Dec. 19, 1790, when a meeting was held in Philadelphia to "take into consideration the establishment of Sunday Schools in the city. The persons present at that meeting were and extracts copied by those children who could read and write. Salaried teachers were employed. This continued to 1810-16, when the teachers served gratuitously. In 1811, a visitor from England, who was an enthusiast in the new movement, spent some time in Philadelphia and founded a HEAVY WEIGHTS.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday at San Francisco, Cal. Text: Psalms 55: 22, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee."

DAVID was here taking his own medicine. If anybody had on him heavy weights, David had them, and yet out of his own experience he advises you and me as to the best way of getting rid of burdens. This is a world of burden-bearing. During the past few days tidings came from across the sea of a mighty and good man fallen. A man full of the Holy Ghost was he, his name the synonym for all that is good, and kind, and gracious, and beneficent. Word comes to us of a scourge sweeping off hundreds and thousands of people, and there is a burden of sorrow. Sorrow on the sea and sorrow on the land. Coming into the house of prayer there may be no sign of sadness or sorrow, but where is the man who has not a conflict? Where is the soul that has not a struggle? And there is not a day of all the year when my text is not gloriously appropriate, and there is never an audience assembled on the planet where the text is not gloriously appropriate: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

In the far East, wells of water are so infrequent that when a man owns a well he has a property of very great value, and sometimes battles have been fought for the possession of one well of water; but there is one well that every man owns, a deep well, a perennial well, a well of tears. If a man has not a burden on this shoulder, he has a burden on the other shoulder.

The day I left home to look after myself and for myself, in the wagon my father sat driving, and he said that day something which has kept with me all my life: "De Witt, it is always safe to trust God. I have many a time come to a crisis of difficulty. You may know that, having been sick for fifteen years, it was no easy thing for me to support a family; but always God came to the rescue. I remember the time," he said, "when I didn't know what to do, and I saw a man on horseback riding up the farm lane, and he announced to me that I had been nominated for the most lucrative office in all the gift of the people of the county; and to that office I was elected, and God in that way met all my wants, and I tell you it is always safe to trust him."

Oh, my friends, what we want is a practical religion! The religion people have is so high up you cannot reach it. I had a friend who entered the life of an evangelist. He gave up a lucrative business in Chicago, and he and his wife finally came to severe want. He told me that in the morning at prayers he said: "O Lord, thou knowest we have got a mouthful of food in the house! Help me, help us!" And he started out on the street, and a gentleman met him and said: "I have been thinking of you for a good while. You know I am a flour merchant; if you won't be offended, I should like to send you a barrel of flour." He cast his burden on the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. Now, that is the kind of religion we want.

In the Straits of Magellan, I have been told, there is a place where whichever way a ship captain puts his ship he finds the wind against him, and there are men who all their lives have been running in the teeth of the wind, and which way to turn they do not know. Some of them may be in this assemblage, and I address them face to face, not perfunctorily, but as one brother talks to another brother: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

There are a great many men who have business burdens. When we see a man harried and perplexed and annoyed in business life, we are apt to say: "He ought not to have attempted to carry so much." Ah! that man may not be to blame at all. When a man plants a business he does not know what will be its outgrowths, what will be its roots, what will be its branches. There is many a man with keen foresight and large business faculty who has been flung into the dust by unforeseen circumstances springing upon him from ambush. When to buy, when to sell, when to trust and to what amount of credit, what will be the effect of this new invention of machinery, what will be the effect of that loss of crop, and a thousand other questions perplex business men until the hair is silvered and deep wrinkles are ploughed in the cheek; and the stocks go up by mountains and go down by valleys, and they are at their wits' ends, and stagger like drunken men.

There never has been a time when there have been such rivalries in business as now. It is hardware against hardware, books against books, chandlery against chandlery, imported article against imported article. A thousand stores in combat with another thousand stores. Never such advantage of light, never such variety of assortment, never so much splendor of show window, never so much adroitness of salesmen, never so much acuteness of advertising, and amid all these severities of rivalry in business, how many men break down! Oh, the burden on the shoulder! Oh, the burden on the heart!

You hear that it is avarice which drives these men of business through the street, and that is the commonly accepted idea. I do not believe a word of it. The vast multitude of these business men are toiling on for others. To educate their children, to put wing of protection over their households, to have something left so when they pass out of this life their wives and children will not have to go to the poorhouse—that is the way I translate this energy in the street and store—the vast majority of that energy. Grip, Gouge & Co. do not do all the business. Some of us remember when the Central America was coming home from California it was wrecked. President Arthur's father-in-law was the heroic captain of that ship, and went down with most of the passengers. Some of them got off into the life-boats, but there was a young man returning from California who had a bag of gold in his hand; and as the last boat shoved off from the ship that was to go down, that young man shouted to a comrade in the boat, "Here, John, catch this gold; there are three thousand dollars; take it home to my old mother, it will make her comfortable in her last days." Grip, Gouge & Co. do not do all the business of the world.

Ah! my friend, do you say that God does not care anything about your worldly business? I tell you God knows more about it than you do. He knows all your perplexities; he knows what mortgagee is about to foreclose; he knows what note you cannot pay; he knows what unsaleable goods you have on your shelves; he knows all your trials, from the day you took hold of the first yard-stick down to that sale of the last yard of ribbon, and the God who helped David to be king, and who helped Daniel to be prime-minister, and who helped Havelock to be a soldier, will help you to discharge all your duties. He is going to see you through. When loss comes, and you find your property going, just take this Book and put it down by your ledger, and read of the eternal possessions that will come to you through our Lord Jesus Christ. And when your business partner betrays you, and your friends turn against you, just take the insulting letter, put it down on the table, put your Bible beside the insulting letter, and then read of the friendship of him who "sticketh closer than a brother."

A young accountant in New York City got his accounts entangled. He knew he was honest, and yet he could not make his accounts come out right, and he toiled at them day and night until he was nearly frenzied. It seemed by those books that something had been misappropriated, and he knew before God he was honest. The last day came. He knew if he could not that day make his accounts come out right, he would go into disgrace and go into banishment from the business establishment. He went over there very early, before there was anybody in the place, and he knelt down at the desk and said: "Oh Lord, thou knowest I have tried to be honest, but I cannot make these things come out right! Help me to-day—help me this morning!" The young man arose, and hardly knowing why he did so, opened a book that lay on the desk, and there was a leaf containing a line of figures which explained everything. In other words, he cast his burden upon the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. Young man, do you hear that?

Oh, yes, God has a sympathy with anybody that is in any kind of toil! He knows how heavy is the hod of bricks that the workman carries up the ladder on the wall; he hears the pickaxe of the miner down in the coal shaft; he knows how strong the tempest strikes the sailor at masthead; he sees the factory girl among the spindles, and knows how her arms ache; he sees the sewing woman in the fourth story, and knows how few pence she gets for making a garment; and louder than all the din and roar of the city comes the voice of a sympathetic God: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

Then there are a great many who have a weight of persecution and abuse upon them. Sometimes society gets a grudge against a man. All his motives are misinterpreted and all his good deeds are depreciated. With more virtue than some of the honored and applauded, he runs only against raillery and sharp criticism. When a man begins to go down, he has not only the force of natural gravitation, but a hundred hands to help him in the precipitation. Men are persecuted for their virtues and their successes. Germanicus said he had just as many bitter antagonists as he had admirers. The character sometimes is so lustrous that the weak eyes of Envy and Jealousy cannot bear to look at it.

It was their integrity that put Joseph in the pit, and Daniel in the den, and Shadrach in the fire, and sent John the Evangelist to desolate Patmos, and Calvin to the castle of persecution, and John Huss to the stake, and Korah after Moses, and Saul after David, and Herod after Christ. Be sure if you have anything to do for Church or State, and you attempt it with all your soul, the lightning will strike you.

The world always has had a cross between two thieves for the one who comes to save it. High and holy enterprise has always been followed by abuse. The most sublime tragedy of self-sacrifice has come to burlesque. The graceful gait of virtue is always followed by scoff and grimace and travesty. The sweetest strain of poetry ever written has come to ridiculous parody, and as long as there are virtue and righteousness in the world, there will be something for iniquity to grin at. All along the line of the ages, and in all lands, the cry has been: "Not this man, but Barabbas. Now, Barabbas was a robber."

And what makes the persecutions of life worse, is that they come from people whom you have helped, from those to whom you loaned money or have started in business, or whom you rescued in some great crisis. I think it has been the history of all our lives—the most acrimonious assault has come from those whom we have benefited, whom we have helped, and that makes it all the harder to bear. A man is in danger of becoming cynical.

A clergyman of the Universalist Church went into a neighborhood for the establishment of a church of his denomination, and he was anxious to find someone of that denomination, and he was pointed to a certain house, and went there. He said to the man of the house: "I understand you are a Universalist; I want you to help me in the enterprise." "Well," said the man, "I am a Universalist, but I have a peculiar kind of Universalism." "What is that?" asked the minister. "Well," replied the other, "I have been out in the world, and I have been cheated and slandered and outraged and abused until I believe in universal damnation!"

The great danger is that men will become cynical and given to believe, as David was tempted to say, that all men are liars. Oh, my friends, do not let that be the effect upon your souls! If you cannot endure a little persecution, how do you think our fathers endured great persecution? Motley, in his Dutch Republic, tells us of Egmont, the martyr, who, condemned to be beheaded, unfastened his collar on the way to the scaffold; and when they asked him why he did that, he said: "So they will not be detained in their work; I want to be ready." Oh, how little we have to endure compared with those who have gone before us!

Now, if you have come across ill-treatment, let me tell you you are in excellent company—Christ and Luther and Galileo and Columbus and John Jay and Josiah Quincy and thousands of men and women, the best spirits of earth and heaven.

Budge not one inch, though all hell wreak upon you its vengeance, and you be made a target for devils to shoot at. Do you not think Christ knew all about persecution? Was he not hissed at? Was he not struck on the cheek? Was he not pursued all the days of his life? Did they not expectorate upon him? Or, to put it in Bible language, "They spit upon him." And cannot he understand what persecution is? "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

Then, there are others who carry great burdens of physical ailments. When sudden sickness has come, and fierce cholera and malignant fevers take the castles of life by storm, we appeal to God; but in these chronic ailments which wear out the strength day after day, and week after week, and year after year, how little resorting to God for solace! Then people depend upon their tonics and their plasters and their cordials rather than upon heavenly stimulants.

Oh, how few people there are completely well! Some of you, by dint of perseverance and care, have kept living to this time; but how you have had to war against physical ailments! Antediluvians, without medical college and infirmary and apothecary shop, multiplied their years by hundreds; but he who has gone through the gauntlet of disease in our time, and has come to seventy years of age, is a hero worthy of a palm.

The world seems to be a great hospital and you run against rheumatisms and consumptions and scrofulas and neuralgia and scores of old diseases baptized by new nomenclature. Oh, how heavy a burden sickness is? It takes the color out of the sky and the sparkle out of the wave and the sweetness out of the fruit and the luster out of the night. When the limbs ache when the respiration is painful, when the mouth is hot, when the ear roars with unhealthy obstructions, how hard it is to be patient and cheerful and assiduous!

your feet hurt? His were crushed of the spikes. Is your side painful? His was struck by the spear. Do you feel like giving way under the burden? His weakness gave way under a cross. While you are in every possible way to try to restore your physical vigor, you are to remember that more soothing than any anodyne, more vitalizing than any stimulant, and more strengthening than any tonic is the prescription of the text: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he will sustain thee."

We hear a great deal of talk now about faith cure, and some people say it cannot be done and it is a failure. I do not know but that the chief advance of the church is to be in that direction. Marvellous things come to me day by day which make me think that if the age of miracles is past, it is because the faith of miracles is past.

A prominent merchant of New York said to a member of my family: "My mother wants her case mentioned to Mr. Talmage."

This was the case. He said: "My mother had a dreadful abscess, from which she had suffered untold agonies, and all surgery had been exhausted upon her, and worse and worse she grew until we called in a few Christian friends and proceeded to pray about it. We commended her case to God, and the abscess began immediately to be cured. She is entirely well now, and without knife and without any surgery." So that case has come to me, and there are a score of other cases coming to our ears from all parts of the earth. Oh ye, who are sick, go to Christ! Oh, ye who are worn out with agonies of body, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee!"

Another burden some have to carry is the burden of bereavement. Ah! these are the troubles that wear us out. If we lose our property, by additional industry perhaps we may bring back the estranged fortune; if we lose our good name, perhaps by reformation of morals we may achieve again reputation for integrity; but who will bring back the dear departed?

Alas, me! for these empty cradles and these trunks of childish toys that will never be used again. Alas, me! for the empty chair and the silence in the halls that will never echo again to those familiar footsteps. Alas! for the cry of widowhood and orphanage. What bitter Marahs in the wilderness, what cities of the dead, what long black shadow from the wing of death, what eyes sunken with grief, what instruments of music shut now because there are no fingers to play on them! Is there no relief for such souls? Ay, let that soul ride into the harbor of my text.

The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose,
I will not, I will not desert to its foes;
That soul, though all hell shall endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake.

Now, the grave is brighter than the ancient tomb where the lights were perpetually kept burning. The scarred feet of him who was "the resurrection and the life" are on the broken grave hillock, while the voices of angels ring down the sky at the coronation of another soul come to glory.

Then there are many who carry the burden of sin. Ah, we all carry it until in the appointed way that burden is lifted. We need no Bible to prove that the whole race is ruined. What a spectacle it would be if we could tear off the mask of human defilement, or beat a drum that would bring up the whole army of the world's transgressions—the deception, the fraud and the rapine and the murder and the crime of all centuries! Ay, if I could sound the trumpet of resurrection in the soul of the best men in this audience, and all the dead sins of the past should come up, we could not endure the sight.

Oh, to have a mountain of sin on the soul! Is there no way to have the burden moved? Oh, yes. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." The sinless one came to take the consequences of our sin! And I know he is in earnest. How do I know it? By the streaming temples and the streaming hands as he says, "Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

and such other similar societies as may unite with it, do hereby associate under the title of The American Sunday School Union."

At the time this resolution was passed, the number of Sunday Schools known to be in existence was 723. They were of many denominations, including Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Methodist, Baptist and Congregational churches. There was some doubt whether a union could be formed of these various elements, but it was impressed on all that it was not to be a union of churches but of Christians, in a work in which all Christians have a common interest. The seventy years of the American S. S. Union and the seventy-eight years of the American Bible Society prove that such co-operation can be secured. The total population of the country was at that time estimated at ten million persons, of whom probably nearly three millions were children. The Union thought that twenty-seven thousand schools ought to be in existence at that time and expressed the opinion that five men in each of the twenty-four States might be wisely employed for many years in establishing such schools. A year later, the report showed that the number of schools was 1,150, the number of teachers 11,205 and the number of pupils 82,697.

The Rev. W. C. Blair, the first missionary, had traveled extensively during the year and much of this first year's success was due to his exertions. This missionary work the Union has never suffered to languish. Its value was proved at the commencement and every year has confirmed the first estimate of its usefulness. In new communities beyond the churches, where religious affiliations are so varied that no denominational church could live, the missionaries have organized Sunday Schools, from which not unfrequently union churches have grown.

During its seventy years of life the Union has organized on an average, every year, over thirteen hundred such schools, and in the year just closed no less than 1,785 were organized. In the West, South, and Southwest the Union had a multitude of opportunities for the work, and right nobly has it used them. Dr. W. P. Paxson, who has charge of the South-western district and has labored indefatigably to plant the standard of the Cross wherever a band of children could be gathered, reports from five to six hundred Sunday Schools a year organized in his district alone. That field has a special interest for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, because of the labors of Rev. George W. Sharp, their own missionary whom they have supported for three years past, and who has proved one of Dr. Paxson's most efficient helpers. The Union has 138 missionaries engaged, whose zeal and devotion to duty is beyond praise.

The work of the Sunday School Union has not, however, been confined to missionary effort. It has undertaken the publication of books and periodicals specially adapted for the Sunday School. Such works as Dr.

Rice's famous "Bible Dictionary," his no less valuable "Our Sixty-six Sacred Books," and Prof. Bissell's "Bible Antiquities," are specimens of the books issued by the Union. They are sold at low prices, that teachers might have no difficulty in equipping themselves for their duties. Besides these larger works, leaflets and booklets suitable for the children have been produced, and many of these have been freely given away when schools in poor neighborhoods have needed them, but have been unable to purchase. To those who know with what avidity children will devour all literature that comes in their way, there is no need to point out how useful is this effort of the Union to disseminate the truth in attractive form.

On this page we give a picture of the headquarters of this most beneficent organization, which is located at 1122 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. This is the centre from which pulsates to the remotest part of our wide land the living energy that is building up the future generation in the knowledge and love of Christ. Here the meetings of the managers are held—men of eminence who receive no compensation but such as comes from the consciousness of duty faithfully performed for Christ's sake, and here the officers at the head of the various departments labor constantly to keep the work in a state of thorough efficiency and usefulness. Portraits of a group of these officers appear on the first page, which will be of interest in every Sunday School in the land.

day, and until 1880, when he resigned his seat on the Supreme Court bench, one of the most honored members of that high tribunal. He is a native of Connecticut, and is now in his eighty-seventh year. He served eleven years as Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and ten years on the bench of the United States Supreme Court. His profound knowledge of law, his marvelous powers of analysis and discrimination, and his rigorous logic, made him an invaluable associate in consultation, and an authority on technical and national questions, whose opinions are universally respected. The significance of a man so learned, able and distinguished giving his time to Sunday School affairs cannot be overestimated.

Another member of the group is Mr. Levi Knowles, the senior Vice-President of the Union. Mr. Knowles has long been one of the most prominent of Philadelphia's business men, and one of her chief philanthropists. He is now eighty-one years of age, and he has been fifty-two years one of the managers of the Sunday School Union. For fifteen years he served the Union as its Treasurer, without compensation, and has in many other ways freely given of his labor, time and money to advance its interests. With a keen knowledge of business, a strong practical mind, and rare powers of organization, Mr. Knowles has been invaluable on the Board of Managers, and he avers that the happiest years of his life are those of his association with the Union.

A third portrait is that of Rev. Edwin W. Rice, D.D., the editor of the Society's publications. Dr. Rice is now in his sixty-third year, and the thirty-fifth in the service of the Sunday School Union. He brought to the high position he now holds an experience of the most practical kind. He had served as a missionary of the Union in the Northwest, as Superintendent of an important district, and as Assistant Secretary of missionary work. He was therefore thoroughly familiar with the whole sphere of the Union's work, and has proved during the sixteen years he has held his present office, his eminent adaptation to its duties. He knew by personal observation what teachers and pupils needed, and few men could have met the need so ably. The "Scholars' Handbook," the "Lesson Leaves," and the first "Sunday School Quarterly" ever issued, besides fifteen exhaustive works of larger scope, two of which we have already mentioned, are evidences of his devotion and capacity in service.

Rev. James M. Crowell, D.D., a fourth member of the group on the first page is the Secretary of the Union's Missionary department. Dr. Crowell is a well-known minister of the Presbyterian Church, and has filled important pastorates in Pennsylvania and New York. He has also served his church in responsible offices on its general boards and as a member of the Board of Trustees of Princeton college.

Mr. Richard Ashhurst, whose portrait also appears on the first page, is the Union's Treasurer. He inherits his love for the American Sunday School Union from his father, the late Louis R. Ashhurst, for so many years identified with its interests, and an active member of both the Publication and Missionary Committees. A graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, in the Department of Arts, and the Law School, Mr. Ashhurst was admitted to the bar, but has since become identified with business interests in Philadelphia. Mr. Ashhurst holds a responsible position as treasurer of the Union, and is one of those upon whose vigilance and care for its interests the Managers rely with the utmost confidence.

The remarkable adaptation of all these officers to the work of their special departments has been a feature of the Union's experience from the beginning. It has been so with the Superintendents and Missionaries. No salary could compensate those devoted men for the toil and exposure and danger they undergo in their labors. Long journeys over dreary roads, meagre accommodations, and sometimes rebuffs and scurrilous abuse are their experience. In some of the settlements they visit they find strong opposition to the institution of any religious work. This has to be overcome, and the few who do appreciate the effort, have to be encouraged and helped in the beginning, their diffidence removed and their faith strengthened. All this the missionary expects. He toils on, and when he leaves the neighborhood, he generally leaves a school regularly organized, which he visits from time to time to guide and help the work along. The life requires tact and patience and devotion of no ordinary kind. But the rewards are great as they esteem values. In the Sunday Schools they plant and in the meetings they hold on their visits, conversions occur which gladden their hearts and fill their souls with thankfulness to God. During the past year the reports of the missionaries in the various fields contain an aggregate record of no less than 10,679 cases in which profession of faith in Christ has been made in these humble outlying schools, and that is by no means an unusual record for a year. Besides this, churches are continually being developed from the schools. Last year there were over a hundred churches so organized, and some of them were in districts in which when the missionary first visited them, no religious service was ever held, and no effort made to win souls for Christ. It is gratifying to learn that the general financial depression has not affected the income of this most beneficent society. Last year its income was $120,158, which is an increase of ten thousand dollars over the previous year. No cause better deserves the support it receives, and none could so usefully extend its operation if still larger sums were at its command.

PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

S. S. Lesson for June 10. Ex. 14: 19-29. Golden Text, Heb. 9: 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALL God's training of Moses in the land of Midian, and all his humiliations there, did not accomplish for him as much as was accomplished on the Passover night. All else had been a preparation for this. Now he was prepared in the strength of that divine food, the flesh of the lamb, to suffer with his God in the meekness of a lamb, the manners of his people forty years in the wilderness. (Acts 13: 8). Until Moses had so taken in the meaning of the slain lamb, he could not be the deliverer of his people, and they, too, must know that only by the blood of the lamb would they escape from death, and from bondage in Egypt. Things must be set right with God before there could be deliverance from man.

God commanded Moses to speak to the children of Israel that they should turn back and encamp by the sea (chap. 14: 1), and he revealed to Moses all that should happen; Pharaoh would say: "They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in." He would harden Pharaoh's heart, that he should pursue them, but God would get him honor upon Pharaoh and upon all his host, "and that I am the Lord." God's people had dwelt among the Egyptians, but instead of being made a blessing to them, they had imitated their idolatry, and God could only make himself known to this land of their bondage in the way of judgment. Joseph had indeed brought God near to them in blessing, but Joseph's people had fallen under their influence, and had no power to bless them. How we are reminded that "the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." The want of grown up, fully developed "sons of God" keeps the creation groaning under bondage and suffering. The creature, the animals as well as the oppressed among men cannot be delivered from its suffering until God's purpose in this dispensation shall be effected, or till he has gathered out from the nations a people for his name.

Forewarned though they were, yet when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel "were sore afraid." They lifted up their eyes, not like Moses who "endured as seeing Him who is invisible," they lifted up their eyes on "the things which are seen and temporal." They saw the Egyptians, the chariots of Pharaoh, his horsemen and his power, and how near to them he was coming: they judged according to the sight of their eyes in spite of the word which the Lord had spoken. Orly Moses trusted God, and to him the position was not one of danger because God was in charge, and he knew that God was mightier than Pharaoh: all the plagues of Egypt had not sufficed to teach the people this.

The children of Israel cried out unto the Lord, but they dealt with man, and bitterly reproached Moses; they said unto him: "Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? wherefore has thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt? Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying: Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians than that we should die in the wilderness." Where was the man who forty years before had been so shocked and surprised that his brethren did not understand that God by his hand would give them deliverance. Where was the man who again and again argued with his God, in his fear that his people would not believe?

had come over Moses. The man once mighty in words and in deeds, had become "very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth." The Lamb had taken possession of him; he had understood something of the Lamb of God; and instead of defending himself against the unjust and untrue accusations of the people, he ignored himself and comforted those who injured him. "Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show to you to-day; for the Egyptians which ye have seen to-day, ye shall see them again no more forever. The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." We only have power with others in the measure in which all that is personal is put quite out of the question. If Moses had thought for a moment of his own wrongs, he could not have helped the people, but he had seen, in the slain lamb, a greater than he "led to the slaughter," and when on the Mount of Transfiguration he saw him in his glory, only one subject occupied him, it was Christ's decease, which he had seen from afar. If he, the Son of God, should be led to the slaughter, Moses could afford to sacrifice himself. The children of Israel must learn to that they might learn, later on, to go forward. Every step forward is the result of having learned to trust God in a moment of peril or difficulty. The people, having learned this lesson, got their marching orders. "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward; but lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea and divide it." In order that the people may go forward, the man who stands near to God, must exercise his faith in the difficulties and impossibilities of the situation. Again the Lord repeats to Moses his programme and the end of his dealings: "And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I have gotten me honor upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen."

And now the angel of the Lord in the pillar of cloud and of fire changed his position; he had gone before the people; now he "removed, and went behind them." He came between them and the Egyptians; to the latter "it was cloud and darkness;" to God's own people it "gave light by night;" so that the one came not near the other all the night. God's presence is cloud and darkness to those who know nothing of the slain Lamb, but it is light to his redeemed and saved ones. "Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness." The people must first learn to trust, then God can work his deliverance. Let us never forget that when he was at Nazareth, our Lord could "there do no mighty works. . . . And he marvelled because of their unbelief." Are there none of us who are impatient with God when he delays some deliverance, while we are anxious instead of trustful about it?

Then Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night." He had said it, but his people had not taken in what was so outside of all their experience; Moses alone had been at rest in the certainty of safety in his God. "The redeemed of the Lord" learn to tread where it would naturally have been death to tread, but God had made dry land where there was none. He is equal to all situations; "There is no want to them that fear him." The very waters, which seemed to cut off all escape from the Egyptians, "were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left," and the pillar of cloud was a wall to them in their rear. Oh, how wonderful is our God! The very greatest difficulties are made by him just as soon as we can learn to accept them from him, to take our eyes off the circumstances, to trust, to stand still, and to see the salvation of our God.

The Egyptians pursued; our enemies will always pursue, but if, in very deed, the Lord is between us and them, they cannot touch us; the presence of God is a sure shield, an impossible barrier. They went after God's people on to ground which God had made only for his redeemed, but they were not covered by the blood of the Lamb; and the way of life for Israel was the way of death for Egypt. The whole of the Egyptian army was already marching over the dried-up bed of the sea; it was a daring thing for Pharaoh, after all the lessons which God had taught him, to intrude thus upon this God-made ground. It was not courage, but the audacity of a man who has yielded himself to Satan in conscious rebellion against God. But surely those who reject the atonement of Christ and yet claim fellowship with God, are guilty of a like sin.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

the Egyptians discovered the death of their eldest children they hurried the Hebrews away in terror and dismay, lest still greater calamities should fall upon them. In our translation it is stated that the Hebrews borrowed of the Egyptians jewels and valuables. The word has given rise to a misconception. The Hebrew word occurs in several other parts of the Bible and is nowhere but in this place rendered borrowed. Elsewhere it is translated, "asked." It should be so here, and it means that they asked the gifts which are usually given to a servant when he leaves his employment, what is now known in Oriental lands under the name of "backsheesh." The Egyptians willingly complied, being glad that the Hebrews should go on any terms. So, the whole people set out with the plain of Succoth as a rendezvous. This was the usual camping-ground for caravans bound eastward. Although there were three routes to Palestine, circumstances compelled them to take the longest one. The Bible says there were about six hundred thousand men, and the company must therefore have numbered in all about two million. One of the ways was blocked by a fortified wall, which was held by the Egyptians; a second led through the Philistine country, through which there was little chance of their going in so large numbers in safety. The third route by the Red Sea was therefore the one selected. Assuming that Rameses or Goshen lay to the east of the Nile, the great company moved in a south easterly direction toward the head of the gulf of Suez. Resting at Etham, a new course was taken thence and a circuit made, bringing them again into Egyptian territory. Divinely led, they came to a place called Pi-hahiroth, on the borders of the Red Sea. It appears to have been about fifty miles from Rameses which would be about as far as they could go in three days. Here the ominous news reached them that Pharaoh was coming in pursuit of them with the pick of his army. The people lost heart at once, and reproached Moses. Their words give us light on the difficulties Moses had experienced in his work which was not given directly in the narrative. They reminded him that they had been opposed to the movement at the start, and said to him, "Let us alone that we may serve the Egyptians." Moses must have felt that he had a thankless task in saving such a people. So every reformer and deliverer has suffered. The reproaches must have been hard to bear, and Moses went to God in his perplexity. The deliverance is described in the lesson. Scholars are at issue as to the place where it occurred. There is a growing opinion among explorers that it was near the Suez canal in the bitter lake district, farther north than the gulf now extends. Others think that the passage was made at the head of the Gulf, where a northeast wind still often drives the water back, and where in the spring, when the Israelites crossed, there is a difference of fully nine feet between high and low tide.

Made the sea dry land. God often opens a way for those who trust in him, when all ways seem closed. Mr. Spurgeon used to tell a story of an incident which occurred in the home of his grandfather where he was brought up. The old man was a poor minister who had to practice the utmost frugality to cover the expenses of his household. It was therefore a sad misfortune to him when his cow died. The poor pastor's children were then left without their staff of life. His wife was a practical woman of somewhat weak faith. "What shall we do now?" she asked her husband. "God will provide," was the reply. "But," said the wife, "in the meantime where shall I get milk for the children?" The husband shook his head. "I don't know," he said, "but all will be right. God knows about it, and he will see that provision is made. Do not worry." The good man went on with his work, perfectly at ease, although he could not see, any more than his wife could, how the need would be met. The confidence was justified. On the previous day, a meeting had been held 80 miles away in London of a Board of Trustees who had charge of a fund for the benefit of needy ministers. Old Mr. Spurgeon had never made applications for help from this fund; but on this particular day when all appropriations had been made there was a balance worth $25 left over. A member of the Board not knowing of the special need in the Spurgeon household — indeed at that time it had not arisen — proposed that the $25 should be sent to Mr. Spurgeon whom he knew. Another member of the Board supported the proposition adding that Spurgeon was a very worthy man, and "here," said he, "is something to send with it," and he put down a bank note for double the amount. "I should like to add a little to that gift," said another member, and he put down a note worth $25. So the whole hundred dollars were sent which was sufficient to buy another cow, and it reached the good minister within an hour of the time when he had made his declaration of faith in God's providing care.

Cloud and darkness to them . . . but light to these. One of Shakespeare's characters is represented describing the death of a libertine and drunkard to a party of the dead man's friends. They urge her to tell just what he said and how he died. She said that he was much troubled and often spoke of God, and "I to comfort him bid him 'a should not think of God.'" The Christian dying would think that a strange way of comforting him, for at such a time his only hope is in God. But the woman's conduct was perfectly natural, because the dying man would surely be troubled by the thought that he was going to meet God. So much depends on our standpoint. Those who love God and serve him in life, necessarily must have a very different emotion aroused by the mention of him when they are dying, from the emotion aroused in the breast of one who has not made his peace with him. The difference is as great as that between the emotions experienced in the two parties who on that night were crossing the Red Sea, when God looked from the pillar of cloud.

The children of Israel went into the midst of the sea. These must have been some who were in great terror, but there is safety in obedience to God's commands. The first duty is obedience and God will take care of the rest. A German captain was some time ago drilling a company of volunteers. The parade ground was a field close to the sea-side. They were marching in the line of the water, at some distance from it. He resolved to give them an order to march directly towards the water, and see how far they would go. The men are marching along. "Halt company," says the captain. In a moment they halt. "Right face" is the next word, and instantly they wheel round. "Forward march is then the order, in the captain's broken English. At once they begin to march directly towards the water; or they go, nearer and nearer to it. Soon they reach the edge of the water. Then there is a sudden halt. "Vat for you stop? I no say halt," cried the captain. "Why, captain, here is the water," said one of the men. "Vell, vot of it?" cried he, greatly excited. "vater is nothing; fire is nothing; every thing is nothing; ven I say forward march den you must forward march." The captain was right; the first duty of a soldier is to learn to obey.

Gideon's Fountain at Dothan.

Our Traveler Halted by Turkish Red-Tape—Camping at the Fountain—Two Rival "Joseph's Wells."

WE diverge from the regular route connecting Jezreel with Nablous, because Alcides has a strong desire, dating from his childish liking for "Gideon's band," to visit Gideon's Fountain. It is but a mile or so from our road. The rocks bound it on one side; on the other marsh lands stretch away into arid slopes which lose themselves in the barren bleakness of the mountains of Gilboa. Had David lived in this century, he would not have troubled himself to call down the curse of dewless and rainless seasons upon the naked sides and bald brows.

The "Fountain" is a shallow pool, perhaps sixty feet square, having its source in the rocks and finding an outlet in the sluggish brook. Of course, everybody alights for a drink at the spot where we imagine Gideon may have tested the qualifications of his host for the expedition of the morrow, and equally, of course, nobody gets down upon his knees upon the brink to put his lips to the water. Then the horses are ridden slowly across the fountain and back again to wash and cool their hoofs.

"Dr. Sharpe does not believe that this is the pool of Gideon," remarks our guide, letting Dervish stand for a grateful minute up to the fetlocks in the gliding stream. "And Dr. Sharpe is a very learned man. However, we have always been told that it was here that the three hundred were chosen to march against the enemy encamped upon the Plain of Esdraelon. If the Captain,"—a title newly bestowed by him upon Alcides—"will turn to Judges, chapter sixth, and fifth verse, he will there read how they came up with their cattle and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude; for both they and their camels were without number; and they entered into the land to destroy it." No wonder Gideon was afraid to undertake the business of dispersing them. See verse fifteenth, if you please, sir—where he asks the Lord—"Wherewith shall I save Israel? Behold, my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house." At that very time, he was himself threshing his wheat when it was hardly ripe, to keep it out of the hands of the Midianites.

The clouds return after the rain, this time in a steady downpour, before we gain the shelter of the camp. It is pitched without the precincts of Jenin, a market-town for the surrounding country, situated near the southern point of the mighty oasis we have been traversing, and which, I may say here, becomes impassable during the January rains, to blossom with lily and rose and a riotous host of other wild flowers in March and April. Through the descending floods we made out the outlines of what looked like a barrack as we hurried into the tents. Before we have had time or means for drawing a dry breath we are advised that we are uncomfortably near an arm of law, if not of order, by the apparition of a couple of uniformed representatives. It is not easy to lay hand immediately upon the passports for which we have had no use since leaving Damascus, but it is presently apparent that they must be exhibited to the doughty officer who does the talking. He may be the embodiment of the armed constabulary of his city, or responsible to his government for all suspicious strangers found loitering under the walls of Jenin. He is peremptory enough to be a triune Mayor, High Sheriff and Pacha, as he drips over John's cook-stove, and rains Arabic gutturals upon the conductor of the obnoxious foreigners.

It is the first moment of actual discomfort we have had in camp, for everything is wet that the rain could reach, and Syrian rain is a force to be remembered when once encountered. But a damp portmanteau is hastily overhauled, and from the very bottom is dragged a long envelope, marked "Passports," armed with which Alcides dashes across the rainy area to present it, defiantly, to His Highmightiness. David intercepts it, unfolds it in the kitchen-tent and extends it in dumb dignity. The official motions to Imbarak to hold a candle at his shoulder, and proceeds to peruse the document from top to bottom. Seen from the tent-door opposite, the scene has striking features, and Rembrandtish effects of light and gloom. We have time to study them all before the official snatches the candle and throws the gleam full upon the face of Alcides, standing unguardedly near.

"He has a beard!" dramatically. If he does not add, "It is not so nominated in the bond," it is because Shakespeare is an unknown quantity in the list of his learning and accomplishments. He insists upon what amounts to the same thing, and so doggedly that for the only time upon record, our worthy dragoman for a season bids farewell to his temper, and absolutely talks his countryman into shamed silence.

This is the first insult offered his travelers, and he means that it shall be the last, if he has to complain to the government in person of the stupidity of a man who pretends to serve it, and does not know that a gentleman has a right to shave his chin, or to let his beard grow, as pleases him, without asking permission of the Jenin police. No! the gentleman will not go up to the town, or one step out of his tent, to have his passport "vised." The official knows, as well as the speaker, that the office where this should be done is locked up for the night. If he—the official—wants to pocket the contemptible "beschlik" (sixpence) it would cost to "vise" the "tezkere" (passport), the speaker will pay it to him out of hand, and here, to end a matter that disgraces the honorable Government under which both parties live. The conclusion of the whole matter is the ignominious retreat of the intruder, followed by his subordinate, who has not uttered a sound throughout the affair, and the business of camp-life can go on in the customary manner. David's calm spirit is too deeply ruffled to subside at once, and as we sink to slumber three hours thereafter, we catch, between the dashes of rain upon the canvas roof, the murmur, not loud, but deep, of his rehearsal of the grievance to his lieutenants as they smoke together in the kitchen-tent.

Camp is broken next morning, and the cavalcade sets forward under a sky as softly blue as ever bowed over Italy. Our first halt is at "Joseph's Well."

"What we believe is the pit into which his brethren put him," is our introduction to the walled quadrangle and old stone building toward which the horses turn of their own accord.

"But we surely passed such a pit, four days ago?"

"The Mohammedans are responsible for that blunder, sir. They claim that Joseph was let down into that well. Whereas, as every reader of the Old Testament knows, we learn in the thirty-seventh chapter of Genesis, the seventeenth verse, that Joseph's brethren were in Dothan. This is Dothan."

As to the last statement, there is no question. We exchange incredulous glances as, after having left the horse with Serkeese, severely enjoining him to keep his wits and all the bridles well in hand, we enter a gap in the low stone wall and perceive that the building it surrounds is a mill, erected above a square well. A water-wheel turns creakingly within this, constructed after a primitive pattern, jars being bound to the broad rim, going down empty and coming up full. The place is very dark until our eyes become accustomed to the change from the outer day; we walk up to the "pit," and look down into it.

"And the pit was empty; there was no water in it! Is it ever dry now?"

There is one in Egypt, the peculiar property of the Copts. The place has other associations of which we speak softly to one another, after we have lunched, and David and Serkeese are breaking their fast in the shadow of old walls. The country is fertile and beautiful with olive orchards.

A GROUP OUTSIDE THE MILL.

(From a photograph by Marion Harland.)

The wet leaves glisten in the morning hours as from a bath of silver, and now, as far as the eye can reach, clothe the plain, and round off the heights. Hermon shows faint but fair, in the remote distance, already a beloved land-mark for which we look upon rising each hill. Peasants are ploughing the brown fields with patient oxen, flocks of crows—gray instead of black—hopping and foraging in the shallow furrows.

In these meadows the sons of Jacob fed their flock, and compared notes concerning the little brother who was taking unwarrantable airs upon himself. We pictured them herding morosely together at sight of the slender figure crossing the plain, appearing and reappearing under the low olive-boughs. They would know him, when vet a long way off, by the many-colored coat. Did he fling it back as he ran, as the fellaheen whose salute we return as he goes by to the mill-yard, lets his brown-and-white abieh slip from one shoulder?

The boy had told tales out of school to their old father of the misdoings of his half-brothers, but his dreams were a more grievous offence in their sight. If—our mood more confiding with our talk—they did, indeed, cast him into the (then dry) pit behind us, they must have awaited his approach about where we were sitting upon the sun-warmed rocks, and in sight of the old caravan road from Gilead to Egypt. They were eating their luncheon (maybe nigh unto the spot selected by our attendants to-day, who knows?) when they espied the dark line of Ishmaelites with their camels, bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it to the richest land in the known world.

The Dothan—compassed at night by a host, both with horses and chariots, sent to take the prophet who told the King of Israel the words spoken by the King of Syria in his bed-chamber—has disappeared from the face of the earth with lesser and greater cities of the Holy Land. We do not know which of the picturesque hills bounding our view was the "mountain full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha," made visible to the eyes of the terrified servant in answer to his master's prayer. But the way by which the blinded Syrian troops were led by Elisha to Samaria must be nearly, if not quite, the route we were to take this afternoon.

COLORED MISSIONARY IN AFRICA.

The successful work of a colored missionary in Virginia, who has been living in the Congo country, is described in a Presbyterian journal. It appears that Mr. Sheppard, a young colored student, was impressed by the needs of Africa and volunteered to go. He had for his colleague in missionary work, Mr. Lapsley, the son of a slave owner. Desiring to penetrate the Kuba country, the white man was refused permission to enter; the king had no objection to the colored man going and he went. Mr. Lapsley is now dead and Mr. Sheppard has come home hoping to obtain two consecrated colored men to go back with him.

The miller holds up his hands in deprecation. What would, then, become of his business? And the visitors can see for themselves how many bring hither corn to be ground.

They are sitting about on stones outside, genuine children of Ishmael, albeit lounging against the wall precisely as Yankee and Western loungers haunt grist-mill or "store."

"The sight makes one quite homesick!" declares Alcides, pensively. "All they lack to complete the picture is the national jack-knife and shingle."

The one exception to what passes with the saturnine race for sociability, is a solitary wrapped in his abieh and withdrawn to a corner of the mill-yard. Beside him on the wall are the trappings of a horse or mule. He regards us gloomily from the shadows of his kayfeyeh. In the kodak-book he is registered as a "Study of Reuben." Gen. 37: 29, 30.

Try as we will, we cannot take Joseph's Pit seriously. There are two many of them.

OUT OF THE RUTS.

THE Church of to-day is divided into two parties—the Ruts and the Anti-Ruts. The former are in favor of driving along in just the way that all the preceding religious vehicles have gone. They want ministers to run their sermons along the same established grooves, and their prayers. Anything new, in manner or mode, is frightful. They say, "Who ever heard of such a thing? My father and my grandfather and my great-grandfather never did. These new men are disorganizers and iconoclasts. Their front wheels have got out of the ruts. Pull these innovators off of the box! They are not fit to drive. By some strong ecclesiastical pry let us get the clerical wagon down up to the hubs in the old crevices."

But the Anti-Ruts would rather be out than in the old grooves. Yet they want to be sure that they are on the right road. It is the terminus they are looking after, not so much the way of reaching it. They have rougher riding than those who keep in the ruts. The vehicle bounces sometimes fearfully. Obstacles are apt to be thrown in their way. These persons get now and then a sound jolt; but that is good for indigestion. Besides, roughnesses in the road are apt to keep a man wide-awake and observant of the scenery. The Anti-Ruts can more easily change their course if they desire so to do. We like them better than their antagonists. We see no reason why a sermon should have the stereotyped three heads, when one head, or ten heads, would be more convenient and effective; nor why it should begin with an exordium preparing an audience for a discourse, if they happen to be already prepared; nor of postponing the application of a sermon to the close, if one feels like making a running application; nor of sticking to stale modes of illustrating truth when you know of something else that will shake the people up more effectively; nor why a church should be conducted like all other churches, when you think you have a better plan. Let us say to young men that their safety depends in never starting in the old grooves. Get once in the regular ruts, and you cannot get out without breaking the shafts or twisting the tire off the wheel. We have seen teamsters by the quarter of an hour trying to get the carts out of the old track; and the horses sweated, and the driver lost his patience. If a young man start in the rut at eighteen, he will be in the rut at eighty. An octogenarian at twenty-four is an Egyptian mummy, fit only for the shelf of a museum and to be laid away amid fossiliferous specimens.

So much as to mode. As to the matter, put into it as much of Christian sunshine as we can. Almost any one can endure a word of encouragement. There is nothing more depressing in a commercial or mechanical establishment, when a young man is trying to do his duty, than to meet with entire silence on the part of his employers, save when he has done something wrong or failed in a specific undertaking. And if men need encouragement in secular service, how much more do they need it in the service of God! Let Christian men tell all the joyous things they know, and recite the most exhilarant promises of the Gospel, and breathe out of their own life anything, by way of encouragement, into the hearts of those who may be depressed and despondent. The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is the grandest practical encouragement any man can have. It is not a mere sentiment or whim or phantasy; it is something which a man may enter with his entire physical, mental, and moral nature.

The religion of Jesus Christ is illumination. There are a thousand things in life that are very dark to us. There are many things in our own constitution that need explanation. We are coming across a hundred things in life that are beyond our capacity for solution. How grand to come back from all the mysteries in life to the glorious Gospel, and find there an explanation for everything! The religion of Christ is never in all the Bible once represented as darkness. It is a lamp. It is a lantern. It is a daybreak. It is a noontide glory. It is an irradiation. More than that, our religion is warmth. It is not a light falling on icebergs. It is sympathy, kindness, congeniality. There may be men so egotistical or so self-poised that they can go through life without any help on the part of others; but we do not know such men.

The vast majority of persons whom we have happened to meet are those who need the comfort, the all-heartedness of religion. It is more than all this, for it is an anticipation. It pays down into a man's soul certain instalments of grace and satisfaction, but it goes on to say there will be other instalments—when days of trial and perplexity come, more instalments; when death itself shall appear before the soul, another instalment; the final instalment when the soul stands before the throne of God eternally emancipated. So that, however much religion may be to us now, it is a very small affair compared with what it will be to us after awhile, when we have clambered up into the higher associations, and have gained other victories.

LETTER-WRITING FOR SOULS.

MANY of our readers during the course of the year write hundreds of letters. They usually begin with the cold "Sir," and end with the cold "Respectfully," and all between filled up with dollars, cents, per centages, pounds, yards, articles of merchandise. Can it be that you have never, in your letter-writing from day to day, expressed your friendship for Christ and for those who love him? Many of those to whom you wrote are Christian merchants. Do you not greet them kindly and lovingly? Some of them are old, and they want condolence now that the ailments of life have come upon them. Why do you not recite some of your own experiences, and in some of those business letters tell them of the God of Isaac and Jacob and of Paul the aged, and of all those who put their trust in him? Why do you not tell them that when the eyesight fails, and the limbs tremble, and the appetite becomes uncertain, and the foot that once leaped like the hart, staggers and stumbles along the street—why do you not tell them that there is such a thing as eternal youth, and that those who gain it shall always have good vision and always be strong and always young in the presence of their God?

Then you write to many men in mid-life who are staggering on the verge of great temptations. Why do you not tell them of the God who is willing to be beside them in the fire? You know from the circumstances of those business men that they are tried from day to day. You have heard their credit is not as good as it once was.

Why do you not bring the Gospel of Jesus Christ in your business letters to those men?

Then, some of them are young men. They have started out in life, and for the first time they feel the pressure of active business life. They are mightily tempted. You know how hard it is for a young man in this day to start in business and succeed in it. Why do you not tell that young man in your letter to-morrow that you have been through all that struggle, and know all about business life, its disappointments and perplexities? Let us make our correspondence a Christian correspondence. There is no getting away from a pungent, Christian letter.

OCEAN SCARES.

WE find much trepidation among those who are expecting to visit Europe this summer. Some of the people who have engaged passage for Europe are wondering whether they had better start or allow their friends to start. Absurd! There never was a safer time to cross the ocean than now. Pilots and captains and stokers were never more careful than they will be this season. The sea is a nurse for a thousand aches and disquietudes. You cannot hear the door-bell there, and no telegrams will chase you, as the submarine wire has no stations midway the Atlantic.

There may be dangers on the sea, but there are dangers also on the land. Better not walk down the street, for a wall may drop on you. Better not ride in a carriage, for a horse may run away with you. Better not eat your dinner, for a wicked servant may have dropped some poison in it. If a man wants to hunt up dangers, he can find whole flocks of them, multitudinous as quails starting up at the first snap of his fire-lock. Better get your accounts settled for the next world, and then quit all your apprehensions, and, if you can afford the time and the money, go across the Atlantic and see the churches, and towers, and institutions which were old when Christopher Columbus was a baby. And, as we may not see you again before you go—good-by! We will look after things as well as we can while you are gone. Put a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in your pocket as a sort of life-preserver. As you sail down the Bay, we shake out after you our newly-ironed white pocket-handkerchief.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Sidney Aldrich, Wells Bridge, N. Y. How were the various cities of Egypt that we read of being uncovered and discovered, covered up? Was it by volcanic eruptions or some other cause?

Many were levelled by war, and the debris built over; others were engulfed by volcanic eruption, earthquake, sand storm, or inundation of the sea.

D. W. Underwood, New Bedford, Mass. Please locate the following passage: "I, even I, am he that blotted out thy sins by the blood of my Son: I will forgive thee all, notwithstanding thy rebellion, and thy too great lukewarmness."

It is not in the Bible. The nearest to it is Isa. 43: 25. The quotation may be a mingling of several passages.

S. M. Liscomb, Buffalo, N. Y. What is the cost per annum of the standing armies of the European Powers in times of war and in peace?

We have not all the data at hand, but recent statistics show that, in 1892, the aggregate annual cost of European armament, by land and sea, was $1,650,000,000. At the same time, the combined national debts of Europe reached the sum of $25,000,000,000, or five thousand millions sterling.

Subscriber, Mitchellville, Md. 1. At what time were Cleopatra's needles built? 2. Of what material? 3. Were they so called in honor of that queen?

1. They are believed to have been built in Heliopolis, Egypt, in the sixteenth century before the Christian era. 2. Red granitic stone. 3. They were probably re-named in her honor, centuries afterward.

B. Wahlman, Junction, N. J. An aged Christian, now ill, recollects this couplet from a stanza quoted seventy years ago in a class-meeting room in England. Can any of your many readers supply the rest?

My Jesus hath done all things well."

Perhaps some reader may be able to furnish the desired information.

J. G. Randall, D-a Molnes, Ia. It seems to me that Christians of all sects and denominations should get into the way of wearing a distinguishing badge by which to confess their belief in a saving Christ, and also to recognize one another. The Salvation Army use a uniform and a badge; the numerous benevolent and secret societies wear something for members to recognize one another by. In English seaports, Christian captains of vessels and fishing boats fly a particular flag to know each other by—a small triangular white flag with blue star in the centre. Now, why should not all denominations of Christians unite on some small, neat, distinguishing badge to be worn on the dress, for this purpose, something entirely unsectarian and perhaps not involving even a connection with any church—this as it may be thought best; say a piece of purple ribbon with G. A. C., in letters of gold (Grand Army of the Cross).

Subscriber, Camden, N. J. and others. What is the origin of Children's Day?

In 1868, the Methodist General Conference recommended the annual observance of the second Sunday in June as Children's Day; in 1870, the Methodist Board of Education took similar action, and two years later, the General Conference adopted a disciplinary rule, establishing the day. In 1881, the Methodist Ecumenical Council in London, in its official address, recommended the general adoption of "one day in every year as Children's Day." Two years later, the Presbyterian General Assembly designated the second Sunday in June, and this was followed in 1887 by similar action on the part of the Congregational Churches, the other denominations subsequently doing the same.

A. R. L. If a lady and gentleman were to go through the marriage ceremony together, and promised each other as they would before a minister, would they be married in the sight of God, providing there was one witness? Would it be a sin to do so? Would it be a legal marriage in the sight of the world?

Marriage ceremonies that are not performed by regularly ordained pastors in the case of a religious ceremony, or by the authorized official in civil marriages, are irregular and unrecognized by the courts and the community. Such ceremonies, if intended seriously, are a disgraceful travesty of a sacred ordinance, and, if undertaken in the spirit of jest, are not only sinful, but in execrable taste. No Christian can afford to have a share in such follies. "Mock marriages" are usually prolific of evil to all concerned, and unsolemnized, irregular marriages usually result in leaving the wife at the mercy of one who should have begun the new relation by surrounding her with every honorable safeguard and protection. No such union as our correspondent describes can hope for the divine approval.

THE BURNED TABERNACLE.

THE story of the burning of the Brooklyn Tabernacle on May 13 was told in these columns last week. On this page is a picture, reproduced from a photograph, of the ruins, as they appeared on the day after the fire, before the fire department had pulled down the portions of the walls which menaced the safety of the public. The picture shows how complete was the destruction of the edifice and all it contained. The loss of the magnificent organ, in which the fire started that consumed the church, is regarded on all hands as nothing short of a public calamity, for it was the finest instrument of its kind in the city, if not in the whole country.

Messages of sympathy with Dr. Talmage and his church have come from all quarters, and the famous preacher and his friends have been deeply touched by the general kindness shown to them in their trouble. They also feel how providential it was that the fire should have occurred at a time when no congregation was assembled within its walls, and that with all the destruction of property, not a single life was lost. For this and for the condolence of friends the world over, they are devoutly thankful, but they must mourn as did the prophet of old, that "Our holy and our beautiful house is burned with fire, and all our pleasant things are laid waste." (Isa. 64: 11.)

Self-Generating Light.

A novel experiment in lighting moving trains has been tried during the past week in the cars on the Brooklyn Bridge. Sixteen incandescent burners are attached to the sides of the car and are supplied by a dynamo beneath. The power that works the dynamo comes from the axles of the cars. The lights would go out when the cars are at rest were it not that the axles when in motion generate more electricity than is used by the lights, and this is stored by a new process and keeps the lights burning while the cars are motionless. When the cars start on their return trip, the motion of the axles is reversed, as the cars move on the shuttle principle. It is therefore necessary to reverse the polarity of the dynamo and this is provided for by automatic changer and cut-out, beneath one of the seats of the car. At the experimental trials, the system was a complete success, the lights burned brilliantly not only on the journeys to and fro, but while the cars stood to allow passengers to get on and off. Thus the cars are lighted by their own motion and they get light from the movement which propels them. There is an analogous process in Christian life. Those who under the power of the Holy Spirit go about in Christ's service are seldom troubled by the darkness of doubt. They get light from the same source that gives them strength and energy. Jesus said: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." (John 7: 17.)

A Long Journey for Help.

A weather-beaten life-boat reached Savannah, Ga., on May 15, which had made a long and perilous voyage. It belonged to the steamer "Clandeboyne" then anchored two hundred miles from the Bahama Islands. Four stalwart sailors whose faces if, instead of seeking help from any other voyagers, going from one to another teacher for guidance, he would go to God for help and light, he would save himself trouble and disappointment. (James 1: 5.)

Married By Proxy.

A singular marriage ceremony was performed in New York on May 11. It was a wedding at which the bridegroom was not present. He was lying ill at El Paso, Tex. He, like his bride, was a resident of New York, and they had been engaged for some time, but owing to various circumstances the marriage had been postponed. Three months ago the young man's health failed, and he went to El Paso in the hope of recovering. There he became worse, and was told by his physician that death was near and inevitable. He had set his heart on being married, and he knew how sorely the young lady would grieve if he died without making her his wife. He therefore telegraphed to her, asking her to arrange a marriage by proxy. She consulted a lawyer who assured her that, as marriage was a contract, it might, like any other contract, be entered upon by a properly accredited landslides have already occurred, the last one carrying away a large house. In an outlying part of the town the river has undermined the ground on which five houses stood and they have fallen in ruins. The foundations of the railroad bridge have also been weakened, and it is feared that if that gives away the whole village will be swept off by the current. The people appear to be fully aware of their danger, and are deserting the exposed places, so unless some large section of land suddenly becomes detached, it may be hoped that there will be no loss of life. So much cannot be hoped of some who are in spiritual danger. When a man has built all his hopes on this world, and all his thoughts are occupied with worldly things, he is apt to forget that the world passeth away and only those are secure who have a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. (II Cor. 5: 1.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Sunday School of THE BROOKLYN TABERNACLE held a large and enthusiastic meeting on May 20, in the Pouch Mansion on Clinton avenue, near the site of the burned church. This was the first meeting since the destruction of the church, and notwithstanding the stormy weather the attendance was unusually large. A vote was taken as to whether the sessions should be continued until the commencement of the summer vacation and it was unanimously in favor of doing so. The school also determined to support spiritually and financially the evangelistic services which Rev. B. Fay Mills has arranged to conduct during Dr. Talmage's absence. The prospects of rebuilding the Tabernacle are encouraging and every effort in that direction will have the hearty sympathy and co-operation of the Sunday School.

A Protest against the election of Rev. Thomas Spurgeon to the pastorate of the Metropolitan Tabernacle has been numerous signed and sent to the elders and deacons of the church. The petition asked that if it was deemed necessary to appoint Mr. Spurgeon, Dr. Pierson might be invited to become Mr. Spurgeon's copastor. The elders and deacons in reply declined to accede to the request, believing such an arrangement would be detrimental to the interests of the church.

The World's Blind are computed to number about 1,000,000—about one sightless person to every 1,480 of the population.

The Statistics of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for 1894, just published, show a total membership, ministerial and lay, of 1,345,210, a gain during the past year of 39,405. The number of itinerant preachers is 5,487, a gain of 119, and of local preachers, 6,513, a gain of 32.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's Services at Mobile, Ala., have stirred the whole city. The Mobile Daily Register, says, the service on Sunday afternoon, May 30, was the most memorable meeting in the history of the city since the war. It was a meeting for men only, and was held in the rink, which was thronged. About 150 rose to ask the prayers of God's people for their conversion.

The United Presbyterian Church has one more synod and two more presbyteries than it had last year. There are 833 ministers, an increase of 23; 70 students in theology, a gain of 4; 939 congregations, which is 4 more than last year; and 175,272 members, which is a net gain of a little over 4,000. There are 1,096 Sunday Schools, with 101,667 scholars. The total contributions of the church were $1,506,064.

Mrs. M. Baxter with Pastor and Mrs. Stockmayer, have been holding meetings at Manchester, N. H. in the People's Tabernacle. Early next month they have arranged for a series of meetings at Mount Pleasant, O. Their services in New York attracted wide attention and were the means of great blessing. The afternoon services were in German, and were held in the Second Street Methodist Church, and the evening services in English in the Hope of Israel Mission in Madison street.

and limbs bore marks of exposure to wind and weather, manned the life-boat. They said that the steamer to which they belonged started from Cardiff, in Wales, on April 2d, on a voyage to Vera Cruz. On April 22d she broke her shaft and the crew were unable to repair it. The vessel had drifted helplessly for seventeen days, the crew eagerly looking for a sight of land or some steamer that would take them in tow. There was no help from either quarter and as the provisions were getting low the captain concluded that the only hope lay in sending a boat to the nearest land. The four sailors volunteered for the dangerous service. They were supplied with a compass and provisions and set out. They rowed day and night for nearly a week having gone two hundred miles out of their course in efforts to attract the notice of steamers whose smoke they saw on the horizon. At last, they ceased these efforts and directed their course to the land where they were sure of obtaining help. Soon after their arrival at Savannah, two tugs were dispatched to tow the disabled steamer into port. It is much to be wished that when a man is in need of spiritual help he would adopt that course.

deputy. Armed with this opinion, she found a clergyman willing to perform the strange ceremony. A young man who was a friend of the absent bridegroom consented to represent him on the occasion, and made the promises on his behalf. Forty-eight hours after the conclusion of the ceremony, a telegram from El Paso informed the bride that she had become a widow. Eminent lawyers doubt the validity of the marriage, but it appears to have contented the parties concerned, and the widow calls herself by the name of the dead man. Whether she has the right to do so, the courts may yet have to decide. There are many persons who call themselves by the name of Christ, whom he will refuse to acknowledge at the marriage supper of the Lamb, and some of them have been assured of their union with him by men who claim to represent him here upon earth. (Matt. 7: 22, 23.)

THE PUNISHMENT OF SIN.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning June 10. Ps. 1: 1-6; Rom. 5: 12-21.

LESS of difficulty and mystery would be involved in the doctrine of the eternal punishment of sin, if our own human experience were consulted, rather than our intellect only. Every father and mother and teacher has enough suggestions in the attitude of a child and the success or failure of the methods employed in managing him, to give the clue to the problem of God's government. Christ's revelation had for its key-note the fatherhood of God. He not only spoke of him as his own Father, but as the Father of ordinary men and, in the prayer he gave as a pattern, taught them to address him as "Our Father." It is not therefore presumptuous, in trying to understand what God is, to look for analogies in the affections and solicitude of human fatherhood. We infer from Christ's words that as a human father feels toward his children, so with infinite wisdom and power and love God feels toward men. How, then, does a father treat his son, who has misbehaved himself? If he is wise,—and it is only the wisest and best of fathers who can in any degree help by analogy in the solution of the problem—he does not lightly pass over misconduct. He argues that the boy if unrepented will continue behaving badly, will grow up a bad man, will ruin his own life and be a nuisance in the world. For his own sake the boy must be reprov'd and, if he is unrepentant and persistent in wrongdoing he must be punished. The higher and the purer his own character, the more is the father shocked and grieved by seeing in his son proclivities to evil. He loathes them and longs to eradicate them before they develop and gain greater power. The rules of the household must be obeyed, otherwise the son may grow up a lawless man. He must be taught the beauty of unselfishness, the glory of purity and the necessity for bringing his lower nature into sub-servience to his spirit, otherwise his manhood will be degraded, sordid and mischievous. With some children an explanation of all this is possible. With others, who are dull and stupid, no explanation has any influence and punishment in one form or another must be administered, that the boy may learn obedience by the things that he suffers.

If all discipline and all effort to reclaim him fail and the boy grows up a bad man, the father mourns and deplores his conduct and would lose no opportunity of doing him good; but he would make it clear to his son that while he loves him, he hates the life he is leading. There could be no association, no affectionate intercourse, so long as he persisted in that life. He is forbidden coming to the paternal home; he is no longer regarded as one of the family; and, as an extreme measure, his name is omitted from his father's will. No one is surprised that a father acts so toward an incorrigible son.

that if he could, or would, separate himself from the evil, that his father would welcome him with gladness. He has excluded himself from his home and his father's heart.

THE BROOKLYN C. E. CONVENTION.

Brooklyn's Christian Endeavor Union held its annual Convention on May 16-17, in Tompkins Ave. Congregational Church. Seldom has the city witnessed so large and enthusiastic a gathering of any religious society. It opened with a sunrise prayer at 6.30 A.M., at which over three hundred persons were present. At the first evening meeting, stirring addresses were delivered by Rev. H. C. Farrar, D.D. of Albany and Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D. of New York. Dr. Burrell's address was on "Good Citizenship," and he made a strong plea to the young men of the Christian Endeavor Society to help in the great work of reforming and purifying municipal government. He thought if Jesus Christ came to New York he would not say as he did in Palestine, like men, upholding with stalwart steadfastness the institutions of truth and righteousness, the waste places of the earth shall be glad because of them, and the coming of the Lord shall surely be hastened in his time."

During the year the Brooklyn Union has made rapid progress. The report read on May 17 by Mr. Samuel S. McCurdy, the Secretary of the Union, showed this. Mr. McCurdy said: "At the convention a year ago there were reported 115 Christian Endeavor Societies, 86 senior and 29 junior. To-day we have 136 societies, 94 senior and 42 junior. A year ago the membership of the senior societies was 4,683 active and 1,520 associate. To-day it is 4,674 active and 1,496 associate. Last year the junior membership was 665 active and 133 associate. To-day it is 1,475 active and 232 associate. When we add to these figures the number of our affiliated members, we have in our county a Christian Endeavor army of nearly 9,000. Although the Congregationalists maintain their lead in number of societies, having twenty-four to their credit, they are excelled in point of actual membership by the Presbyterians with their twenty-two societies." The Baptist and Reformed societies number seventeen each. The Reformed Episcopal and African Methodist Episcopal churches are represented by two societies each, and nearly every other evangelical denomination in the city is represented by one society."

Dr. Teunis Hamlin of Washington and Dr. Francis E. Clark, the President of the United Society, and Mrs. Clark were the chief speakers of the second day's session. Dr. Clark, referring to Dr. Burrell's speech of the preceding day, fully endorsed his appeal and said: "I serve notice here that we are not going to be used by any politician or party. But we are in politics to this extent—we stand for the purity of politics and for better government in our cities, our States and our nation. Good men must be elected and good work done or the politicians will hear from our young people."

THE ORDERS.

Epworth Leagues are reminded that there is an Epworth Children's Home at Ravenswood, Chicago. It is now well established and has been a year in operation. Its usefulness is universally acknowledged, but funds are needed, and any League willing to help cannot do better than mail a contribution to the Superintendent, Mrs. Adelaide Abbott, 2297 Commercial street, Ravenswood, Ill.

Nebraska Conference Epworth League is in a flourishing condition. It held its third annual convention at Beatrice lately when 350 delegates attended. The convention continued three days, and is to meet next year at Lincoln.

The Baptist Young People's Unions of Missouri are preparing for a great annual convention to be held at Marshall June 19 and 20. Delegates from every Union in the State will be present, and Baptist Churches which have no young people's societies of any kind are invited to send delegates.

The question of amalgamating the Young Women's Christian Association with the Y. M. C. A. was discussed at the recent convention of the English Y. W. C. A's. The preponderance of opinion seemed to be in favor of co-operation not amalgamation.

ITS GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY.

The Celebration in London of the Fiftieth Birthday of the Young Men's Christian Association—A Royal Reception of Delegates—The Origin of the Movement.

THE date on this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the eve of the great jubilee celebration of the Young Men's Christian Association of the world, respecting which we have given information from time to time during the past few months. On June 1, the great company of delegates from every land will assemble in England's historical fane, Westminster Abbey, when with full choral service led, as a special favor, by the famous choir of the Abbey, the jubilee will be inaugurated by a sermon from the Bishop of London. This will be followed by a reception at Exeter Hall, the headquarters of the London Association, when Dr. Sinclair, Archdeacon of London, will welcome the delegates in speeches in English, French, German and Italian. The grand day of the celebration will be Wednesday, June 6, as it was on June 6, 1844, that the first Young Men's Christian Association was organized. A preparatory service will be held on the previous evening in St. Paul's Cathedral, a vast temple which will accommodate fifteen thousand persons. The most eloquent of English bishops, Dr. Boyd Carpenter, Bishop of Ripon, will preach the sermon, and the musical part of the service will be rendered by the Cathedral choir. The exercises of Jubilee Day include commemorative meetings in Exeter Hall, and a grand demonstration in the great Albert Hall at Kensington. At the latter a choir of a thousand voices will sing choruses from famous Oratorios; there will be an athletic exhibition and a great meeting in the evening, when Canon Fleming, Dr. Joseph Parker, and other eminent clergymen and laymen will speak. A beautiful marble bust of Mr. George Williams, the founder of the Young Men's Christian Association, will be unveiled and presented to him. It is expected that this ceremony will be performed by the Duke of York, the son of the Prince of Wales or some other member of the Royal Family. By special invitation of the queen, the delegates will go on the following day to her royal palace, Windsor Castle, where they will be entertained, and will inspect the royal apartments, and the many treasures of art collected there. The Lord Mayor of London also proposes to give the delegates a hearty welcome on behalf of the city. The Aldermen and Common Council have appropriated five thousand dollars to defray the cost of an entertainment, which will be given in the ancient Guildhall under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. Every day, during the Jubilee week, there will be a great social meal in a large tent erected, by permission of the Lord Mayor, on the Thames embankment. There delegates from all lands will be cordially welcome, and will have an opportunity of making acquaintance with each other in an informal manner. How diversified and international this gathering will be is seen from the fact that when it was decided to print the Doxology in every language of every country to be represented, it was found that it must be printed in no less than twenty-two languages.

The regular delegates are two thousand in number, but these will form only a part of the anniversary assemblages. All members of Young Men's Christian Associations will be welcome and probably more than five times the number of delegates will be present from European and American Associations. The proportion of delegates is one to every five Associations. The United States delegation will be the largest from any one country. Of all the Associations in the world, about one-fourth are located in our land, and reckoning the nationality of all the members of Young Men's Christian Associations, over one-half are residents of the United States. On the opposite page, is a group of eight of the delegates, who will represent our Associations at the Jubilee. Of these, Mr. R. R. McBurney is the General Secretary of the New York Association; Mr. F. J. Fedarb is General Secretary at Ottawa, Ont.; Mr. J. M. Bierce is Chairman of the Ohio State Committee; Mr. I. E. Brown is State Secretary of Illinois; Mr. J. E. Defebaugh is the editor of the "Young Men's Era," the organ of the Young Men's Christian Associations of America; Mr. H. M. Clarke is State Secretary of Michigan; Mr. Fleming H. Revell, the well-known publisher, is a prominent member of the Chicago Association; and Mr. George A. Hall is State Secretary of New York. Beside these, Mr. Thomas K. Cree and other officers of the International Committee, whose portraits appeared in this journal on May 2 are delegates, and will worthily represent the United States in this international assemblage.

The event which is to be celebrated on its fiftieth anniversary was sufficiently inconspicuous at the time it occurred. A few years before, a godly young man, George Williams by name, went up to London from the country districts of Somersetshire to become a clerk to Mr. George Hitchcock who kept a dry-goods store near St. Paul's Cathedral. The young countryman proved to have true business genius, and the London clerks who hold countrymen in light esteem, found him pushing ahead of them, promoted from one department to another until he was at the head of the whole force of clerks and the responsible manager of his branch of the business. His employer had the utmost confidence in him, and to help the young man in his effort to resist temptation and to encourage him to live a godly life.

His first step was to have morning prayer in one of the rooms of the store for all the clerks who were willing to attend. It was a little meeting at first, but the numbers grew. That meeting after the passage of more than half a century is still continued. Most of the clerks at that time lived in the house where the business was conducted, and Mr. Williams had therefore opportunity of having evening meetings. The clerks appreciated his interest in their welfare, which was then unhappily a very rare thing in the great London business establishments. It was far more common to find themselves treated merely as "hands."

Mr. Williams, encouraged by the good resulting from his effort, and knowing how little was being done in the same direction, conceived the idea of organizing a society which should include clerks in other houses. He held a meeting accordingly on June 6, 1844, in the little room, a picture of which appears on this page, of his own helpers and a few others like-minded. There were, he estimated, at that time 150,000 young men serving as clerks in banks and lawyers' and business establishments in London, for of Mr. Williams's employer, who throughout his life was a liberal benefactor and a warm friend to the movement. By the end of the fourth year branches of the Association had been organized in large towns outside of London, and the membership had grown to over a thousand.

How the seed thus sown found a lodgment on this side of the Atlantic is told by the Rev. Russell Sturgis in a communication to the "Young Men's Era." He says that in 1851 the "Watchman," of Boston, Mass., published a letter from an American visitor to London, in which he spoke of the Young Men's Society. Captain Sullivan, an earnest Methodist, saw the letter, and on his next trip across the Atlantic, visited the Society and sent a fuller description of it. The result of his report was a meeting of thirty-two young men in the Central Congregational Church on December 15, 1851, at which it was decided to organize a similar society in Boston, and a meeting was called for the purpose on December 29. It was held in the Old South Chapel in Spring Lane, and there a constitution was drawn up, and the first American Young Men's Christian Association was organized.

Mr. R. P. Parrish, who was one of the thirty-two present at the first meeting gives the same journal his reminiscences of those early days. "Some of our meetings," he says, "seemed more like a prayer-meeting than a social or business meeting, and it seems to me now, after these many years, that God did meet with us. Gradually, others who learned of our work, came into our meetings, and we increased in numbers rapidly. We held larger meetings in the lecture room of Central Church on Winter street. I know of only two besides myself who were the earliest workers in our good cause: Franklin W. Smith and W. W. Mair. Other may be living, but I know not where. We had influence and money with us at once. Francis I. Watts, a learned and Christian lawyer, was our first president,—an Episcopalian. The first large hall occupied was on the third story, corner of Summer and Washington streets, a room 80 by 30 feet. We soon had to procure larger quarters, and went into the older Tremont Temple.

We found great interest centered in our union Sunday evening meetings, which were usually held in the Tremont Temple. We had addresses from the leading divines. Henry Ward Beecher was one great attraction, and would not take any pay for his expenses. The venerable Dr. Stephen Tyng also came to our help. When I think what God has wrought for the good of our young men, and that I was permitted to be one to help in this great work, and from such a small beginning, I feel rejoiced. My happiness in my old age is to realize what has been done and is still doing in this blessed Young Men's Christian Association work, and God bless and help you all to the end of your work on earth and the blessed reward hereafter.

There are now 1,356 Associations in the United States, with 247,707 members, Great Britain and her colonies, including Canada and Australia, have 1,069 Associations, with 112,392 members. Germany's quota is 1,005 Associations and 58,797 members. Holland stands next on the list and Switzerland next. In twenty-two other countries the Association has obtained a foothold; these include Persia, China, Japan, Egypt, Syria and Madagascar. Altogether, the world's grand total, as far as registered is 5,148 Associations, with an aggregate membership of 467,515.

THE ROOM IN WHICH THE FIRST YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION WAS ORGANIZED.

finally when the young man became suitor for his daughter's hand, he gave his consent, and Mr. Williams became his son-in-law and a partner in the firm. Prior, however, to attaining this dignity occurred the event the anniversary of which is to be celebrated this week. Mr. Williams did not leave his religion behind him when he went up to London, nor forget in the great metropolis, as so many country young men do, the godly associations of home. He saw with concern how many temptations surrounded young men new to city life, and, as his responsibility for the clerks in the house increased, this concern increased. He thought something might, and ought, to be done by employers and by good men whom no special religious provision was made. This was in his opinion, a sufficient reason for organizing the society, and so it appeared to his friends. At that meeting a society was formed which was at first called "The Society for Improving the Spiritual Condition of Young Men Engaged in the Drapery and other Trades." That was the acorn from which grew the Association which has spread its branches throughout the world, and now numbers nearly half a million members. The first list of members contained only eight names, and three years afterward there were only seventy, but from that time the number grew rapidly. A convenient room in the business quarter of the city was hired and furnished at the expense

Jericho's Lonely Plain.

One of the Dreariest Spots for Travelers Journeying through Palestine, yet it is all Historic Ground.

FEW pictures afford a better idea of the utter desolation of some parts of the Holy Land, than the photograph reproduced on this page. The plain of Jericho—"the great plain," as it was called in Bible times—had for its eastern boundaries the barren mountains of Moab, and on its western side an equally sterile range of hills, that stretched from Scythopolis to Sodom and the Dead Sea. At one end of the plain, its margin fringed by vegetation and dotted with villages, lay Lake Tiberias, its waters sweet and pellucid as those of a mountain stream; at the other was Lake Asphaltites, buoyant, but bitter, and its borders almost destitute of any signs of animal or vegetable life. The soil of the plain in ancient days was equal to the most fertile sections of Palestine, and even yet, strewn as it is with ruins and rubbish of every description, there are patches that smile out at the traveler in vernal beauty, a pleasing contrast to the general barrenness of the surroundings.

Our photograph, taken at the time when Dr. Talmage, the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and Dr. Louis Klopsch, its proprietor, with their party, passed over the plain en route from Jerusalem to Jericho, shows, more than any mere words can describe, the desolate aspect of what was in bygone ages the pleasure-ground of the Israelitish kings. Jericho, which lay at one end of the plain, was almost a royal city. The Jordan flowed leisurely through this great valley, broadening its channel and hurrying its flight as it neared the Dead Sea. Abundant ruins afford evidence of the existence on the plain of many towns and villages concerning which history tells little or nothing—their very names forgotten in the passing centuries. Tall towers, citadels, fortresses, and palaces, stood where now are broken boulders and innumerable fragments of limestone rock, some with the fragments of cement, laid by workmen thousands of years ago, still clinging to their ragged edges. By what mighty forces those buildings were levelled, whether by siege, or fire, or earthquake, cannot now be determined. Like many of the ruins that lie scattered over the plains and valleys of the land of Moab, across the Jordan, they have come down to us in heaps of unidentified debris, that tell nothing of their history, and only serve to show how complete has been their ruin and how insignificant are the lives and actions and ambitions of men.

Across this plain of Jericho, great armies have ridden, and it has been a frequent scene of battle, with the troops of Pompey and of Ptolemy, Maccabees, Arabs, Saracens, Crusaders, and Moslems, moving in succession in the panorama of its history. In later days, it was the resort of hordes of banditti. Somewhere between Jericho and Jerusalem, is said the scene in the parable mentioned in Luke 10: 30-36.

In the time of Christ's earthly sojourn, the plain was doubtless less of a wilderness than now, and Jericho, then in its early decadence, was still "the City of the Palms," while the surrounding country was rich in orchards and olive groves, and even the plain was dotted with fruit trees, henna plants, and aromatic shrubs. All the palms have disappeared, the valley has grown sterile and the proud city, too, has passed away, its site being occupied by a group of some forty or fifty wretched-looking dwellings, called by the Arabs "Er-Riha." Nearby, a few fields are cultivated by the villagers, who raise crops of potatoes, wheat, and corn. Some fig trees only serve to emphasize the forlornness of the landscape.

It has been frequently remarked by travelers that the people of Er-Riha—the modern Jericho—are regarded with something akin to aversion by the inhabitants of other villages. Their surroundings would indicate that they have sunk to an exceedingly low social and moral level, and their honesty is the prospect of water and some cool oasis, where men and horses may rest and refresh themselves, after the intolerable heat. It is not unusual for a traveling party to pitch its camp at some height on the plain, for the sake of the cooler air and there rest overnight. They are liable, however, to sleep but little, for the heat, the noise of jackals and the incessant croaking of the frogs at the bottom of the hill, put sleep almost out of the question.

A Comforting thought for Parents.

A minister who had lost his child asked another minister to come and preach for him. He came and told how he lived on one side of a river, and felt very little interest in the people on the other side until his daughter was married and went over there to live, and then every morning he went to the window and looked over that river and felt very much concerned about that town and all the people there.

"Now," said he, "I think that as this child has crossed the river, heaven will be much nearer than ever it has been before."

Shall we not just let our hearts and affections be set on the other side of the river? It is but a step; it is but a veil; we shall soon be in the other world.

The Sweet Faith of a Child.

A mother living not far from the post-office, in this city, says a writer in the "Rescue Home," tired with watching over a sick baby, came down stairs for a moment, the other day, to rest for a few seconds. She heard the voice of her little four-year-old girl in the hall by herself; and curious to

A PILGRIM'S SONG.

UP the stepping-stones of time,
Days and weeks and years,
With exultant heart I climb,
Heedless of my fears.
Should I fear, when on this way
Christ, my Saviour, trod?
When, according to my day,
Strength is given by God?

If this strength were only mine,
I should be o'eraken;
But the strength which is divine
Cannot e'er be shaken.
He who gives it formed, the land,
Speaks, and earth is riven;
Holds the waters in his hand,
Reins the winds of heaven.

Tread we thus the heavenly road,
Caring for our brother;
Holding fellowship with God,
Loving one another.
Up the stepping-stones of time,
Days and months and years,
With exultant hearts we climb,
Heedless of our fears.

HEROISM IN WOMAN.

WOMAN is as heroic as man. Her life is just as earnest, writes Rev. John L. Brandt, her trials are just as hard, her conflicts just as sharp, her troubles just as trying, her position just as responsible, and her sphere just as useful as that of man. She operates just as subtle springs, and touches just as many chords as man. Heroism on the part of women has not been as open and conspicuous as on the part of men. Many men have come to the public as heroes who were pushed forward by their heroines. If a woman, as a helpmate of man, makes a heroic struggle against adversity, alongside of her husband, does she not deserve praise and credit as well as he?

Are not the mothers who comfort their children, throw a hallowed influence around them, and encourage them in everything which is true and lofty, worthy of partaking of the name of heroine? The girl who labors in the kitchen, in order to support herself, and stay the hand of intamy, acts the part of a heroine. The wife who, with an invalid husband, or with a trifling husband, sustains herself and family, acts the part of a heroine. The widow who relies on her industry for a livelihood, acts the part of a heroine. The young lady who braves the fashions of life, and attends school until she adorns her mind with useful knowledge, has in her the elements of heroism. The young lady who qualifies herself for business, and preters to make in that business some money that she can call her own, rather than to depend upon her father for all she receives, is worthy of being called a heroine. Hundreds of such heroines are found in shops, in factories, in stores, in kitchens, and in schools; women who went forth to labor. She is a heroine who says: "I shall strive to make myself ready, in body, mind, and soul, for every work that God shall give me."

Why She Loved her Mother.

"Papa, how old was I when mamma died?" asked a little daughter of her parent. "Only six months, my child," he replied. "Then I can't say that I ever saw her, for I don't remember her at all. But you have always tried to make me love her by telling me how good and kind she was; and I do love her, although I have never seen her."

The simple love of the little one for a parent she had not seen was the means of drawing out the love of the father's heart to the Saviour. So familiar an illustration furnishes an unanswerable argument to those who have not yet learned to love him, not having seen him.

TRAVELERS ON THE PLAIN OF JERICHO.

not above suspicion. They annoy travelers by their impudent demands for "back-sheesh," and some of the men volunteer to amuse strangers by performing dances that have a strange resemblance to those common in certain heathen lands. With industry and ambition, these villagers might make a good living out of the soil, for the whole plain is well watered and capable of producing excellent crops. In its present condition, it is little better than a desert, and a survey of it recalls vividly the frequent allusions to this district in those psalms that refer to incidents in the life of David, when he found shelter among the rocks and caves.

There are many gorges, high precipitous banks, and dry channels which, at times, may be filled by mountain torrents, and some of these localities would furnish ideal hiding-places. On the more level lands, such as that shown in the photograph, the dreariness of the scene is unrelieved, save by the piles of ruins and the glimpses of hill and mountain beyond, with know to whom she was talking, stopped a minute at the half-opened door. She saw that the little thing had pulled a chair up in front of the telephone, and stood upon it with the ear piece against the side of her head.

The earnestness of the child showed that she was in no playful mood, and this was the conversation her mother heard, while tears stood thick in her eyes—the little one carrying on both sides, as if she were repeating the answers:

"Hello!" "Well, who's there?" "Is God there?" "Yes." "Tell Jesus I want to speak to him." "Well?" "Is that you, Jesus?" "Yes, what is it?" "Our baby is sick and we want you to let it get well. Won't you?" No answer, and statement and question again repeated, answered by—"Yes."

The little one put the ear piece back on its hook, clambered down from her chair, and with a radiant face went for her mother, who caught her in her arms. The baby, whose life had been despaired of, began to mend that day, and got well.

BIBLE-WOMEN OF CAIRO.

A Lady's Description of the Work of the American U. P. Mission.

MARIE IMANDT, in a recent letter from Cairo, gives a most interesting account of a visit to the headquarters of the United Presbyterian Mission in that city. The work of this mission began there in 1854, and has been vastly extended. There are at present missionaries located at seven central points, and the number of stations now occupied is 156. The work among women seems to be of a most important nature. Not only are the ladies, whose department it is to look to the interests of their sisters in Egypt, changing the ways of looking at the life of these women, but they are inspiring them with a desire to learn to read and to search into the truth of things for themselves. That the women appreciate being taught to read is amply evidenced by the fact that many are willing to pay for lessons from the missionary ladies. These Egyptian women are so ignorant that they cannot understand a chapter read to them from the Bible in Arabic; it has to be reduced to the most simple language. At present, some six or seven hundred women are taking lessons.

"There are three American missionaries in Cairo—Dr. Watson, Rev. William Harvey, D.D., and the Rev. E. M. Giffen. Each of these gentlemen has his special department," says the writer. "Mrs. Watson, Mrs. Harvey and Mrs. Giffen also contribute their share, each bestowing her energy in some particular branch of the work. For the school and harem work there are four ladies. With two of the Bible-women my morning was spent. We found Miss Smith and her assistants busily at work. The story of one life was a very sad one. This girl had been one of the brightest in the school. Among the male converts there was a young man, and when the two married it was considered in every way a suitable union. Suddenly the husband declared that he was to go back to Mohammedanism. So the happy home was broken up, and the wife went back to her teaching to work for herself and her child. Armed with her Bible, Miss Smith led the way into one house after another, all of a similar nature, all small rooms with mud floors, up flights of worn stone stairs. In one house there was a wonderful attempt at cleanliness. Round Arab rooms there are low divans, which in this case were covered with linen. The floor was flagged with red bricks, and a few pictures on the walls gave evidence of an attempt at decoration. Here Miss Smith took out her Bible and read a chapter to the women, all leaving their grain-sifting to come and stand around her, answering the questions she put from time to time with evident interest.

"The native provision for paupers or for aged people is of the most miserable. The poorhouse, known as the Tekeia, lies at some distance from Cairo. The paupers are herded together anyhow, and fed on any sort of wretched stuff. It is quite a common thing to this day among the Arabs to turn the aged or infirm out of the houses to die from exposure, and so relieve their relations of all responsibility.

"Miss Thompson's special life is harem work. She pointed out several houses where the mission ladies had pupils, and told me there were six Bible-women engaged in that part of the city. Again, we made a tour through houses where poverty and its attendant misery were rampant. One of these was a single room where a mother and two daughters, one of whom was married, lived. One girl brought out her Bible and read.

"From here we went to pay our respects to a newly-married pupil of Miss Thompson's. They were people of good position, and the house was a very pretty one. The marriage had been celebrated the evening before, but, according to their custom, the bride was receiving the congratulations of her friends. She was wearing her bridal gown and all her diamonds, and was in the harem, surrounded by her friends, who were all in gala dress, all laden with diamonds, and who were amusing themselves by smoking cigarettes and drinking sherbet. The nautch girls were seated on the floor beating their odd instruments, and singing the queer Arabic melody that gets rather pleasing when one becomes familiar with it. In all the houses the mission ladies were warmly welcomed by rich and by poor alike. Their influence seems to be slowly altering the opinions and beliefs of those among whom they work, and in many cases doing away with the national customs."

ENDUED WITH POWER.

(LUKE 24: 49.)

MORE power to serve thee, Lord,
And spread thy Word;
Persuasive power to win
Wanderers from sin.
This grace we now implore:
Wisdom to serve thee more.
Whom we adore.

Humbly we here confess Unworthiness;
Yet deign to use us still—
Our souls to fill
With zeal that shall refine,
A sacred zeal like thine,
O Love divine!

Guide us in word and deed;
Warm love we need—
Large hearts embracing all
To give thy call.
Give power to help the weak,
Like thee, most High, most Meek,
The lowest seek.

Give power in prayer that gains,
And good obtains,
For those both far and near,
For friends most dear;
That heathen souls be sought,
By Christian love be taught,
And to thee brought.

Alone we would not come
To Heaven our home;
But many trophies bring
Our Saviour King.
What joy before thy throne
If thou wilt say, "Well done
My faithful one!"

HE KNOWETH MY FRAME.

HE knoweth my frame when I'm weary,
Despondent and lonely and weak,
He comforts my soul with his presence,
Gives joy that my lips cannot speak.
He whispers of love everlasting,
Of peace that shall ever endure,
Of patience, of rest, strength and courage,
Of hope that is steadfast and sure.

He knoweth my frame in temptation;
He knows that I cannot withstand
The armies of sin that assail me,
With fury on every hand.
But Satan and all his battalions
Fall back with no power to harm,
When I am on Jesus relying
And trusting the strength of his arm.

When tempests of sorrow break o'er me
To rend and to shiver my soul,
He knows all the wreck and the ruin,
And tenderly maketh me whole.
His arms are beneath and about me,
And sweetly he teaches me trust.
He knoweth my frame—for he made it—
Remembers that I am but dust.

He knoweth my frame in all trouble,
He knows it in life or in death;
And I never need fear for a moment,
For this is the word that he saith:
"My child, fear thou not, I am with thee—
My strength will uphold to the end;
Yea, I am thy Rock and thy Refuge,
Thy lover, Redeemer and friend."

How blessed my life is with Jesus!
I know I shall conquer at length;
In him all my faults shall be hidden,
In him all my weakness is strength.
How tenderly Jesus doth lead me!
He knoweth my frame, and I must Love him who forever remembers—
Remembers that I am but dust.

THE PORTENTS.

Signs to be Recognized as Indications of Christ's Coming.

BY REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

WHEN our Lord was asked if there would be any events which when they occurred, might be recognized as signs of his return to the earth, he said: "As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the Ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat and drink, bought and sold, planted and builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and it destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed" (Luke 17: 26-30). The Apostle confirms this: "For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, 'Peace and safety,' then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape" (1. Thess. 5: 3).

There was nothing specially to alarm the antediluvians before the day that Noah entered the ark; nothing special to startle the men of Sodom ere the fire from heaven fell upon them; and like as it was in those days so will it be in these. All going on just as usual, no single sign to attract the world's attention. "None of the wicked shall understand" the true state of affairs, only the wise and those enlightened by the word of prophecy.

I would like to give what I believe to be the chief of these signs, and I desire rather to speak suggestively than exhaustively. We have six separate and distinct sets of signs, each one of which seems sufficient to indicate that we are on the verge of the establishment on earth of the eternal kingdom of the Son of Man—that blessed One who shall set up a reign of righteousness and peace, of which the millennial Sabbath is but the portal and introduction. We have: first, political signs; second, ecclesiastical signs; third, Jewish signs; fourth, Mohammedan signs; fifth, general social signs; and sixth, chronological signs.

1. As to political signs, allow me to make a few simple suggestions. I met coming here this morning a gentleman who has long been a Christian, a student of God's Word, a worker in his service, but he said he had bestowed only a little time on the study of prophecy; he came here rather as a learner than anything else. Now there may be many such here; let me refer for the sake of such to a great political chart of the world's history contained in Dan. 2, and especially as compared with Daniel 7, that the time which we have reached in the world's history may be apparent. There we have in brief the history of the last twenty-five centuries. It was rewritten—visions and clearer descriptions, and multiplied predictions—and the whole thing lay bare and unfolded; and all history itself has run on these lines exactly as foretold.

I can only add on this point of political signs that each power has run its appointed course. The Babylonian Empire rose, reached a certain height, ran a certain course, and was then overthrown by the Persian Empire. The Medo-Persian Empire succeeded and reached a certain development, and also fell. The Grecian Empire followed, and ruled and perished. Then rose the Roman Empire, which was to be first united and then divided. Comparing these Old Testament predictions with those of the New, and with history, what do we perceive? The history has run on these very lines, that these events have been fulfilled, and therefore do not remain to be fulfilled. Babylon rose and perished, so did Persia; so did Greece; so did Rome Pagan and Rome Papal. All this has been accomplished, and here we are at the close of the predicted course of the last of these four empires. We are, therefore, close to the manifestation, the unveiling, the shining forth, the glorious establishment of the Kingdom of God which shall never pass away. That is the next thing to occur.

A New Work on Prophecy.

Just published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a new booklet on "The Lord's Coming," by Mrs. M. Baxter, whose articles on the Sunday School Lessons appear week by week in this journal. Its fifteen chapters cover the period from the Parousia to the Millennium. Paper cover; 104 pages; price fifteen cents. May be obtained at this office, 92-98 Bible House, New York.

ERNEST PAULL was bitterly chagrined at the result of his expedition. Just two weeks before, he had picked up a copy of a New York paper two months old, in a barber's shop in Monte Carlo. The paper contained what purported to be an abstract of the will of the late Roger Lanier, wherein his estate was estimated at over a million dollars. In the list of legacies was one of thirty thousand dollars and a handsome country seat in New Jersey to his sister, Mrs. Paull, and two thousand dollars to each of her five children.

Marie had written briefly in her weekly letter, of her uncle's death,—brevity her father was incapable of attributing to her remorseful disinclination to dwell upon the event. She had not alluded to the will at all, and the news was momentous to the exile. The tidings of Roger Lanier's decease could not be otherwise than welcome. So far as Ernest Paull had ascertained, his brother-in-law was the only person, except perhaps his former employers, who was acquainted with all the particulars of his dishonorable flight from America. A better man than he to whom it was addressed would have found it difficult to forgive the letter that followed him to Nice. The writer had wasted no words in giving the refugee to understand that his expatriation was perpetual.

"I have refunded the stolen funds," he wrote tersely. "I did this to save my sister's name from open disgrace. Should you attempt to return to this country, or in any manner annoy her or her children, you will be given up to justice. The sum you stole was put into the hands of your late employers with this distinct understanding. They will prosecute you without mercy. Your crime is not condoned by their acceptance of what they consider in such an event, 'hush-money,' to be returned to me. If, as I have reason to believe, you added forgery to theft, the prosecution would be a yet graver affair."

The gate of return to home, country and a show of respectability was double-locked and barred. He had no resource but to live by his wits. When Mr. and Mrs. Paull Morgan became notorious as card-sharpers in one place, they removed to another, and assumed another alias, until his partner wearied of the precarious existence and of him, and left him to speculate alone. It would have been surprising in these circumstances had poor Marie's piteous epistles reached him. With all his keen watch of New York papers, he never saw one line relative to him, or his family, until his eyes lighted upon the notice of his daughter's appointment as organist in St. Gudule's. His letter to her was a cast into the water that proved unexpectedly profitable. Her answer enclosed a bill of exchange for one hundred dollars, and she had sent him two hundred since without intimating that the amount represented self-denial on her part that was actual hardship. He had played unscrupulously upon her passionate attachment to the parent idealized by memory and imagination. The child evidently had resources and a fat private purse. To whom was her tribute due, if not to him?

The letter containing the grievous story of his invalidism, and the physician's recommendation of Algeria as the one hope of saving his life, was a mixed tissue of truth and deceit. He was feebly convalescent from a seizure of what the English doctor summoned hastily to the gambling hell in which he fell ill pronounced a menace of "angina pectoris."

"You have been living at the pace that kills, my friend," he warned the patient. "Pull up, or you will make short work of the rest of the way."

Without the remotest intention of tempting his young daughter to come to him, he had written in his best style that he had been nigh unto the gates of death, and could not obey the doctor's advice for want of means. He calculated upon the receipt of another, and a larger cheque than the previous remittances, and was counting the days before it could reach him when the paragraph in the old journal gave a new phase to life and expectation.

That his enemy was dead had meant something in the line of fortunate possibilities for him. He had little fear of prosecution, or disgraceful publicity from the men he had robbed, now that their inflexible prompter was out of the way, yet he felt but a slight drawing homeward. Marie's money would go further on this side of the ocean. In New York he must work, or feign to work for a living, and he loved foreign bohemianism better than domestic respectability.

Thirty thousand dollars, added to the sum settled upon Alice by her father, would bring a tolerable income, even in America, when one had a roof over her head. He would go home and get his share of the goods provided. He was positive, with his knowledge of his wife's character, she would not turn him from her door. If he had sinned against her, he had expiated his transgression by living from hand to mouth, and by enforced separation from his children. His eyes watered at the latter thought. His was an affectionate shallow nature, and such make a specious show to the world and to themselves. In the light of his interesting discovery, his love for the darlings of his fireside approximated heart-hunger. He convinced himself that impatience to clasp them once more to his bosom impelled him to risk his fate upon one audacious venture. With the superstition common to weak natures, he resolved to hazard the remnant of Marie's last remittance at "rouge-et-noir" that night. If he won, he would on the morrow buy a ticket to New York. If he lost, he could not go—therefore, Destiny had decreed a different lot for him. He won four times the sum he laid upon the table.

His first call, after landing in New York, was at Mrs. Marcy's fashionable Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies. His inquiry for Miss Paull was answered by the information that she was not in, and that the footman could not say when she would be. He believed that she had been called out of town by the illness of a friend. He "believed it was her mother."

"Can I see Mrs. Marcy?" asked the stranger.

"Mrs. Marcy is not at home."

"One of the teachers, then. I must know where to find Miss Paull."

With dexterity acquired by foreign practice, he slipped a dollar into the man's hand, and was, forthwith, ushered into a reception room. To him presently descended an under-teacher, hurried and fagged, who knew nothing beyond what Mrs. Marcy had dropped incidentally, in her hearing; namely, that a substitute must be found for Miss Paull, who had been summoned to the sick-bed of a relative.

"I asked no questions," added the drudge, who looked too tired to be inquisitive. "But, knowing that Miss Paull's family reside in New Jersey, I took it for granted that she had gone there."

She was not especially interested in her fellow-teacher, or chronic fatigue made her unobservant, else she might have noted the striking resemblance between the inquirer and the absent girl. The footman had made better use of his opportunities, for, at luncheon, he reported in the kitchen his impression that the disappointed visitor was Miss Paull's uncle from abroad, who had probably come to America to give her a fortune. "He was a genuine swell and a perfect gentleman, and enough like Miss Marie to be her father forty times over."

With the dazed sensation of a dreamer who must awake presently and find himself at home in bed, Ernest Paull trod the once-familiar streets without seeing a friend he knew, or being recognized by any one.

He had landed early in the morning, and had time to dine at his hotel before taking an afternoon train to Pequod.

The aspect of Pinehurst pleased him more than he had expected. It was a cozy corner in which to recover strength, and to be rehabilitated by degrees from the effect of circumstances. During the drive from Peddlington he had speculated as to the possible seriousness of his wife's illness, if she were the ailing relative. A sensation-lover inborn, he arranged a tableau of reconciliation in the sick-chamber,—perhaps, even at the death-bed of an otherwise exemplary woman, who had lent too ready an ear to the worldly maxims of a designing brother. Should Alice die—would it be found that her brother's bequest was hers in fee simple? or would it be ungenerously lodged with trustees or entailed upon the heirs of her body? In any event he could depend upon his sweet Marie's disposition toward him. It might perhaps be as well—in the mind of Providence—if the noble girl were to become the head of the household. He could be very comfortable in the country until next winter, with little Marie to cater for and nurse him.

This conclusion was prominent in his thoughts, as turning to contemplate the wing of the picturesque colonial homestead, he met Elspeth's blazing eye.

The dialogue with her was the kick of the dreamer to the basket of Alaschar. Even while he vaped to her of his rights and determination to maintain them, he was aware that she must discover, ere long, the absurdity of his position. Roger Lanier was dead, but his wife, a woman of much force of character, was fondly attached to her sister-in-law, and, rather than allow her to be imposed upon by the returned husband, was quite capable of enforcing his warning to the banished man. His only hope lay in her unwillingness to make public a page of family history that might wound her pride. He wished, when it was too late, that he had forced an entrance into the house which was morally his own. If Alice were really there and ill, Marie's place was at her bedside.

Unless, and subsequent reflection made him more and more fearful of this—the story of her departure for France were true, and not a fabrication of the Scotch virago. He had never known Elspeth to tell a lie; he had known her to be truthful to her own disadvantage. Her excitement was unfeigned, and what would arise from the loss of one of the children she had brought up.

His heart stood still in the horror of the admitted probability. Next to himself, he cared more for his eldest daughter than for any other living thing. He comprehended far better than untraveled Elspeth could divine, what must be the position of a beautiful young girl, alone and unsophisticated, who should set on foot, in Pau, unaided and bewildered, inquiries concerning "Mr. James Ellis," the name he had worn there for a few months, and to which Marie had addressed several letters, one of which contained a bill of exchange. He was not utterly depraved. Few men are. Bohemianized to the core though he was, callous in sensibilities and conscience as only such a career as his had been abroad, can make a human creature who once yielded outward obedience to moral principles—he would rather have resigned the hope of future pecuniary aid from his daughter, than introduce her into the scenes that had known him most intimately of late. He had not scrupled to rob his child; he would not demoralize her even in thought. America and the parental roof were the places for girls.

The more he thought of the awful possibilities contingent upon what he stigmatized as "a mad, romantic escapade," the more the horror grew. He drank heavily as bedtime drew near, to court sleep and respite from the visions multiplying and looming before his imagination. At midnight, he arose from an uneasy pillow to dose himself with an opiate prescribed by the English physician. He had hardly lain down before terrible pain seized him with tiger-like fierceness.

He knew the teeth and grip of his enemy. It was part of the price that he paid for "the pace that kills." After repeated attempts to rise, the dread of dying in agony alone, nerved him to a mighty effort. He rolled from the bed, and, by partly dragging, partly rolling himself across the room, reached the bell, pulled himself up to it, rang and rang, then fell upon the floor.

Three days of unspeakable suffering had elapsed when he left his chamber, haggard and feeble, as from as many weeks of illness. When pain and alternating stupor let him think during this confinement, his mind ran with feverish persistence upon one topic.

Marie, on the sea; a friendless wanderer, landing at a foreign port with no one to welcome or care for her, distraught and terrified amid the pushing, curious crowds of the popular resort where she had hoped to find him. Always, she was a sacrifice to filial devotion. Sometimes, he was angry at the unworlly recklessness with which she had thrown up her position in the school, and probably in the church, to fly to him. Oftener, he could have dashed his head against the wall in mad regret for his overstrained appeal to her love and compassion that had resulted so calamitously.

To him—alone, suffering and nearly penniless in a city where his nearest of blood would repudiate, or, at best, merely tolerate him! He had blundered atrociously in letting temper get the better of discretion when provoked by Elspeth's insolence. Whatever relents might, under favorable circumstances, have visited his wife's heart, he had antagonized her by threatening to deprive her of her children. Empty as she might know the menace to be after his wilful desertion of his family, and two years of silence, she would accept the gasconade as a token that he was prepared for war, rather than for peace. He had put her on her guard, and presumably on her mettle, and he knew the quality of the Lanier spirit. Twice, he wrote to her, once, in the doughty strain of an injured man, demanding an interview and opportunity for explanation. The letter lay on his table all night; was re-read in the morning and burned. It offended his taste and was undiplomatic. The second was studiously incoherent, and sincere only so far as he represented himself as distracted at the rash step taken by their daughter. His florid appeals to the love his wife had once professed for him, his protestations of remorseful tenderness, and entreaties to be received back into some measure of regard as the lover of her youth, and father of her children—were so strained and artificial as to disgust himself before the message was completed.

He could imagine how Alice would look while reading it. She was a true Lanier in her lofty disdain of sham sentiment. He had never been afraid of her in the old times. He quailed at the idea of meeting her clear, honest eyes now, that she knew him for what he was—forgery, thief, liar, and bigamist. Roger Lanier had frankly applied all of these titles to him in the scathing letter addressed to "Mr. Paul Morgan, Nice, France." Marie had written respectfully of her mother, but with no affectation of concealment of her uncle's influence over his sister. "Uncle Roger has settled mother and the children in one of his country-houses, which he has spared no money or pains in making comfortable, and is advisor-general in everything that concerns the household." "He and I are distinctly polite to one another," said another letter. "While he is your enemy, he can never be my friend, and this he has been made to understand more than once. All the same, I cannot question his attachment to mother and to Lanier."

On the sixth day after the attack that had stolen so much of his strength an energy, Ernest Paull paid his week's board, and had exactly one dollar and thirty cents left in the world. The doctor's fees had been unexpectedly large, and illness in a city hotel is a costly indulgence. Under the spur of the discovery, he made up his mind abruptly to call upon Roger Lanier's widow.

Putting upon the errand the face which he imagined it would be dressed in by conscious innocence, he sent up a card upon which he had pencilled his real name.

Mrs. Lanier came down at once; a handsome woman, doubly dignified by widow's weeds; collected and serious in demeanor, and so utterly free from discomposure of any kind, that he was instantly aware of her knowledge of what Elspeth could tell.

Her next action, after acknowledging his respectful salutation by a silent bend of the head, defined their relative position. She remained standing, in an easy, expectant attitude, by a table near the front windows of the drawing-room, thus compelling him to remain upon his feet. He had retained his hat, and not removed his overcoat, and felt awkwardly isolated in the exact middle of the apartment. A tax-gatherer or a plumber would have had more gracious audience. Supersensitive to trifles, he appreciated her advantage and his loss at the outset.

HELPFUL ANECDOTES

THE COW AND THE IDOL.

FROM an observant traveler in China comes an interesting story of an event that led to the decay of idol influence in one district at least. "A poor man," he writes, "went to pray to an idol that had been placed outside the temple. I do not know what he asked for, but he promised if the idol would answer him he would give him his cow. The man's prayer was answered, but he repented of his bargain, and as he did not wish to part with his cow, he went to the idol again to let him off. He said, 'I know I promised to give you my cow, but I am very poor; I have only one cow; if I give it to you how shall I get my fields ploughed?' and so on, ending up by asking to be allowed to keep his cow. The idol would not let him off, but said the cow must be left. At last the man could do nothing else but tether the cow to the idol's chair and go sorrowfully home, wondering how he was ever going to get on. Here were his fields ready to be ploughed, but no cow, and no money to hire a cow to do it for him. He sat down in his room to think over his troubles, and lo! he has not sat long before he hears a great shouting. He goes to the door to see—what do you think? here is his own cow coming along the road as hard as it can, dragging the idol after it. How the people laughed, and how glad the man was, for of course he was not wise enough to see that it was the cow had brought the idol: oh, no, it was the idol had repented and brought back the cow! Nearly all the people knew at the bottom of their hearts that the idol had nothing at all to do with it, and some of them were not afraid to say that the idol was useless."

AN ICELANDIC SCHOOL FOR WOMEN.

At the town of Reykjavik, in Iceland is a most interesting school for women, which represents the patriotic love and self-sacrifice of Icelandic women, as it was founded and is supported through the exertions of one woman, who lectures in Europe on the needs of her native island, and the generosity of other women who brought their heirlooms and poured them into the lap of the founder, that she might sell them and appropriate the proceeds to the school. These heirlooms were quaint and beautiful belts, flagree tubes for confining the tassel on the every-day cap, snuff horns and silver embroidery. Several women were sent to Europe to be trained as teachers with the money thus raised, and many more at home receive a higher form of education than otherwise would have been possible. Women students are admitted to the medical and theological seminaries for instruction and final examinations, and to the Latin school for examination if they have prepared themselves. A diploma from any one of these institutions admits to the University of Copenhagen. Such sacrifice and endeavor are well worthy of imitation by believers to enable those who can to go forth amongst the heathen and preach the Gospel.

A NOBLEMAN'S CURE.

A remarkable patient has recently been treated at the Presbyterian Missionary Hospital at Chieng-Mai, in the Laos country. Dr. James W. McKean, who has charge there, thus reports the case in "The Church at Home and Abroad." This man was a noble living at Muong Sing, and was one of the Governor's chief men. Soon after building a beautiful house, he was taken with a very painful disease. Fearing that he had in some way offended the spirits in the building of the house, he made frequent and valuable offerings to them, but all to no purpose. His disease growing more painful, he tore down his fine house, hoping thereby to placate the spirits, but this also failed. He then tried merit-making. Although he had once been a priest and had the reputation of being a very learned man, he concluded to re-enter the priesthood, hoping thereby to derive sufficient merit to cure him of his malady. In order to do this he must leave his home and family. As all priests' heads are closely shaven, he must also forfeit his hair, which was more than five feet and a half in length and of which he was very proud. But the man was in earnest. So cutting off his hair and presenting it to the governor, he entered the priesthood, where he remained for many months. But even this failed to cure him. Native medicines gave no relief and the man was in despair. At last he determined to apply to the Christian doctors. He was so ill that he had to be carried in a litter and was a whole year on the road. His adventures on the way were of a thrilling character. Once his bearers set him down in a forest and refused to carry him farther unless he gave them seventy rupees to buy opium. He refused, but yielded when he found they were preparing to run away and leave him in the forest to die. At another part of the journey robbers broke into the camp and carried off all the money and valuables they could find. When at last he reached the mission he was penniless. An operation was performed and the man was completely cured. Dr. McKean adds: It was a great joy to us as well as to him that he was so entirely relieved from all suffering. During his stay of several months he was daily instructed in the Christian religion. Learned in the Buddhist faith he readily comprehended the superiority of Christianity and seemed to receive it gladly. When he left for his distant home he professed to be a believer in Christ.

HE GOT THE BLESSING.

Canon Wilberforce tells a pathetic story illustrating the force of the little word "now." It was of a miner who, hearing the Gospel preached, determined that, if the promised blessing of immediate salvation were indeed true, he would not leave the presence of the minister who was declaring it until assured of its possession by himself. He waited, consequently, after the meeting to speak with the minister, and, in his untutored way, said, "Didn't ye say I could have the blessing now?" "Yes, my friend." "Then pray with me, for I'm not goin' awa' without it." And they did pray, these two men, until the wrestling miner heard silent words of comfort and cheer. "I've got it now!" cried the miner, his face reflecting the joy within; "I've got it now!" The next day a frightful accident occurred at the mines. The same minister was called to the scene, and among the men, dead and dying, was the quivering, almost breathless body of this man who, only the night before, big and brawny, came to him to know if salvation could really be had now for the asking. There was but a fleeting moment of recognition between the two ere the miner's soul took flight; but in that moment he had time to say, in response to the minister's sympathy, "Oh, I don't mind, for I've got it—I've got it—it's mine!" Then the name of this poor man went in the sad list of the "killed." There was no note made of the royal inheritance to which he had but a few hours before come into possession, and all by his believing grip of the word "now."

A DEMENTED PATIENT.

Among the cases quoted by Dr. McKean as having been treated through the agency of the Medical Mission at Chieng-Mai, in the Laos country, was one that the natives regarded as demoniacal possession. "All disturbances of mental functions," says the good physician, "are here attributed to evil spirits. This man surely seemed to be possessed of the devil. So violent had he become that his friends had removed him from his house and had bound him with two chains to the posts of the rice granary. His brother, who was a noted spirit doctor, had tried all his charms and incantations for the poor man's relief, but without avail. It happened that two of our native evangelists were teaching in this village. These evangelists taking pity on the poor maniac, applied for medicine for his relief. It must be confessed that it was with little hope of cure that medicine was given. A few days later, however, the evangelists reported that after taking the medicine for two days, he was so much improved that his chains were removed. After continuing the treatment for several weeks, the man was apparently cured. A few months later we had the joy of seeing this man, clothed and in his right mind, received into the visible church, together with his whole family, including his brother, the spirit doctor. Almost a year has elapsed. The man is well, and to all appearances is a devout and consistent disciple of the Lord. A few days ago at a Sabbath service at which this man was present, the native Christians were remarking upon his cure and agreed in saying that the divine power manifestly exercised therein closely resembled that exercised in apostolic times."

HINDOO SUPERSTITION.

It is pitiful to see the women of India construed into an omen of terrible evil that which is the herald of the day of their emancipation and salvation. Their case is strikingly set forth in the touching legend of the dove of Dacca. A Hindoo rajah was made aware of the approach of an invading band of Mohammedans. He went out bravely to meet them, taking with him a white dove, whose return to the palace was to be the sign to his family of his defeat, and the signal to them to destroy themselves and their home ere the violent invaders could arrive. The battle was fought and the rajah gained the day; he turned towards home, but as he stopped by a river to drink the dove escaped and flew home. Eager eyes had been watching for the token of defeat, and they thought they saw it as the bird drew near, and although the rajah hastened on his way at the utmost possible speed he only reached his house in time to throw himself upon the burning ruins. The Holy Spirit, like a dove, is drawing near to thousands of Indian homes to-day, and the unenlightened women are fearing it as if it was coming to injure them. Who will go that they may be enlightened?

THE BURNED TABERNACLE.

When the splendid Brooklyn Tabernacle was erected, three years ago, there was a great demand from all parts of the country for pictures of the largest Protestant church in America. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at that time sent out to its subscribers large quantities of those beautiful engravings to supply this demand. Shortly after the recent disastrous fire, a photograph of the ruined Tabernacle was taken, which shows how thorough and devastating was the work of the flames. Copies of this photograph, measuring 11 by 14 inches, will be forwarded to any of our readers who send fifty cents to this office.

SAPOLIO

THE BOOK SHELF

THE KINGDOM OF JERUSALEM.*

GREAT were the difficulties of Godfrey's kingdom, but he overcame them. Wedged in between the rival Caliphates of Cairo and Bagdad, he had to defend it from both. The population of Jerusalem, his capital, was made up of Crusaders, Syrians, Greeks, renegades from all religions, adventurers from every land. His soldiers were fanatics and criminals.

He divided the conquered territory among his companions, but they were refractory; and the papal Patriarch, Cardinal Daimbert, was arrogant and troublesome. The soldiers said that they had conquered the land by their valor, but the priests ascribed the conquest to their prayers. All laid claim to reward, and all were more or less disobedient.

Two hundred knights and less than a thousand foot were the available strength for the defense of the Holy Sepulchre. Strictly speaking government, such as it was, was confined to only a few towns; the country population was thievish and rebellious.

The only good road was that from Joppa to Jerusalem. Seawulf, an English pilgrim who passed it in 1103, saw many uninterred corpses lie on the way; men refused to bury them, because it imperilled their own life.

The King, according to the Code, was elected, but in case of his demise, his next of kin was preferred, if possible; the Barons comprised his Council.

The King solemnly promised to be a good lord; then the Barons took the oath of allegiance. He was presented with the insignia of his office, to wit, a ring denoting fidelity; a sword importing his defence of the Holy Sepulchre; a crown and a sceptre as symbols of authority and justice. He took the crown to the Temple and deposited it on the spot where Jesus was presented, but upon a fixed redemption it was restored to him.

The whole transaction imported that the Holy Sepulchre was the real Sovereign, and the King only its supreme defender.

Military service was feudal; the same applied to a multitude of personal relations and obligations for mutual protection.

There were three Courts of justice. In the Supreme Court, called the Court of the Barons, the King presided in person; it was composed of all the nobles who held their land immediately of the crown. The second Court, called the Court of Burgesses, was composed of a limited number of chosen citizens; the third Court, called the Court of the Syrians, or native Christians who spoke Arabic, was composed of a select number of Syrians. The principle which underlay these several Courts was the broad one that as each was chosen by its own order, so every citizen was judged by his peers, and in the case of the Syrians, they were judged by their own national law.

The "Assize of Jerusalem" recognized and protected with singular justice and liberality all men capable of bearing arms, but treated villains, slaves, serfs, and captives of war with hardly more consideration than objects of poverty; the old mediæval values remained, according to which a slave and a falcon were rated alike, and three slaves equalled the value of a war-horse, which as late as the fourteenth century was valued at three hundred pieces of gold.

The status of the Clergy was of the most pronounced assertion; they claimed supremacy by divine right. The Code allowed judicial combat, and the ordeal by iron and fire in criminal causes, sometimes also in civil matters. By far the most efficient protection of the Kingdom of Jerusalem was afforded by the celebrated military Orders of the "Knights of St. John," and of the "Knights Templars."

Godfrey reigned only one year. He died July 13, 1100,—it is said from poisoned fruit —universally regretted, and was fitly laid to rest near the Holy Sepulchre.

THE PERFECT TONGUE.*

There can be no perfection in art or science without attention to little things. One of the truest marks of genius is the power, in presence of the highest ideal, to attend to even the least details. No chain is stronger than its feeblest link. The weakest point in the character of a Christian is the measure of his nearness to perfection. It is in the little things of daily life that perfection is attained and proved.

The tongue is a little member. A word of the tongue is, oh! such a little thing in the eyes of many. And yet we are told by none less than our blessed Lord: "By thy words shalt thou be justified." When the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father to render to every man according to his deeds, every word will be taken into account. In the light of the great day of God, if any man stumble not in word, the same is a perfect man. This is the full-grown man, who has attained maturity, who has reached unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

But is it possible for any man to be thus perfect, and not to stumble in a single word? Has not James just said, "In many things we all stumble?" Just think of all the foolish words one hears among Christians, the sharp words, the hasty, thoughtless, unloving words, the words that are only half honest and not spoken from the heart. Think of all the sins of the tongue against the law of perfect love and perfect truth, and we must admit the terrible force of James' statement: "In many things we all stumble." When he adds, "If any stumble not in word, the same is a perfect man," can he really mean that God expects that we should live so, and that we must seek and expect it too?

Let us think. With what object does he use these words? In the beginning of his Epistle he had spoken of patience having its perfect work, that we may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing. There, entire perfection, with nothing lacking, is set before us as a definite promise to those who let patience have its perfect work. His Epistle is written, as all the Epistles are, under the painful impression of how far ordinary Christian experience is from such perfection, but in the faith that it is no hopeless task to teach God's people that they ought to be, that they can be, perfect and entire, lacking in nothing. Where he begins to speak of the tongue, the two sides of the truth again rise up before him. The ordinary experience he expresses in the general statement: "In many things we all stumble." The will of God and the power of grace he sets forth in the blessed and not impossible ideal of all who seek to be perfect and entire: "If any man stumble not in word, the same is a perfect man." James speaks of it in all simplicity as a condition as actual as the other of all stumbling.

hood; and in days of unsettlement like those in which we live, that time is likely to prove one of great anxiety. But still the experience of the effects of their childhood's faith is not a tradition. That is a part of their own personal history, and with that it is easier for them to keep hold of the faith than it would be without it. There may be some, I believe that there are some, who lose their faith in spite of their early experience. But they do so with regret, like that of him who wrote,—

It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm farther off from heaven
Than when I was a boy.

And to counterbalance these there are many more, who, after being tossed to and fro upon the sea of doubt, come back at length to their old anchorage, in the faith of their childhood. Therefore, let there be no ungenerous suspicions of the genuineness of the piety of children, and no dark forebodings of its lack of permanence. God has often moved on the hearts of little ones, and we should labor and pray that the people of our homes and of our churches may grow up from their earliest years in the love and service of the Lord Jesus.

TALKS WITH MOTHERS.—No. 3. HAPPY BABYHOOD.

Every mother wants her baby to thrive, because a healthy child is a happy child. The question of how the baby shall be fed is demanding the attention, as never before, not only of the mothers in the land, but of the entire medical profession also, because it is now realized how much the health of a child can be influenced by proper nutrition during the years of babyhood. As the result of the improper feeding of the infant, the vitality of the child is impaired, and he grows up weak and puny. In these days when artificial food is being so generally resorted to for infants, the demand for a substitute for mother's milk has brought out many foods for which great claims are made. Gustav Mellin, an English chemist, was the first to discover and combine the requisite properties necessary for an artificial food, and with his discovery the rational feeding of infants commenced. Mellin's Food is the only perfect substitute for mother's milk, and it has done more to make babies strong and healthy than anything else that has ever been invented. Mellin's Food possesses all the requisite heat and flesh producing and bone-forming constituents necessary to give a child health, vigor and vitality. Infants are exceedingly fond of it and thrive upon it when nothing else can be retained upon the stomach. If they have been weak, fretful and troublesome they become happy, healthy and active; bright eyes, rosy cheeks, firm muscles and a strong constitution are the inevitable results of using this excellent preparation. Mellin's Food, being highly nutritious and easily digested, is also perfectly adapted to the wants of invalids and convalescents.

ALIEN CHILDREN LED TO CHRIST.

Evangelistic Work Among the Spanish-Cuban-Americans in New York—Miss Strong's Efforts in Their Behalf—A Story of Loving and Unselfish Christian Service.

AMONG the many problems that confront Christian workers in America, and more particularly in the great cities with cosmopolitan populations, is that which deals with the evangelizing of the children of parents coming here from Catholic countries. In a majority of cases, the spiritual natures of these little ones have been utterly neglected. In still other instances, their dis satisfaction with the religion of Rome, with its empty rites and exorbitant demands, has already caused them to break away from its restraints and to lead lives practically without religion. This is specially true of those who have come from Mexico, Spain and Cuba, where superstition and fanaticism hold the masses in spiritual and secular bondage.

In New York City and Brooklyn there are over 45,000 Spanish-speaking people. For several years, Miss Caroline M. Strong has been doing effective service among them having had special preparation by work among the Spanish in Mexico under the American Board. Miss Strong's experience in a land dominated by Spanish rule with its allied papal power, was such as to enlist all her powers against their oppression. Her work is largely among the homes where the Spanish women live, in seclusion, ignorant, lonely and sad, but glad to receive the Word of Life. The children are beautiful and affectionate, and if they could be taught, would be early led into the fold, and through them many of the parents would be saved. Miss Strong, together with her sister, Miss Susan Strong, has conducted a special work among the children, which promises excellent spiritual results. These ladies have devoted not only their time, but their personal means, to this work, which has become to them a sacred charge. They have gathered about them a number of Spanish children, the daughters of poor Cuban, Mexican or Spanish Catholic parents in the metropolis, and have educated them and trained them in fields of usefulness, in addition to bringing them into the light and joy of the Gospel of Jesus. At their own residence in New York, these ladies established a home school for the little ones, and there they have passed several years of loving evangelical mission of considerable importance.

Concerning the work, Miss Strong makes this statement for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "I began evangelistic duty among the Spanish in New York City eight years ago. From experience gained in Mexico, I knew that the mothers must first be reached, so I organized an industrial sewing class for the mothers, and at each meeting a portion of the Scriptures in their own language was read. To make these meetings attractive, Gospel hymns were sung in their own language. From this work grew a Sunday School, which in a few months numbered sixty-five pupils. Through this Sunday School the Spanish Episcopal Church in San-service among their youthful charges. A group of these interesting children is presented in a photograph on this page, together with a portrait of Miss Caroline M. Strong, the founder of what promises in the near future to expand into a training school and tiago received thirteen members and the Methodist Episcopal Church in Brooklyn, now under the care of Rev. Moya, was organized. The Spanish Evangelistic Church now under the care of Rev. J. M. Lopez Guillen, was also organized as an outcome of the work. It has a membership of fifty seven. I regard the work as hardly yet begun, for American Christians do not fully appreciate the importance of giving the Gospel to these people from Spain, Mexico, South America and Cuba in the Spanish tongue. As a nationality, the Spaniards when converted become aggressive, enterprising Christians, and they are the best agents possible for evangelizing the Spanish speaking countries, representing 60,000,000 people. Our evangelistic work in New York and Brooklyn is under the care of Congregational Home Missionary Society. "The training-school is undenominational and is supported by voluntary contributions from all denominations. It has been a severe struggle to sustain this work. To provide a building, my own salary from the Home Missionary Society has been freely given for the past three years. Had we

MARTYRS OF THE NEEDLE.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Latest Sermon. Text: Matt. 19: 24, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle."

WHETHER this "eye of the needle" be the small gate at the side of the big gate at the entrance of the wall of the ancient city, as is generally interpreted, or the eye of a needle such as is now handled in sewing a garment, I do not say. In either case it would be a tight thing for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. But there are whole caravans of fatigues and hardships going through the eye of the sewing-woman's needle.

Very long ago the needle was busy. It was considered honorable for women to toil in olden time. Alexander the Great stood in his palace showing garments made by his own mother. The finest tapestries at Bayeux were made by the Queen of William the Conqueror. Augustus the Emperor would not wear any garments except those that were fashioned by some member of his royal family. So let the toiler everywhere be respected!

The greatest blessing that could have happened to our first parents was being turned out of Eden after they had done wrong. Adam and Eve, in their perfect state, might have got along without work, or only such slight employment as a perfect garden, with no weeds in it, demanded. But, as soon as they had sinned, the best thing for them was to be turned out where they would have to work. We know what a withering thing it is for a man to have nothing to do. Good old Ashbel Green, at four-score years, when asked why he kept on working, said, "I do so to keep out of mischief." We see that a man who has a large amount of money to start with has no chance. Of the thousand prosperous and honorable men that you know, nine hundred and ninety-nine had to work vigorously at the beginning.

But I am now to tell you that industry is just as important for a woman's safety and happiness. The most unhappy women in our communities to-day are those who have no engagements to call them up in the morning; who, once having risen and breakfasted, lounge through the dull forenoon in slippers down at the heel and with dishevelled hair, reading the last novel; and who, having dragged through a wretched forenoon and taken their afternoon sleep, and having spent an hour and a half at their toilet, pick up their card-case and go out to make calls; and who pass their evenings waiting for somebody to come in and break up the monotony. Arabella Stuart never was imprisoned in so dark a dungeon as that.

There is no happiness in an idle woman. It may be with hand, it may be with brain, it may be with foot; but work she must, or be wretched forever. The little girls of our families must be started with that idea. The curse of our American society is that our young women are taught that the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth, fiftieth, thousandth thing in their life is to get somebody to take care of them. Instead of that, the first lesson should be, how, under God, they may take care of themselves. The simple fact is that a majority of them do have to take care of themselves, and that, too, after having, through the false notions of their parents, wasted the years in which they ought to have learned how successfully to maintain themselves. We now and here declare the inhumanity, cruelty, and outrage of that father and mother, who pass their daughters into womanhood, having given them no facility for earning their livelihood. Madame de Stael said: "It is not these writings that I am proud of, but the fact that I have facility in ten occupations, in any one of which I could make a livelihood."

You say you have a fortune to leave them. O man and woman! have you not learned that, like vultures, like hawks, like eagles, riches have wings and fly away? Though you should be successful in leaving a competency behind you, the trickery of executors may swamp it in a night; or some elders or deacons of our churches may get up a fictitious company, and induce your orphans to put their money into it, and if it be lost, prove to them that it was eternally decreed that that was the way they were to lose it, and that it went in the most orthodox and heavenly style. O, the damnable schemes that professed Christians will engage in—until God puts his fingers into the collar of the hypocrite's robe and rips it clear down to the bottom! You have no right, because you are well off, to conclude that your children are going to be as well off. A man died, leaving a large fortune. His son fell dead in a Philadelphia grog-shop. His old comrades came in and said, as they bent over his corpse, "What is the matter with you, Boggsey?" The surgeon standing over him said: "Hush up! he is dead!"—"Ah, he is dead!" they said. "Come, boys, let us go and take a drink in memory of poor Boggsey!"

Have you nothing better than money to leave your children? If you have not, but send your daughters into the world with empty brain and unskilled hand, you are guilty of assassination, homicide, regicide, infanticide. There are women toiling in our cities for three and four dollars per week, who were the daughters of merchant princes. These suffering ones now would be glad to have the crumbs that once fell from their father's table. That worn-out, broken shoe that she wears is the lineal descendant of the twelve-dollar gaiters in which her mother walked; and that torn and faded calico had ancestry of magnificent brocade, that swept Broadway clean without any expense to the street commissioners. Though you live in an elegant residence, and fare sumptuously every day, let your daughters feel it is a disgrace to them not to know how to work. I denounce the idea, prevalent in society, that though our young women may embroider slippers, and crochet, and make mats for lamps to stand on, without disgrace, the idea of doing anything for a livelihood is dishonorable. It is a shame for a young woman, belonging to a large family, to be inefficient when the father toils his life away for her support. It is a shame for a daughter to be idle while her mother toils at the wash-tub. It is as honorable to sweep house, make beds, or trim hats, as it is to twist a watch-chain.

As far as I can understand, the line of respectability lies between that which is useful and that which is useless. If women do that which is of no value, their work is honorable. If they do practical work, it is dishonorable. That our young women may escape the censure of doing dishonorable work, I shall particularize. You may knit a tidy for the back of an armchair, but by no means make the money wherewith to buy the chair. You may, with delicate brush, beautify a mantel-ornament, but die rather than earn enough to buy a marble mantel. You may learn artistic music until you can squall Italian, but never sing "Ortonville" or "Old Hundred." Do nothing practical, if you would, in the eyes of refined society, preserve your respectability. I scout these finical notions. I tell you no woman, any more than a man, has a right to occupy a place in this world unless she pays a rent for it.

In the course of a lifetime you consume whole harvests, and droves of cattle, and every day you live breathe forty hogsheads of good pure air. You must, by some kind of usefulness, pay for all this. Our race was the last thing created, — the birds and fishes on the fourth day, the cattle and lizards on the fifth day, and man on the sixth day. If geologists are right, the earth was a million of years in the possession of the insects, beasts and birds, before our race came upon it. In one sense, we were innovators. The cattle, the lizards and the hawks had pre-emption right. The question is not what we are to do with the lizards and summer insects, but what the lizards and summer insects are to do with us.

If we want a place in this world we must earn it. The partridge makes its own nest before it occupies it. The lark, by its morning song, earns its breakfast before it eats it; the Bible gives an intimation that the first duty of an idler is to starve, when it says if he "will not work, neither shall he eat." Idleness ruins the health; and very soon Nature says, "This man has refused to pay his rent; out with him!"

Society is to be reconstructed on the subject of woman's toil. A vast majority of those who would have woman industrious shut her up to a few kinds of work. My judgment in this matter is, that a woman has a right to do anything she can do well. There should be no department of merchandise, mechanism, art, or science barred against her. If Miss Hosmer has genius for sculpture, give her a chisel. If Rosa Bonheur has a fondness for delineating animals, let her make "The Horse Fair." If Miss Mitchell will study astronomy, let her mount the starry ladder. If Lydia will be a merchant, let her sell purple. If Lucretia Mott will preach the Gospel, let her thrill with her womanly eloquence the Quaker meeting-house.

It is said, if woman is given such opportunities, she will occupy places that might be taken by men. I say, if she have more skill and adaptedness for any position than a man has, let her have it! She has as much right to her bread, to her apparel, and to her home, as men have.

But it is said that her nature is so delicate that she is unfitted for exhausting toil. I ask in the name of all past history, what toil on earth is more severe, exhausting, and tremendous than that toil of the needle to which for ages she has been subjected? The battering-ram, the sword, the carbine, the battle-axe have made no such havoc as the needle. I would that these living sepulchres in which women have for ages been buried might be opened, and that some resurrection trumpet might bring up these living corpses to the fresh air and sunlight.

Go with me, and I will show you a woman who, by hardest toil, supports her children, her drunken husband, her old father and mother, pays her house-rent, always has wholesome food on the table, and when she can get some neighbor on the Sabbath to come in and take care of her family, appears in church, with hat and cloak that are far from indicating the toil to which she is subjected.

Such a woman as that has body and soul enough to fit her for any position. She could stand beside the majority of your salesmen and dispose of more goods. She could go into your wheelwright shops and beat one-half of your workmen at making carriages. We talk about woman as though we had resigned to her all the light work, and ourselves had shouldered the heavier. But the day of judgment, which will reveal the sufferings of the stake and inquisition, will marshal before the throne of God and the hierarchs of heaven the martyrs of wash-tub and needle.

Now, I say, if there be any preference in occupation, let woman have it. God knows her trials are the severest. By her acuter sensitiveness to misfortune, by her hour of anguish, I demand that no one hedge up her pathway to a livelihood. O the meanness, the despicability of men who begrudge a woman the right to work anywhere, in any honorable calling!

I go still further, and say that women should have equal compensation with men. By what principle of justice is it that women in many of our cities get only two-thirds as much pay as men, and in many cases only half? Here is the gigantic injustice—that for work equally well, if not better done, woman receives far less compensation than man. Start with the National Government: for a long while women clerks in Washington got nine hundred dollars for doing that for which men received eighteen hundred.

To thousands of young women in our cities to-day there is only this alternative: starvation or dishonor. Many of the largest mercantile establishments of our cities are accessory to these abominations; and from their large establishments there are scores of souls being pitched off into death; and their employers know it!

Is there a God? Will there be a judgment? I tell you, if God rises up to redress woman's wrongs, many of our large establishments will be swallowed up quicker than a South-American earthquake ever took down a city. God will catch these oppressors between the two mill-stones of his wrath, and grind them to powder!

I hear from all this land the wail of womanhood. Man has nothing to answer to that wail but flatteries. He says she is an angel. She is not. She knows she is not. She is a human being, who gets hungry when she has no food, and cold when she has no fire. Give her no more flatteries: give her justice!

There are about fifty thousand sewing-girls in New York and Brooklyn. Across the darkness of this night I hear their death groan. It is not such a cry as comes from those who are suddenly hurled out of life, but a slow, grinding, horrible wasting away. Gather them before you and look into their faces, pinched, ghastly, hunger-struck! Look at their fingers, needle-pricked and blood-tipped! See that premature stoop in the shoulders! Hear that dry, hacking, merciless cough!

At a large meeting of these women, held in a hall in Philadelphia, grand speeches were delivered, but a needle-woman took the stand, threw aside her faded shawl, and with her shrivelled arm, hurled a very thunderbolt of eloquence, speaking out the horrors of her own experience.

Stand at the corner of a street in New York in the very early morning, as the women go to their work. Many of them had no breakfast except the crumbs that were left over from the night before, or a crust they chew on their way through the street. Here they come! the working girls of the city! These engaged in bead-work, these in flower-making, in millinery, enamelling, cigar-making, book-binding, labelling, feather-picking, print-coloring, paper-box making, but, most overworked of all, and least compensated, the sewing-women. Why do they not take the city cars on their way up? They cannot afford the five cents! If, concluding to deny herself something else, she gets into the car, give her a seat! You want to see how Latimer and Ridley appeared in the fire: look at that woman and behold a more horrible martyrdom, a hotter fire, a more agonizing death!

One Sabbath night, in the vestibule of my church, after service, a woman fell in convulsions. The doctor said she needed medicine not so much as something to eat. As she began to revive, in her delirium, she said, gaspingly: "Eight cents! Eight cents!"

eight cents! I wish I could get it done! I am so tired! I wish I could get some sleep, but I must get it done! Eight cents! Eight cents!" We found afterwards that she was making garments at eight cents apiece, and that she could make but three of them in a day. Hear it! Three times eight are twenty-four! Hear it, men and women who have comfortable homes!

Some of the worst villains of the city are the employers of these women. They beat them down to the last penny, and try to cheat them out of that. The woman must deposit a dollar or two before she gets the garments to work on. When the work is done it is sharply inspected, the most insignificant flaws picked out, and the wages refused, and sometimes the dollar deposited is not given back. The Women's Protective Union reports a case where one of these poor souls, finding a place where she could get more wages, resolved to change employers, and went to get her pay for work done. The employer says: "I hear you are going to leave me?"—"Yes," she said, "and I have come to get what you owe me." He made no answer. She said: "Are you not going to pay me?"—"Yes," he said, "I will pay you;" and he kicked her down the stairs.

How are these evils to be eradicated? What have you to answer, you who sell coats, and have shoes made, and contract for the Southern and Western markets? What help is there, what panacea, what redemption? Some say: "Give women the ballot." What effect such ballot might have on other questions I am not here to discuss; but what would be the effect of female suffrage upon woman's wages? I do not believe that woman will ever get justice by woman's ballot.

Indeed, women oppress women as much as men do. Do not women, as much as men, beat down to the lowest figure the woman who sews for them? Are not women as sharp as men on washerwomen, and milliners, and mantua-makers? If a woman asks a dollar for her work, does not her female employer ask her if she will not take ninety cents? You say "only ten cents difference;" but that is sometimes the difference between heaven and hell. Women often have less commiseration for women than men. If a woman steps aside from the path of virtue, man may forgive—woman never! Woman will never get justice done her from woman's ballot.

Never will she get it from man's ballot. How, then? God will rise up for her. God has more resources than we know of. The flaming sword that hung at Eden's gate when woman was driven out will cleave with its terrible edge her oppressors.

But there is something for our women to do. Let our young people prepare to excel in spheres of work, and they will be able, after a while, to get larger wages. If it be shown that a woman can, in a store, sell more goods in a year than a man, she will soon be able not only to ask but to demand more wages, and to demand them successfully. Unskilled and incompetent labor must take what is given; skilled and competent labor will eventually make its own standard. Admitting that the law of supply and demand regulates these things, I contend that the demand for skilled labor is very great, and the supply very small.

Start with the idea that work is honorable, and that you can do some one thing better than any one else. Resolve that, God helping, you will take care of yourself. If you are, after a while, called into another relation you will all the better be qualified for it by your spirit of self-reliance; or if you are called to stay as you are, you can be happy and self-supporting.

Poets are fond of talking about man as an oak, and woman the vine that climbs it; but I have seen many a tree fall that not only went down itself, but took all the vines with it. I can tell you of something stronger than an oak for an ivy to climb on, and that is the throne of the great Jehovah. Single or affianced, that woman is strong who leans on God and does her best. The needle may break; the factory-band may slip; the wages may fail; but over every good woman's head there are spread the two great, gentle, stupendous wings of the Almighty.

Many of you will go single-handed through life, and you will have to choose between two characters. Young woman, I am sure you will turn your back upon the useless, giggling, painted nonentity which society ignominiously acknowledges to be a woman, and ask God to make you an humble, active, earnest Christian.

What will become of this godless disciple of fashion? What an insult to her sex! Her manners are an outrage upon decency. She is more thoughtful of the attitude she strikes upon the carpet than how she will look in the judgment; more worried about her freckles than her sins; more interested in her bonnet-strings than in her redemption. Her apparel is the poorest part of a Christian woman, however magnificently dressed, and no one has so much right to dress well as a Christian. Not so with the godless disciple of fashion. Take her robes, and you take everything. Death will come down on her some day, and rub the bistre off her eyelids, and the rouge off her cheeks, and with two rough, bony hands, scatter spangles and glass beads and rings and ribbons and lace and brooches and buckles and sashes and fringes and gold-settes and golden clasps.

The dying actress whose life had been vicious said: "The scene closes. Draw the curtain." Generally the tragedy comes first, the farce afterward; but in her life it was first the farce of a useless life, and then the tragedy of a wretched eternity.

Compare the life and death of such an one with that of some Christian aunt that was once a blessing to your household. I do not know that she was ever offered a hand in marriage. She lived single, that untrammelled she might be everybody's blessing. Whenever the sick were to be visited, or the poor to be provided with bread, she went with a blessing. She could pray, or sing "Rock of Ages," for any sick pauper who asked her. As she got older, there were days when she was a little sharp, but for the most part Auntie was a sunbeam—just the one for Christmas-eve. She knew better than any one else how to fix things.

Her every prayer, as God heard it, was full of everybody who had trouble. The brightest things in all the house dropped from her fingers. She had peculiar notions, but the grandest notion she ever had was to make you happy. She dressed well—Auntie always dressed well; but her highest adornment was that of a meek and quiet spirit, which, in the sight of God is, of great price.

When old Auntie died, you all gathered lovingly about her; and as you carried her out to rest, the Sunday School class almost covered the coffin with japonicas; and the poor people stood at the end of the alley, with their aprons to their eyes, sobbing bitterly; and the man of the world said, with Solomon, "Her price was above rubies;" and Jesus, as unto the maiden in Judea, commanded: "I say unto thee, arise!"

Alien Children Led to Christ.

the necessary financial support, we could take many interesting Spanish children whose cases so strongly appeal to us, and who would soon become evangelizing agents for many other homes. The training-school, through the kindness of friends, has been located for the summer on the banks of the Connecticut river, at Middle Haddam, Conn.

"Some of the cases we encounter in the work," she added, "are peculiarly interesting. One is that of a mother of two bright, interesting boys. She felt herself to be dying, and commended the two boys to our care to be trained in the Protestant faith. She was a Catholic. Another was that of a dying girl of seventeen, who, three years previous, had found Christ to be precious. She sighed heavily, as she exclaimed, 'In no other way can the Gospel reach our people, except through training our children in the right way. I beg that you will take my sisters and teach them while their hearts are tender. I am so thankful that my mother taught me to love Jesus. Promise me that you will seek out the children of our nationality, and teach them while they are young.' This was five years ago, and I have tried to fulfil my promise to the dying girl, whose triumphant end led others to the same Saviour that she had found."

"Again and again have dying ones, who had themselves accepted the Gospel, committed their little ones to us to be trained for Jesus. A man who had read the Bible in secret for twelve years, implored us to teach his girls of the love of God. 'Many of our nationalities have been taught to fear him,' he said, 'but few have been taught to love him.' So, scattered through New York and Brooklyn, we have many awaiting us to fulfill our promise to dying ones.

"A Spanish mother in Cuba, through reading her Bible, became a Protestant, and desiring a Christian education for her little girl—a beautiful child of eight—brought her to New York and placed her in our school at 181 West Tenth street. Many efforts have been made by her fanatic friends to take the child from us, but the mother stands firmly in her faith that God will aid her in securing a Protestant Christian education for her child. One of our little girls, after being in our home school a few months, became very anxious for her father, and procuring a Spanish Bible, sent it to him with passages marked in it for him to read. She never forgets to pray for him and asks others to do the same. Another, a bright, intelligent girl, frequently prays that her intemperate mother may be reclaimed. Already the children who have been in our home the past three years have exerted a marked influence for good in the homes they represent. In no other way can the Gospel of Christ so readily find an entrance into dark places as through the hearts of these little children, trained to read and study the Bible, and to practice its precepts in their lives. Some earnest Christian workers are found among them who have sacrificed much, from a worldly point of view, to give the Gospel to their own people."

The Congregational Home Missionary Society has five Spanish churches under its charge: two in New Mexico, one in Texas, one in Florida, and one in New York. The work is going forward year by year.

Mrs. Flora K. Regal, of Oberlin, O., who has had considerable missionary experience among Spanish-Americans, writes concerning the Cuban-Spanish: "They are a somewhat restless, adventurous people, pleasure-seeking, fond of festivities and public amusements, not much devoted to education or literary pursuits, and following the Roman Catholic faith at so great a distance as to receive little of either bane or blessing from its teachings. They do not change materially by being transplanted to the United States. Their work days may be fuller of tasks, but their Sundays are just as much given up to excursions, horse racing, baseball games and festivities of every sort as in more easy-going Cuba or their remoter ancestors' home in Spain. A lady who went to Tampa and Ybor City, where the largest numbers of them are congregated, purposely to study the condition of these Spanish-speaking Americans, was struck by the utter absence of anything suggestive of religious observance. One man indeed boasted to her that he was not like the rest, he had his baby baptized. Searching in his pockets for a coin he drew forth a handful of miscellaneous objects, among which were some lottery tickets. The lady manifested her surprise, saying, 'You don't use those, do you?' 'O, yes!' he replied, 'we all do. If we take this new religion you offer us, shall we have to give up the lottery?'"

It is for the rescue and training of the children of parents of this class that Miss Strong's work is conducted, and in view of the excellent results already accomplished and the wide possibilities before it, it deserves the approval and support of Christians everywhere. She can be addressed at Middle Haddam, Conn.

EASTERN WATER-VENDERS.

IN Oriental lands, in spite of some modern innovations, there are still many localities where water is a costly luxury and the possession of a well a thing greatly to be desired. Wells have become links in the history and landmarks in the topography of many places in Palestine and throughout Arabia. They are usually excavated from the solid limestone rock, and are arranged so as to be easily accessible to the water-carriers, who are generally women.

In the cities, towns and villages, a familiar figure is that of the water-seller, who passes through the streets and highways with his loaded water-skin strapped across his muscular shoulders, crying his wares to the passersby. These skin-bottles keep the water wonderfully fresh and cool for many hours; but to a European or American, accustomed to an abundant supply of excellent water, and to cities where public fountains toss the crystal liquid across lawns and gardens, the draught from a water-seller's cup in Cairo, Jerusalem or Joppa would seem unpalatable and even nauseating.

Our illustration is taken from a photograph brought from the East by Rev. Dr. Talmage, and represents a blind Syrian water-vender and his daughter, on their rounds in a neighborhood where fresh water is a rarity, and kitchen faucets, street hydrants and fountains are unknown.

EASTER IN RUSSIA.

The Russian Easter fetes began on Saturday, April 29 (the last day of Passover week). A large proportion of the population are so incapacitated by the excesses of these fetes as to be unfit for any decent work till the following week. The long Lenten fast is only broken at midnight—it is possible, on cakes and coffee blessed by a priest. The wealthy have the priests to visit them at home, whilst the poor sit patiently round the cathedrals and churches till the midnight service is over, and the priests are at liberty to bless. The exteriors of St. Isaac's and Razan Cathedrals on Easter eve present a picture more like a fair than anything else, the massive granite steps being covered with women in gay dresses, each jealously guarding her little basket containing a whipped cream cake and aniseed biscuits, waiting for the Paschal blessing. Inside, the crowd has stood for five or six hours packed close, and steaming into the dimly-lighted, suffocating naves.

THE WOES OF THE DRUNKARD.

S.S. Lesson for June 17. Prov. 23:29-35. Golden Text, Prov. 23:31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT is a terrible thing when a man, created in the image of God has so far fallen from the dignity of his being, that he does not hesitate to put himself under a power which he knows by experience to be stronger than himself, and which makes him its piteous, miserable, degraded slave. Drunkenness originates in self-indulgence. Those parents who do not teach their children self-control from their earliest years, are preparing those children to fall under the power of their own lust, through drunkenness, or other vices which may be worse. The woes of the drunkard begin long before he becomes a drunkard. When he is a self-willed child, and obtains, by worrying his parents, just what his fancy craves at the moment, his woes have begun; he does not know the sweetness of self-denial for others, or the dignity of self-control; he has already become a slave. There is no creature on earth so miserable as he who is a slave to his own caprice, his life is one series of disappointments, one long history of imperious demands on others to gratify him, and discontent with all and everything with which he seeks in vain to satisfy his morbid, diseased will. Seeking to make everybody serve him, he becomes the most abject vassal to his tyrannical self.

God never created man to live for himself—Jesus the pattern-man, the Man, the second Adam, “came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a Ransom for many.” And “He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again.” The self-indulgent man not only ruins himself, but brings a curse and misery on all with whom he comes in contact. The man who lives not unto himself, but unto Christ, brings life and joy to those to whom God sends him. What is more miserable than a drunkard’s home? He has lost the respect and confidence of wife and children, his presence is dreaded, instead of welcomed; his absence is a relief, and this he knows, and yet it maddens him, instead of humbling him, and instead of confessing his own culpability, he, in his frenzy, persecutes those whom he has made to suffer. The poor drunkard is he has sold himself. No man can stand alone, every man is possessed either by God or the devil, who gives little peace to the drunkard whom he has succeeded in possessing. Who hath woe? Who hath contentions? Who hath wounds without cause? Go to the houses of the slaves of drink, poor or rich, for the answer. A look round will suffice; the samples are to be seen by the thousand. “Contention,” complaining, needless wounds, wounds in no useful cause; “redness of eyes;” this is the drunkard’s only gain! this is the fruit of his lost reputation, his empty house, his ruined health, his degraded humanity, his lost soul! And yet so utterly enslaved is he that he cannot break loose himself; knowing that the drink has caused all his misery, yet his last word is: “I will seek it again.” Even when its awful consequence—delirium tremens—has come upon him; no sooner does he recover, it God spares his life, than his steps return to the path of his former destruction: “I will seek it yet again.” His sensations have been indescribably horrible: “as one that lieth down in the midst of the sea;” the awful sensation of drowning! as one that “lieth on the top of a mast;” no possibility of balancing himself! Seeing enemies around, and unable to take account of them. “They have stricken me, and I was not hurt, they have beaten me and I felt it not.” Who is the “they” alluded to? Let those speak who have stood by a drunkard’s deathbed, and heard his terrible description of the devils which he saw around him. “When shall I awake?” is his cry, but it is only succeeded by the wail of his miserable, fatal bondage: “I will seek it yet again.” And yet there is Mercy for the Drunkard!

From such degradation the Lord is able to save, and save thoroughly. From every curse and every depth of sin Christ has redeemed us, “being made a curse for us.” If the drunkard can get low enough, in his own eyes, to take his place with Jesus on the Cross, he may die to his sin there. The great trouble is that Satan, who enslaves him, makes the miserable drunkard either deny his sin or justify himself. It is much more difficult for an habitual, open sinner to confess his sinfulness than for one who has led a comparatively blameless life. The drunkard’s conscience has been sinned against until it is paralyzed, while one who has obeyed his conscience has a conscience which has strengthened by exercise. But the same Lord who found a way to save the poor man who was possessed by the legion of demons, has a way open for every drunkard who will throw himself in desperation upon his mercy, and he who could turn the impure woman of Samaria into an evangelist in one single day, can do as much for any who will give in, as that woman did, when he begins to enter into judgment with them about their past lives.

But there is a drunkenness, not from wine or stimulants, which also has its dangers and its woes. Again and again, in the Word of God, we are exhorted to be sober. The drunkard and the opium slave put themselves under the power of intoxicants and narcotics, and the enemy of God and man, makes both fools and tools of them. He makes words to come out of their lips which in sober moments they would repudiate and shrink from with loathing. He makes them commit acts which they would rather die than do if the spell which is upon them were broken; but they are out of themselves, no longer their own masters, they have yielded themselves servants to obey sin, and sin has conquered and enslaved them. Can it be that true Christians can, in any sense, resemble the drunkard by their lack of sobriety which the Scripture enjoins? There are Christians who become intoxicated with success, even in Christian work, and they are as much out of themselves in their exultation, as the drunkard is when he is under the influence of stimulants. The excitement of joy to which they give themselves up leads them beyond themselves, and in unguarded moments the enemy comes in and sows his seed of spiritual pride, of self-esteem, and of self-dependence, and forgetting in his intoxication of joy that he is a poor instrument whom God has been pleased to use, the child of God, thus stimulated, becomes impatient of rebuke and manifests an overbearing spirit, which in sober moments would shock him. How many get led away by excitement in a meeting, and give the rein to their feelings of gladness in anything but a sober way, believing all the time that they are serving God, while really they are yielding to an intoxication which must have its reaction.

Follow them to their homes; the joy they have experienced does not make them meek and gentle under injustice and oppression. The very self which was indulged in of joy, asserts itself under the rubs and vexations of daily life, and they fret against them, and feel something like a sense of being wronged if they, so used and so blest, are crossed as other people are. The true joy of the Lord never intoxicates, it is the joy of giving him joy, and this is always sober. Spiritual intoxication is a joy which does not last, it consists in emotions which, in their very nature are transient, just like the passing courage, and passing hilarity of the miserable drunkard. Especially in relation to the Lord’s coming are we exhorted to be sober. In I. Thes. 5:1-3, Paul has been speaking of the coming of the Lord as a thief unexpectedly and without warning: “When they shall say: Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them,” and they shall not escape. “But,” he adds, “ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief; for ye are all sons of light and sons of the day, ye are not of night nor of darkness, so then, let us not sleep as do the rest, but let us watch and be sober.” Anything in our life which unites us for the coming of our Lord is a want of sobriety. Exultation, because of our usefulness, or because of our Christian experience; or depression, if we are not used as others are, and, if our experience is not similar to theirs, are equally lacking in the sobriety, the holy awe, which befits those who are looking for him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ON THE TOP OF THE MAST.

THOUSANDS can bear witness from sad experience that the words of the lesson are an accurate and life-like picture of the drunkard’s condition. The inspired writer did not exaggerate when he compared the dangerous position of the drunkard to that of a man on the mast of a ship. Trouble, and sorrow, and quarrels, and silly talking, and injuries, and disfigurement—all these are the common lot of the man who becomes intoxicated. No child in a Sunday School needs to have this proved to him; he sees it for himself. He instinctively despises a drunken man, and naturally believes that he is in no danger of becoming the thing he holds in contempt. But the teacher can do a useful service by pointing out that the drunkard never intended to become what he is. When he was a boy he thought there was no danger. Thousands of drunkards have said so. There are boys now who are not apprehensive, but who will become drunkards, such as the lesson describes. It is a fate to be dreaded. The sure way to avoid it is never to enter the path that leads to it. Once started on the road, momentum is acquired at every step, until it is as difficult to stop, as for a man to stop who sets out to run down a steep hill. Some there are who travel on that road and escape, by perpetual vigilance and great firmness, but a large proportion fall. The chief reason is, that when the traveller first realizes his danger, he is powerless to defend himself. He does not have a fair fight because there is a craving within him that takes sides with the enemy. So insidiously and stealthily does the love of intoxicants grow; and so gradually does the victim get to depend on them, that when he discovers that he is in danger of becoming a drunkard, nothing can save him but a strong and resolute effort of the will, and this he is incapable of making. If children are induced to exercise their power of self-restraint while they have it, they will be safe from this hideous and revolting vice. That course should be urged as the only path of safety.

It biteth like a serpent. Gough used to tell a parable to this effect: A man saw a snake surrounded by a circle of fire. “Help me out of my difficulty,” said the snake. “If I do,” said the man, “you will bite me.” “Oh, no, I won’t,” “I am afraid to trust you,” “Help me out of the fire or it will consume me, and I promise on my word of honor, I won’t bite you.” The man took hold of the snake and lifted it out of the fiery circle. Then the reptile said, “Now, I’ll bite you.” “But didn’t you promise me you wouldn’t?” “Yes, but don’t you know it’s my nature to bite and I can’t help it.” So it is with the drink. It is its nature to bite; it is its nature to deceive.

At the last. Then is the bitter time. There is bitterness at intervals all along the drunkard’s path; but at the last when he finds that there is no power that can stop his swift descent to a drunkard’s grave, then he realizes how the adder has stung him. The story is told of a coachman who for many years had driven a coach to and fro between the towns. There were many steep hills on the road and the coach was fitted out with one of those strong brakes which are operated by the coachman with his foot. The coachman felt sick, and death was coming on him swiftly and surely. His sister was watching him, and observed him making a restless motion with his foot. “George,” she said, “Why do you keep bending your knee? What is the matter with your foot?” “Oh,” he said, “I am on an awful down grade, and I can’t find the brake. That is the way with a man who discovers that the power of the drink habit has gained the mastery over him. He thought he could stop when he made up his mind to do so, but he is on an awful down grade and cannot find the brake.

Thine eyes shall behold strange things. (R.V.) Gough had delirium tremens before he became a total abstainer, and he thus describes his sensations: The victim is scared by images, by visions of creeping things about and around him. Now, if these things were realities, they would not startle him so much. Suppose, at night, an animal frightful in appearance came into your room with heavy tread, what would you do? It were a reality, you would spring at it, you would fight with it, and gather fresh courage from every resounding blow. You are fighting a tangible thing. Suppose that thing comes with soft foot-fall into your room, and you seize a weapon and strike a blow at it. Your weapon passes through the horrid thing, and you find it is a phantom. You grasp at it, and grasp again, and clutch nothing; still there is a mocking look on its frightful face. You are not simply frightened, but transfixed with horror. The skin lifts from the scalp to the ankles; your hair stands on end, for you know there is nothing there to fight. Men have been found dead in the attitude of keeping off some awful image like this. I once knew a man that was tormented with a horrid human face that glared at him from the wall. He struck at it, but he only bruised his hand against the wall. He stepped back a pace or two, and still the fearful thing leared at him. Madened to desperation he struck at it again and again, until the bones of his hand were broken and the wall marred with his blood—all this in beating a phantom. That is the horror of delirium tremens. I shall never forget it.

Who hath woe? The warden of a jail in New York says that in the experience of many years one instance of almost maddening sorrow and remorse lives in his memory, as the most terrible mental agony he ever witnessed. A man was brought in at night crazy with liquor and was thrust into a cell. He had committed a murder in his frenzy. It was morning before he recovered his reason sufficiently to understand where he was, and the warden went to see him. “Why am I here? What am I charged with?” the prisoner cried. The warden said, “You have committed murder.” The prisoner gave a piercing shriek. “Murder! O, my poor wife! What will she say? It will break her heart!” The warden looked upon him pityingly, but the truth had to be told and he said solemnly, “It is you wife that you have murdered.” Then the agony began which ultimately ended in madness and suicide.

When shall I awake I will seek it yet again. A Chicago physician says that the most sad and distressing case he ever treated was that of a sufferer from delirium tremens. His patient was an intimate friend who had been at college with him. Knowing how much the doctor loved him, the sick man’s family sent for him when the madness first showed itself. With great difficulty the doctor saved his friend’s life. He told him when he was recovering how narrowly he had escaped and pleaded with him never to touch the destroyer again. All his efforts were vain. “I cannot resist,” was the reply. “It is useless to promise; I should break any promise of that kind it I made it.” The first opportunity he had of leaving home alone, he used to get brandy. He was miserable and feeble and he meant to take only enough to give him strength. But he drank enough to bring on a relapse, from which he died.

"The Burden of Samaria."

Our Traveller at Omri's Ancient Capital—Samaritan Boys—An Ungracious Welcome—Sorcery and the Kodak.

"SHE ANSWERED TESTILY."

ment of a prophecy pronounced against the laughing rival of Jerusalem, two thousand six hundred years ago. The turns of the road are made by buried ruins; here and there, a carved fragment has been washed bare, the corner of a stone sarcophagus projects. The thoroughfare is ancient, and probably the same by which the four leprous men stole down in the twilight from the gate of the besieged city into the camp of the Syrians, in the desperation of famine: "If they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, we shall but die."

The route is as solitary and silent now as when the night hid from the trembling outcasts the deserted tents and ways of what they had expected to find teeming with life. Of the old Samaria, nothing is left but heaps upon heaps, and bordering the neglected road upon a plateau more than half-way up the mountain, a line of truncated granite columns, the remains, say some, of the market-place, or forum of Omri's city.

"If you please, Captain, you will find that in First Kings, the sixteenth chapter, twenty-fourth verse," interjects a respectful voice from the head of the little cavalcade. The Bible cushion in these wayside lectures is the pommel of the saddle generously pressed upon Alcides by the beloved physician in Beirut as infinitely more comfortable than the ordinary Arabian. From the peripatetic desk we hear the first record made of the celebrated town.

"And he bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of the city, which he built, after the name of Shemer, owner of the hill, 'Samaria,'" or, as the margin has it, "Shomeron," or, "Watch-fort." An orchard of olive-trees backs the ruined pillars, and a little further on, the road ends in the modern village of Samaria.

We have only time to see that it is like a majority of other Syrian hamlets—less thrifty than Nazareth, and not so large, and cleaner than Jenin, when our guide rides back from the front to the spot where we have paused for a view of the landscape, and the shining ribbon of the Mediterranean bounding it upon our right.

"If you please, here is something you will like to see,—the boys of Samaria at the very games, I doubt not, which the holy men of old when children, played in Israel and Samaria, and in like manner."

We hasten into an open space,—the village common, it may be called,—peopled, at this instant, with a wild rabble of youngsters, scratching, biting, kicking and swearing; there is no mistaking the tone of profanity, however strange the tongue, like a pack of quarrelsome hounds.

Jeremiah would have laughed with us, at the unexpected climax of our expectation, and the added stimulus of the grieved chagrin eloquent in the honest bronzed visage of the showman, at our shout of "Holy men of old! O, David!"

"And they were so peaceful and friendly not three minutes ago, I do assure you!"

They are neither friendly nor reasonable, for when they can be persuaded to stop fighting one another, they despise the admonition to "go on playing," and after basely accepting a bribe to get into position, get into position by driving a stick into the ground, then, catching sight of the kodak, raise a shriek of "sorcerer!" and pelt up the hill, carrying the money with them.

Our respect for Crusaders deepens with each visit to such memorials of their occupancy of the Sacred Soil as the ruins of magnificent bridges, strong fortresses and noble churches which the wanton Saracen and pitiless Time have not succeeded in effacing utterly. The impression is too general, even among educated Christians, that the impetuous zeal to rescue the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of the infidel, expended itself in a great measure is spasmodic fury such as was displayed by the bereaved bridegroom who—

Threw his life away, fighting with the Turk.

Treasure and taste were lavished, no less than the best blood of Christendom, in the effort to establish the true faith in the land that had given the Founder of faith to the whole world, and it is not in human nature gaged here, the last vestige of Christian architecture will, in a few days, be obliterated. Holding, as we do, as a principle of good breeding, the obligation to bear ourselves decorously in whatever place of worship we may visit, we have made the round of the place, quietly, and are on our way to the entrance when a man who seems to be the superintendent of the work men, steps up in front of us and addresses us in Arabic, to which David replies.

We next ask to see the reputed tomb of John the Baptist in the crypt "It is by no means probable that he was buried here," we are informed. "It is believed that John was beheaded at Herod's castle at Machias beyond the Jordan, and as the Captain will see in St. Matt. 14: 12, and likewise in St. Mark 6: 29, his disciples got possession of his body and buried it. St. Mark says, 'laid it in a tomb.' Then 'they went and told Jesus.' They would hardly bring umns lining the ancient market-place and the olive-orchard, amid a thicket of low trees—known by Christian peasants as the "Christ-thorn," because of the legend that from a branch of this thorny crown was platted—and a tangle of fuzzy growth, gathered when dry for fuel by the poorest women, is the alleged site of the "ivory palace of Ahab's queen."

Almost a century after the memory of the wicked sovereign and his wicked consort had rotted from the mind of the nation they had misruled, the herdman of Tekoa saw in a vision the fairy-like structure that was the coronet of mighty Samaria, and prophesied concerning it:

"And I will smite the winter house with the summer house: and the houses of ivory shall perish, and the great houses shall have an end, saith the Lord."

Lizards, green and black, slip in and out of the jungle, scampering faster as the branches are stirred by a lean, starved-looking donkey, who pokes his head between two thorn-bushes to look at us. We have seen no dearer spot, unless it were the heap of stones passed soon after leaving Damascus, a cairn covering the reputed grave of Nimrod.

No one who has read the weird lines could refrain from reciting aloud here—

They say the Lion and Lizard keep
The courts where Jamsheed gloried and drank deep;
And Bahram, that great Hunter, the wild Ass,
Stamps o'er his head, but cannot break his sleep.

The prickly furze—for which we know no other name—is at the driest now, and Bedouin women, from the encampment of booths we see in a hollow of the great hill down there, are cutting it with bill-hooks, binding it into immense bundles and bearing it home upon their heads. It is light, although so bulky; yet we watch them with wonder, stepping fleetly over stones and stubble, straight and strong, apparently careless of the loads.

In the direction toward which our faces are turned a panorama of fertile loveliness unfolds itself to the delight of eyes wearied by sterile terraces and jutting crags. Slopes are greening under a day of blandest sunshine: in sheltered crevices, flowers—pink, white and yellow—are beginning to bloom, and in the gentle descent into the Valley of Shechem, the silver-green groves are vocal with the laughter and prattle of children who are gathering purple olives from laden boughs. They fall into line and return our salute as we pass.

"The labor of the olive has not ceased," says one, yet, in the mournful recollection of the matted jungle overgrowing the fallen stones of the royal palace, another wondrous prophecy is read aloud before the "guide book" is returned to the saddle-pocket:

"And it shall come to pass in that day that every place shall be, where there were a thousand vines and a thousand silverings, it shall be even for briars and thorns;

"With arrows and with bows shall men come hither: because all the land shall become briars and thorns."

This is Isaiah's cry against "the head of Ephraim, which is Samaria."

And "For all this, his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still."

not to grow bitter, sometimes, at thought and sight of the desecration that has succeeded a sublime, if ill-judged enterprise.

A fondly-cherished family tradition has to do with a renowned champion of the Cross, who fought every inch of his way from Jaffa to Jerusalem, and left his bones in the dust of Mount Zion. We have never acknowledged the kinship more fully than the indignant leap of our pulses at an incident of our visit to the Church of St. John the Baptist, the one object of interest in modern Samaria. The walls have withstood the action of almost nine centuries, "Crusaders' work" being the synonym for stability from corner to cap-stone. Hammer and trowel are busy upon the interior as we cross the marble threshold. The whole church is gutted, and is undergoing alteration into a Mohammedan mosque. Portions of it have been thus used for a hundred years. Under the hands now en-

He pauses to speak to a woman sitting upon the ground, an earthenware bowl of dough between her knees, in the door of a stone building plastered with mud. She replies to his kind tone, testily, without looking at him, and draws her veil over the lower part of her face. We know the place for a public oven, having seen such elsewhere, and having, also, witnessed the friendly favor gained by our dragoman with all sorts and conditions of people, are amazed that this acquaintance should snub him decidedly. He shakes his head sorrowfully in walking away.

"That woman's husband was sick last year, and I was kind to him, and to-day it is she who has told the boys that we are sorcerers, on account of the kodak, and she

THE "FOOD FUND" BALANCE SHEET.

IN this issue, we lay before our readers the balance sheet of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund, covering the entire period of its operations, from January 24 to May 31. From this statement can be seen at a glance the marvellous growth of the Fund, the wide scope of its charities, and the army of destitute families and individuals who were succored from famine during the time of the greatest distress this country has probably ever known.

From first to last, the Food Fund was a glorious illustration of the virtue and blessedness of Christian helpfulness. It was the spontaneous outpouring of thousands of sympathetic hearts "In His Name" and for the sake of His poor. And of these multitudinous gifts, prayerfully sent and received in the spirit of gratitude, not one missed the mark. Every dime as well as every dollar contributed, brought relief and joy to some home whose inmates, sick with want and well-nigh despairing of aid from God or man, were strengthened in body and in spirit. The Food Fund was the means of saving the lives of many feeble ones—men, women, and children—whose vitality, undermined by long privation, must soon have surrendered; but its spiritual results, and the number of fainting and despairing souls whom, under Divine guidance, it was instrumental in leading to the recognition of God's infinite goodness and care for all his children, can only be known in the hereafter. Those devoted pastors who helped us in the distribution, as well as our own missionaries, bear testimony to the fact that the prayers and the gifts of the Fund contributors found a rich spiritual response in many conversions.

There are many among the poor to whom the improved condition of things has brought but little relief, and in such homes the children are perhaps the greatest sufferers. Living in squalor and want during the coming torrid months of summer, after the hardships of a terrible winter, their condition will be a pitiful one indeed. Many of these children have been taught to regard the Food Fund as the benefactor who saved their homes at the time of cold and hunger; and their further care, for a time at least, comes as a legacy from the relief work of the winter. It is the purpose of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the approval of its friends, to apply the unexpended balance of the Food Fund toward the establishment of a Fresh Air Mission, and thus by caring for the children and providing for their physical and spiritual needs during the summer, to carry out that generous philanthropy to its fullest conclusion. Next week we shall submit to our readers the details of this new charity which, before these lines meet the eyes of our subscribers, will already be in practical operation.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

E. D. Wyman, Beaver River, Can. Is Marion Harland who is traveling in Palestine for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a married lady? Who is her companion?

Yes; she is the wife of Rev. Mr. Terhune, a Brooklyn clergyman. Her companion is her son. She has besides, the usual attendants including a dragoman or guide, indispensable to those who travel in the Orient.

Leonard Fillkins, Cincinnati, O. 1. Is the balance of trade still against the U. S. as it was a year ago? 2. What was it in 1888?

1. No; it is slightly in our favor, the exports for the last twelve months being nearly $325,000,000 in excess of imports. 2. Exports, $695,900,000; imports, $723,900,000. Economists do not regard the "balance of trade" as an infallible criterion of a country's prosperity.

Mrs. May Long, Paw Paw, Mich., and others. In sending out religious literature to the various prisons for the benefit of the prisoners, will you please inform us how and to whom it should be sent—whether to the Chaplain or Warden?

To the Chaplain, preferably, although the warden would doubtless see that it reached its destination. Send to the Chaplain at Sing Sing Prison, Sing Sing, N. Y.; Illinois State Penitentiary, Joliet, Ill.; Elmira Reformatory, Elmira, N. Y.; Pennsylvania State Prison, or to similar institutions in your own state, in all of which it will be appreciated.

Subscriber, Burson, Cal. Where does it say in the Bible that the soul is immortal?

See Psalm 17: 15; Psalm 73: 24; Isa. 26: 19; Ezekiel 18: 4-9 and 27; Habakkuk 3: 17, 18; 1 Thess. 4: 13; Phil. 1: 21; Phil. 3: 10; II Cor. 5: 1; I Thess. 4: 18; II Tim. 4: 6-8; John 11: 25; John 22: 19, 20; John 21: 14; Luke 22: 14; 51; Luke 23: 43; Matt. 28: 20; Job 19: 25. These are only a few of the passages, but others might be quoted, all showing indisputably that the inspired writers kept clearly and strongly in view the doctrine of the immortality of the soul.

Seaton Greene, Boiling Springs, N. C. Is it an evidence that one is a Christian when he desires to see Christian virtues in the actions and conduct of others?

It can be regarded as in the nature of collateral evidence. The best proof of one's own Christianity is the testimony of a pure and upright life and a holy and helpful example. When this exists, there will come as a natural result, the desire to lead others to the same enviable condition and to awaken in them the wish to cultivate those virtues that are the crown of the true Christian character.

J. L. Sinnott, Kansas City, Mo. What is the Gethsemane System?

It is a plan adopted in that Swedish city for the regulating of the licensing system whereby the city authorities contract for three years with a limited company which takes the whole number of licenses, and hands over to the town treasury the net proceeds of its trade. The result has been the reduction of licenses to less than half of the former number, and a decrease of 22 per cent in the arrests for drunkenness. The liquor traffic is suspended between 6 p. m. Saturday and 8 a. m. Monday. The saloon as an element in Scandinavian politics is now unknown.

J. C. Griffin, Mooseville, Ind. Who organized the first Sabbath School?

The founder of the first Sunday School was Robert Raikes, a printer, of Gloucester, England. He saw that the spiritual condition of the children of his native town was greatly neglected, and he engaged four persons who had been accustomed to teaching, and undertook to send children to them every Sunday for religious instructions. The hours at first were from 10 to 12 a. m., then, after a brief intermission, another short session at 1 p. m., after which the children were taken to church. After church they were employed repeating the catechism till 5.30, and were then dismissed with an injunction to "go home without making a noise, and by no means to play on the street." This was the general outline of the regulations established by Mr. Raikes in a letter dated June 5, 1784. His school soon had hundreds of imitators and within a few years a Sunday School Union was formed, and Sunday religious instructions began to be general throughout the United Kingdom. It is said, however, that for more than thirty years prior to Mr. Raikes' organized experiment, Rev. John Wesley had been in the habit of assembling children in different parts of England for religious instruction; but these gatherings took place on other days than Sunday.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE MATABELE SURRENDER.

CN artist attached to the expedition in Matabeleland sends home a sketch, reproduced on this page, of the scene at the surrender of one of Lobengula's chiefs which had just occurred. It appears that there was no more skilful leader nor more valiant warrior in Lobengula's service than his son-in-law, Gambo. He was the greatest "induna" in the country and had so large a following that he was feared by Lobengula himself. When he came to surrender to Jameson, the British commander at Bulawayo, he was accompanied by other indunas and followers and herds of cattle. Bokwela, his friend and chief supporter, who commanded the Matabele regiments in the fight against Col. Goid Adams's division, was with him. They squatted in front of the British officers and talked freely of the situation. Gambo said that all the indunas had now submitted. He said with a touch of pride that he was the last to come in and he wished to make the best terms he could. He was satisfied that no benefit could come from prolonging the war and expressed his regret that it had been begun. The interview ended satisfactorily to both sides and Gambo was assured of immunity from molestation. The news soon afterward reached the British camp that he was dead and the messenger said he had been poisoned but it was not then known by whom, but probably by the agent of some rival chief. Gambo is said to have been the most enthusiastic advocate of war, and to have done more than any other Matabele chief to bring it about. His humiliating and tragic death are fulfillments of the warning the Bible gives to those who stir up strife. (Matt. 26: 52.)

A Traveler's Night of Peril.

The police of Jersey City, N. J., were informed by telephone a few days ago that some man had fallen over the cliff at Summit Avenue and was badly hurt. A man passing at night over the bridge had heard his cries for help but had been unable to find him. The police promptly despatched an ambulance and drags, and searched the cut and the embankment, but neither could they find any injured person. Early the following morning a man presented himself at the hospital and asked for help. He had a broken arm and several bad contusions. He said that he lived at Boston and was making his way thither from Schuylers County, N. Y. He had made most of the journey on freight trains and was on a train on the Pennsylvania road on the previous night. When the train made a stop at West Ferry he alighted intending to walk to the ferry. He followed the railroad embankment until he reached Summit Avenue, where he missed his footing and fell headlong. The cliff is eighty feet high at that place, but the man did not fall the whole distance. Some projection stopped his fall and hurt him so that for a time he lost consciousness. When he recovered his senses, he tried to ascertain where he was but it was dark and he could feel nothing above, or below, or around him and concluded to remain where he was until dawn. During the night he suffered severely and thought he must have fainted, but he instinctively maintained his hold. When morning broke he found himself lying on a large water-pipe which runs on a narrow ledge across the top of the bridge. As he looked down at the rocky abyss over forty feet below him he realized how near he had been to death. He crawled along the main, and reached the hospital in safety. He said he should never forget the long agony of suspense that he endured through the dark hours of that night. There are Christians who have passed through periods of spiritual darkness similarly trying, and often it is the result of wandering in forbidden paths.

They cannot understand their position, and know not what to do. A step in any direction seems beset with danger. In such cases it is generally the wisest course to wait quietly until light breaks from heaven, for the promise is sure to all God's children, that light is given to a man whose way is hedged in. (Job 3: 23.)

A Climb for Life.

A dispatch from Wilkesbarre, Pa., to the daily press describes the narrow escape near that town on May 24th, of a party of New York business men from a terrible death. They were nine in number, and all connected with the Coal Exchange. They were inspecting the South Wilkesbarre breakers, and had descended the shaft to the workings a thousand feet below the surface. Another party of nine followed them in the descending carriage, and had reached a point half way down, when a terrific explosion occurred. It was the bursting of one of the eighteen boilers at the head of the shaft. The head of the huge cylinder was blown clean off and was carried five hundred feet away. The roof of the boiler house was torn to fragments, which scattered in all directions. Happily for the descending party the carriage did not fall when the engine stopped, and they were soon drawn up with ropes. Those at the bottom of the shaft were, however, in imminent peril. They were in one of the most gaseous mines in the country, and the great ventilator and fan which kept the air fit for human breathing had suddenly stopped. Not a moment was to be lost, but there was no means of being raised to the surface. But there were cross pieces nailed to the side of the shaft and they could be used as a ladder. The visitors declared they could not climb a thousand feet on the wet and slippery timbers of this rough perpendicular ladder; but the man in charge told them it was "climb or die." Finally, one after another grasped the wooden bars and toiled slowly and painfully to the surface. Two of the party, on reaching the head of the shaft fainted from fright and exertion. Perhaps no other alternative than that dreadful one, "climb or die," would have induced them to make the toilsome ascent. But men will do much and sacrifice much to save their lives. If they were as solicitous about their spiritual lives many might be saved who are now in a social atmosphere as fatal to the soul as the air of that mine was to the body. All such should obey the injunction of the prophet and hasten away at any cost, that "they may not die in the pit." (Isa. 51: 13, 14.)

A Missing Wife Found.

A telegram from San Francisco to a gentleman in New York on May 21, brought him welcome news which started him on a quick railroad journey across the continent. Three years ago, he was startled and distressed, on returning to his home after his day at his office in New York, to find that his wife had left home and taken their seven-year-old son with her. The husband was at no loss to understand what had occurred. A sudden fit of dementia, to which he knew she was liable, had unbalanced her mind. Their could be no other cause for flight, as they had lived happily together and he knew her to be a pure, high-minded lady. All his efforts to trace her failed, but after several months he had tidings of her. They came through the agent who collected the rents of a large number of houses which she owns in the north ern section of New York. She had written to the agent for money and had given her address, but laid strict injunctions upon him a pole was seen to which a torn shirt was attached as a signal. A piece of paper fixed to the pole bore the pathetic inscription: "Out of provisions; no water; have struck out for the foot of this canon." The searchers followed in the direction indicated, and after a journey of five miles came upon the bodies of two of the Americans. Camp utensils, rifles and cartridges were scattered around. The men had evidently died of starvation and thirst. Their bodies were reverently buried and the searchers set out to look for the third American and the Mexicans. Ten days were spent in tramping over the desolate country, but without avail; no trace of the missing men could be found, and the search was reluctantly abandoned. There is no doubt that they, like their companions, perished of want. Why they did not return when their provisions began to get low, and before they came to the last awful extremity, is a mystery. Men are fully aware that food and water are necessities, and will not pursue their search for gold when those are liable to fail; although it is not uncommon to see them so eager in their race for wealth that they will not turn back when they find that their souls are being starved for the lack of spiritual food and the water of life which they are too much engrossed in their pursuit to secure. (Mark 4: 19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The BROOKLYN TABERNACLE Congregation assembled for worship on Sunday, May 20, in the Columbia Theatre. Rev. W. P. George, D.D., of Kansas City, Mo., preached morning and evening to large audiences. Dr. George, in the course of an eloquent sermon in the morning, referred to the unparalleled disasters which had fallen on the church, and reminded the people how often times of trial had been followed by times of great blessing. In the course of the service a telegram of benediction was received from Dr. Talmage in San Francisco, which was read to the congregation. Dr. George announced that Rev. B. Fay Mills would commence on May 27 the series of services arranged for before the burning of the Tabernacle.

The People's Church of Boston, Mass. has provided a place where bicycles will be cared for during church service, and invites people who live at a distance to come to church on their wheels.

Mrs. Elizabeth Garrett, of Philadelphia, has left an estate valued at $75,000, which after the death of her husband is to be divided among the Boards of Home and Foreign Missions and the benevolent institutions of the Presbyterian Church.

The Congregational Church Building Society, during 1893, paid out $126,032 in aid of new buildings, and $20,108 in aid of parsonages. The society since 1852 has received for such work $2,524,568, and has aided 2,445 churches and 429 parsonages.

The Methodist Ministers of Chicago, at their last meeting again discussed the subject of publishing notices in the Sunday papers. A resolution was passed that a memorial be sent to all Protestant clergymen in the city, informing them the Methodists had refused to have their notices published, and requesting co-operation.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has just given five lectures at Iowa College on the Kingdom of God. They were heard by large audiences, aroused much interest and quickened the religious life of the college and the community.

The Students of the Montreal Diocesan College are going to support a missionary in Moosonee, a diocese which has special claims upon them from the fact that its bishop is one of their own alumni. The missionary to be supported, Mr. Farley, is an Indian, a native of Moosonee, who was taken down by the late Bishop Horden to be educated in Montreal.

The New York State Sunday School Association will hold its thirty-ninth annual convention at Ithaca on June 26-28. Upward of one thousand delegates from all parts of the State are expected. Intending visitors should communicate with Mr. A. A. McKay, Ithaca, N. Y., who will furnish all information respecting entertainment, etc., or with Mr. Timothy Hough, Secretary, Syracuse, New York.

Mrs. Davenport, an Aged Christian Lady of Troy, N. that he was not to communicate it to her husband, but he might tell him that she and the child were alive and well. Similar letters have come since then at intervals of months and the husband has sent messages to his wife through the agent's hands. Now, however, after three years' separation, he has gone to meet her. A telegram from San Francisco told him that she had recovered her normal mental condition and was waiting and wanting to meet him. During her three years' absence she has wandered over Europe, Australia and India. But when she came to herself, she came back to her own country and sought her husband, who had loved her tenderly and pitied her all the time. The separation had been her own doing, but her husband was eager to welcome her and crossed the continent to do so. So it is with those who have wandered away from God. When they seek him he is found of them. (II. Chron. 7: 4.)

An exploring party has just returned to San Francisco from a sad expedition into the Sierra Madre Mountains. They have been away five weeks trying to find three Americans and two Mexican guides, who, several months ago, started from Salto, Mexico, on a prospecting tour and had not afterwards been heard from. The exploring party searched the bleak and inhospitable region thoroughly. In a ravine about forty miles from Salto they found parts of a camping outfit and about ten miles farther

CHRISTIAN GRACES.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Gal. 5: 22, 23, "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law."

IN the preceding verses we have an account of what are called the works of the flesh. It is ever more true that what is born of the flesh is flesh, and what is born of the spirit is spirit. Nothing can be spiritual in this scriptural sense except it be born of the spirit. Like produces like, in the spiritual as in the natural world; no law is more uniform and universal than this. We see here that the deeds of the flesh are called works; they are what unrenewed human nature produces. They are not fruit in the strict sense; not in the same natural and blessed sense in which the spirit of God bears fruit in the lives of men. We have not here an exhaustive catalogue of the works of the flesh, but the apostle gives us a few specimens of the results which this fleshly spirit inevitably produces in human life and experience.

We have now passed over in the text from darkness to light; from sin to holiness; from the region of sorrow and death to that of life, light and joy. The fruit of the spirit, as here described, is a glorious list of Christian graces. It is always true that the right spirit among men is born of the presence and power of the holy Spirit of God. The divine spirit is the sacred fountain whence flow blessed and divine streams in human character and influence. We often speak of the "fruits" of the Spirit; but it is interesting to observe here that the apostle does not say "fruits," but "fruit." He seems carefully to avoid the plural and carefully to choose the singular form of the word. Strictly speaking, there is only one fruit of the spirit; but that one fruit consists of many parts, many divine elements, and manifests itself in many blessed forms. The apostle designedly speaks of this as that of the Spirit; these divine virtues are produced by a divine agent—the Holy Spirit of God. Even renewed hearts are not their fountain, in the strict meaning of words. We also see that the spiritual life does not consist merely in action; actions are the result, the fruit; but not the life of the renewed heart. The apostle carefully calls attention to tempers, to states of mind; these, under the influence of the divine Spirit, are the fountains whence holy actions, as divine streams constantly flow.

It will be profitable for us to examine these Christian graces, this holy fruit, in the order given us in the text. Our attention is first called to love as an element in the fruit of the Spirit. Rightly does the noble apostle begin with love. Love is the foundation stone in this sublime and divine structure. Love is the first link in this golden chain; love is the brightest jewel in this royal crown. Love is an abridgement of the divine law, and is a fundamental precept in the holy Gospel. Finely does Luther call it "the shortest and longest divinity; shortest for the form of words; long, yea everlasting, for the use and practice, for love never shall cease." Love is the true spirit prompting right action in every line of Christian duty. Love covers a multitude of sins. Love is the feet of duty running out in the path of obedience; love is the hands of duty dispensing blessings. Love is never put up; but is kind in heart, lowly in spirit, and helpful in service. The love mentioned includes love both to God and man. Perhaps love to men is intended to be especially prominent. The apostle is here placing the fruit of the spirit in opposition to the thoughts and acts which spring from an unregenerate, and so unloving, heart. Love is therefore the bond of perfectness, and the true touch-stone of all creeds and confessions. It is the heart and soul of all true religion. Well did Mr. Beecher, quoting the words, "Now abideth Faith, Hope, Love—these three, but the greatest of these is love," add, "For love is the seraph, and faith and hope are but the wings by which it flies." Love, we are clearly taught in the apostle Paul's Psalm of Love, as the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians has been finely called, excels eloquence, excels knowledge, excels faith and hope, excels all gifts beside. Going back to the figure underlying the text, we may say that love is the juice of the fruit, and juice that is sweet both to God and to men. May God give us this blessed fruit of the divine Spirit—"Love divine, all love excelling."

The next element in the fruit of the Spirit is Joy. The joy here meant springs from a realization of the love of God in the soul; it is joy in the evidence of forgiveness; it is the holy exaltation which springs from a sense of pardon. It is joy arising from the performance of duty, from the endurance of trial, and from the hope of heaven. There is matchless and marvelous and laboring for Christ. There is joy in the new discoveries the Christian makes of the love of God, and the blessings which that love constantly imparts. He has never truly known joy who has not experienced the blessedness of working for God in the conversions of souls and in the comforting of saints. Compared with this, all other joy is sorrow, all other brightness is darkness, all other peace is turmoil, all other bliss is misery. Unconverted men have a joy which is comparable to the joy of the Christian only as lightning is comparable to light; lightning scorches and blasts, but light is helpful and healing. The joy of a sinner is as the crackling of thorns under a pot; it is a joy that is temporary; it is a joy that leaves behind it the stings of conscience, and the goads of memory. But the Christian's joy is peaceful, beautiful, exultant, radiant, eternal. It is joy resulting from the consciousness of God's presence, from harmony with God's will, and from the assurance of walking in the path of holy obedience. It is a joy which is a balm in the miseries of life, and which is a foretaste of the blessedness of heaven. Never was there a greater mistake than is made by those who represent the Christian life as one of darkness and gloom. A life without joy, is a life without power. It is a life like an instrument out of tune. Joy in the Christian life is not simply a privilege; it is a duty. We are positively commanded to rejoice. The apostle Paul distinctly says, "rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say, rejoice." Only a Christian really has a right to rejoice. Unconverted men and women might well march through this world with bowed heads, with aching hearts, and keeping step to funeral music; but the Christian has even here a foretaste of in heaven. He hears even now strains of heavenly music, and feels the uplift of the divine presence. Men of the world are dependent upon external circumstances for joy; their joy is merely happiness; merely what "happens" or falls to them from without. But the Christian's delight is not merely happiness, but joy; it is that which springs up from within and is, to a great degree, independent of external conditions. Blessed are they who rejoice constantly in the Lord their God; they, and only they, know real joy; a joy which the world can neither give nor take away.

The next fruit of the Spirit, as given in this blessed catalogue, is Peace. This peace is the result of reconciliation with God. It is peace within the conscience of the believer; and so understood, it is peace which is deep and which cannot be disturbed by the varied experiences of life. It is peace which Christ sheds abroad in the heart; a peace which expels all disturbing conditions, and which is in the soul as the music of heaven, without a jarring strain or a discordant note. There is a calm in the soul like that in the ocean far below the surface waters. We know that these waters may flow in fury before the hurricane; they may dash themselves in huge waves and wild foam, and beneath these surface waters, there are mighty depths where winds never blow, and waves never roll; depths calm as an Autumn noon; depths peaceful as a summer evening, when not even a zephyr disturbs the unbroken calmness. Amid the varying noises of the world the believer enjoys this peace; amid its cares he has repose; amid its disappointments he has sweet realizations; amid its surface storms he has an inner calm, a calm which is like the unruffled peace of God himself. Unconverted men may strive to call their anxieties nothing, and try to quiet them by chanting some syren song, saying to their souls, "Peace, peace, when there is no peace." For does not the Scripture say, "there is no peace, saith the Lord, unto the wicked." Nothing is more certain than this solemn statement. Wicked men cannot know substantial or pleasures of life; they can have no peace of conscience in their moments of moral thoughtfulness. They certainly cannot have a substantial peace on a bed of death; they can have no peace at the judgment bar of God; they can have no peace when banished from the presence of God. But blessed are God's true children, concerning whom we read "great shall be the peace of thy children." Jesus Christ came into the world as "the Prince of Peace." The angels sang the song of "peace on earth" the night he was born. The entire tendency of his reign was to promote universal peace. Before he left his disciples on the night on which he was betrayed, he said, "These things I have spoken unto you that ye might have peace;" and he also said to them, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you." He desired to impart to them the peace which he himself enjoys, that peace, which the apostle tells us, "passeth all understanding." His first salutation to his disciples, on the evening of his resurrection day when he stood in the midst of them, was "Peace be unto you." God is spoken of repeatedly by the apostle Paul "as the God of peace." Thrice blessed are those in whose soul peace abides as divine love, sweetly reposing on the green pastures and beside the still waters. This peace is the soul's celestial music; it is the first experience of that peace which is the believer's blessedness in eternity.

Another element in the Spirit's fruit is Longsuffering. The word here used strictly means long-mindedness. It is the patient bearing with the reproaches received for Christ's sake; it is also a manifestation of patience with the frailties of others. It is the spirit which leads us done by others, because God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven us. We know that the mind makes the man; tools do not really make the workman. Many of the noblest discoveries were made with very imperfect apparatus. Benjamin West made his first brushes out of a cat's tail; and Rittenhouse, who became the distinguished astronomer, first calculated eclipses on his plough handle. An internal condition resulting from great mindedness makes us, in our endurance of criticism, largely independent of the critics. Large mindedness is one of the noblest traits of man, as it is one of the best gifts of God. There is a greatness of soul which makes us heroes whatever our external circumstances may be. He who can bear false charges, upheld by the consciousness of noble motives and exalted aims, is superior to the bitterness of such charges. He is a king among men; he can be calm as a June morning, however much others storm about him and at him. He is like a rock against which the waves beat; he is like a lighthouse while his critics are the flies which dash into and are consumed by the steady flame. The apostle Paul well knew what it was to possess, and manifest the grace of longsuffering. He would rather suffer wrong than do wrong; he would rather hope all things and believe all things, than be guilty of uncharitableness of thought or unkindness of action. Let us study to be so filled with the spirit of Christ that we shall not be disturbed by the opposition of men, or even the onsets of Satan. He who fears God fully, need fear none besides.

Another grace is Gentleness. The word here so translated is also translated kindness. It means goodness, kindness, be-nignity; it is opposed to all harshness of temper, and all crabbedness of disposition. It includes mildness, calmness, and urbanity of disposition and manifestation. This grace is one of the natural effects of the spirit's presence in the soul. True religion never sours, but always sweetens the temper; never makes the nature irritable, but always gentle and gracious. True religion is sunshine, joy and peace: true religion is the school of true politeness. The Golden Rule, as given by our Lord, is the fundamental law of True Etiquette.

Politeness can be learned in the school of Christ better than in that of any Chesterfield. Courtesy is an important element in Christianity. Archdeacon Hare has said that a Christian is God Almighty's gentleman; in a very real sense, Christ was the first gentleman of the world. The spirit of Christ in the heart makes men considerate of their fellowmen, and such consideration is a distinguishing element of gentlemanly deportment. Piety and politeness are closely related; rudeness and boorishness are far removed from true religious experience and conduct. There is no religious virtue in social ugliness. The spirit dwelling in the soul produces gentleness in the life. Gentleness carpets the rough path in life, puts a pillow under the aching head and furnishes a sweet solace for the weary heart. The gentleness of Jesus gave him irresistible power, and every Christian ought to be able, humbly and joyously, to say of Jesus, as the Psalmist has taught us: "Thy gentleness hath made thee great."

Another fruit of the Spirit is Goodness. This word is doubtless here used in the sense of doing good; in the sense of beneficence. There is a marked difference between beneficence and benevolence. Benevolence is simply good in thought, in purpose, in feeling, in volition; but beneficence is in doing, in achieving. In this passage we are not simply taught to abstain from evil, but actually to perform good. We have not, therefore, a negative, but a positive quality endorsed and emphasized. We are to follow the example of our blessed Lord, who went about doing good. Goodness, as here presented, is a progressive determination not only to be good, but to do good. It is love actually at work for God and for man. It is love, as has been said, "with its hand at the plough; love with a burden on its back." It is love feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, watching beside the sick, guiding the blind, teaching the ignorant and helping all men in every possible way. It is love, also, going with the message of the Gospel to the heathen; it is love going with Howard to the wretched prisons of the world, and with Carey and Judson carrying the precious light of life to those dying in ignorance and sin. Goodness is greatness; he who is truly a good man is really a great man. Greatness of this character is within the reach of all men.

Still another grace of the Spirit is Faith. Probably the word is used here in the sense of fidelity; it denotes a faithful man in his relations to his fellowmen, rather than a man of faith, in the technical sense, in his real relations to God. The apostle's purpose here is not so much to illustrate the feeling one may have toward God, as to emphasize the influence of the Spirit over our lives in our relations with those about us. True religion in all their relations with their fellowmen. It makes a man faithful as a pastor to his people; a man faithful as a lawyer to his client; faithful as a physician to his patient; faithful as an employer to his employees, and also as an employee to the employer. It makes men faithful as husbands, fathers and sons, as friends and as neighbors; faithful in all their contracts, promises and endeavors. All professions of religion, not accompanied by faithful performances, are valueless. Consistent Christian lives are irresistible arguments for the divinity of Christianity. The best argument for Christianity is Christianity. If we are not loving to men whom we see, how can we show that we are loyal to God, whom we do not see?

The next grace enumerated here is Meekness. This is one of the noblest of all qualities of the Christian life. It includes patience toward the erring, it implies the suffering of an injury without the desire for revenge. It is, in many respects, the balancing of all the other qualities of the soul. It is far removed from meanness; Christianity has given dignity and glory to the milder virtues in character; it has made lowliness loft-ess and meekness mightiness. Virtue to the ancient Roman meant simply physical bravery; the noble moral quality which we now attach to the word, was entirely wanting in Greek and Roman thought. Christianity puts a new and higher meaning into these old words; it makes virtue now the synonym of moral goodness, of rectitude, and of all that opposes vice. In like manner meekness has been exalted to its true and to its noble place in the dictionaries of the world, and in the thought, experience and practice of noble souls whose lives are governed by him who said: "I am meek and lowly in heart." The promise of Christ is that

The Meek Shall Inherit the Earth.

In a real sense, the truly meek man inherits the earth here and now. He lives in a condition of enviable peace, and in the exercise of genuine power. Meekness is inseparable from true greatness; it adds beauty to the character and lustre even to the countenance. Attention has been called to the fact that we only read of three in Scripture whose faces shone—Christ, Moses and Stephens; and we know that they were all conspicuous examples of meekness. Meekness in its true sense is learned in the school of Christ. When we empty ourselves of self, and are filled with the spirit of God; when we put off the robe of self-righteousness, and put on the Lord Jesus Christ, then we are meek in the right sense of that great word.

The last virtue mentioned in this remarkable catalogue is Temperance. The word used in the original has a much broader meaning, however, than our word temperance. It means self-control, as its composition clearly shows. It indicates that we are to obtain the mastery over all our purposes, passions, and propensities. We have come to limit our word, for the most part, to abstinence from intoxicating liquors; but that meaning is only one element which enters into this great and strong word. It includes the dominion over every evil desire, and every unholy purpose. This is the word used by the apostle Paul in his great address to Felix, when as the apostle "reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled." Here he teaches Felix the duty of control of all passions and inclinations. It is chastity and moderation in the largest sense of these words. The use of the word in this connection was eminently appropriate because of the relations maintained between Felix and Drusilla. Paul wished to bring him to repentance and so used this form of exhortation. In the passage immediately before us we are taught that the influences of the Holy Spirit upon the heart of Christians will make them moderate in all lawful indulgences; will early restrain them from sinful propensities, and from wicked pursuits. The word may indeed be applied to restrain from excessive indulgence in intoxicating drinks; but it covers the whole range of thought and feeling regarding all that is inherently evil, and all that may become evil by undue indulgence. A Christian man must be master of himself; no man can fully rule others except he first rule himself. No man can rightly command but he who has learned wisely to obey. We master law by submitting to law; opposing law we are destroyed by that law. He who reveals to me a new law of conduct which I ought to observe is God's messenger to me, and is my friend in a divinely beautiful sense.

All who manifest the graces of character given in this catalogue are free from law; because they are in harmony with this highest law. The apostle follows the catalogue of virtues with the statement, "against such there is no law." There is no law to condemn such persons; the servant of God is the true freeman; all others are slaves. The servant of God rises above all other service; he who fears God truly fears none other even partially. A life of sin is a life of slavery. "The wages of sin are death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." When we become the servants of righteousness we are free from sin; then we become ashamed of the fruits which we bore when in the service of sin and Satan; a service whose end is death. God help us all to know the glorious liberty of the children of God! God help us all to adorn the crown of our Christian character by these resplendent jewels—Love, Joy, Peace, Longsuffering, Gentleness, Goodness, Faith, Meekness and Temperance!

THE SONGS OF HEAVEN.

TREMBLING before thine awful throne,
O Lord! in dust my sins I own:
Justice and mercy for my life
Contend! O, smile and heal the strife.

The Saviour smiles! upon my soul
New tides of hope tumultuous roll—
His voice proclaims my pardon found,
Seraphic transport wings the sound.

Earth has a joy unknown in heaven,
The new-born peace of sins forgiven!
Tears of such pure and deep delight,
Ye angels, never dimmed your sight!

Ye saw, of old, on chaos rise,
The beauteous pillars of the skies;
Ye know where morn exulting springs,
And evening folds her drooping wings.

Bright heralds of th' Eternal Will,
Abroad his errands ye fulfil:
Or, throned in floods of beamy day,
Symphonious in his presence play.

Loud is the song—the heavenly plain
Is shaken with the choral strain—

And dying echoes, floating far,
Draw music from each chiming star.

But I amid your choirs shall shine,
And all your knowledge shall be mine:
Ye on your harps must lean to hear
A secret chord that mine will bear.

—ANON.

HAST THOU A CARE SO DEEP?

HAST thou within a care so deep,
It chases from thine eyelids sleep?
To thy Redeemer take that care,
And change anxiety to prayer.

Hast thou a hope with which thy heart
Would almost feel it death to part?
Entreat thy God that hope to crown,
Or give thee strength to lay it down.

Hast thou a friend whose image dear
May prove an idol worshipped here?
Implore the Lord that naught may be
A shadow between Heaven and thee.

Whate'er the care that breaks thy rest,
Whate'er the wish that swells thy breast,
Spread before God that wish, that care,
And change anxiety to prayer.

Signs to be Recognized as Indications of Christ's Coming.

BY REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

LET me suggest, that the Book of Daniel is the introduction to the Apocalypse; the Book of John the completion of the Book of Daniel. They are two parts of the same book, they treat one subject, use the same symbols, employ the same hieroglyphics, and speak of the same course of events. These two books contain a series of visions in which the same ground is to a certain extent traversed again and again. The first vision in these two books is the simplest and most comprehensive. It starts from the time of Daniel, reaches right on to eternity, and embraces the whole course of the times of the Gentiles. In the well-known vision of the fourfold image, representing the course of four great world-empires, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, we have a complete chart of Gentile history.

And using the word "chart" reminds me of a very simple illustration that may be of value to some on the question of signs, and the point we have reached in the history of the world. Suppose you cross the ocean, and, travelling for many days or weeks, you reach a certain part of the voyage still out of sight of land, when one day you hear a rumor that the ship is approaching the port to which you are bound. You go to the captain and enquire, "Is it so?" "Yes; it is; we should sight the land at three o'clock this afternoon." "How do you know?" The captain unrolls his chart, and says, "There is the port; there is our present position." He lays his finger on the exact point reached by the ship. "How do you know we are there?" "Do you see that line drawn across the chart? that is our course; we have followed it: we are just there, and will sight land to-day at three o'clock." You ask for further light on the subject, for you cannot understand how he can be so sure. "Well, our voyage has run along such and such a course, we have come so many miles, the ship has kept the track marked there; on the way we have passed certain points, certain headlands, indicated there, as Ceylon, Aden, and so forth, just as they are marked in the chart. Now the distance from Ceylon to the port we are making is so many miles; we have just run within twenty miles of it, and by three o'clock we will make the rest. The chart with the reckoning of time and distance shows exactly where we are." As he predicts so it comes to pass.

Now, God has been pleased in this Book to give us a chart of history; not merely past history but future history—anticipating history in prophecy. He has unfolded to us the future, and given us no uncertain or dim light upon this subject, but broad, clear light. A most important part of that light is prophecy with reference to the political world, and the history of the great Gentile powers. What a marvellous thing it is, when one really considers it, that twenty-five centuries ago, when the time of the Gentiles began, when the Jewish subjection to the Gentile power commenced, when God put down Israel on account of her sins, and set up the Gentile power, that the course of Gentile power was clearly foreseen and distinctly foretold, and laid down, and marked out, and written in God's Holy Word.

As regards ecclesiastical signs, I think arranging them in this order helps us to understand the matter. Of course the history of the Gentile world is a different thing from the history of the Christian Church. Take then the latter: a great deal is foretold with regard to the history of the Christian Church. That Church was to grow, according to prophecy. Beginning with small things, it was to attain success to a wonderful extent. From a small seed it was to spring into a great tree, spreading out its branches in which the birds of the air were to come and build. Then a wonderful change was, according to the prophecy and the predictions of our Lord, and the still clearer prediction of Paul, to take place. Our Lord foretold the apostasy in the Church. Paul more clearly, again and again, in epistle after epistle, spoke also of the apostasy; and John foretells it with still greater detail.

A New Work on Prophecy.

Just published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a new booklet on "The Lord's Coming," by Mrs. M. Baxter, whose articles on the Sunday School Lessons appear week by week in this journal. Its fifteen chapters cover the period from the Parousia to the Millennium. Paper cover: 104 pages; price fifteen cents. May be obtained at this office, 92-98 Bible House, New York.

TEMPERANCE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning June 17. Prov. 21: 15-30.

TEMPERANCE, in our day, has come to be associated exclusively with the total abstinence movement. This has resulted from the peculiar circumstances of our social condition and the gigantic proportions of the individual and social evils of drunkenness. In choosing as a topic, "Temperance in all things," the Committee has, however, recognized the fact that there is need of temperance in other matters beside intoxicants. The Christian should temper, or regulate, or keep in subjection, all his physical propensities and should not act or speak extravagantly or impulsively. He is in this life a composite being allied on the one side to God himself, and on the other to the brutes. His aim should be to strengthen, by the means God has provided, the higher side of his nature, so that it shall reign supreme over the lower. The body should be a servant, obeying the spirit, not rebelling against its will. To attain this condition there must be a struggle, more or less severe according to the nature of the man. In some, owing to heredity, or physical circumstances, or habit, the physical nature is disproportionately strong and predisposed to insubordination; in others it is weak, and the struggle to bring it into subjection is easier, but in all cases there must be a struggle. Paul's metaphor of the athlete is singularly vivid and accurate in its characteristics. While the athlete is training he is careful of his diet, of his exercise, of his pleasures, and rigorously avoids excesses of every kind, denying himself gratification that he may develop himself and win the prize. Now Paul says that what the athlete will do temporarily to gain a temporal prize the Christian should do continuously to attain an eternal prize. He should so train himself that he would not be distressed or perturbed if the gratification of any passion or appetite were denied him. Food is necessary to sustain life, but he who has accustomed himself to rare and delicate viands, would suffer misery if he were limited by some necessity to a diet of bread and water. So with the other physical appetites. The denial of any one or more should be matters of indifference. The man is about other and higher business and cannot afford to worry about lower matters. He dies to them. They have lost their power to harass or distress him. He supplies their wants so that he may have a sound body, but he looks not to them for pleasure or enjoyment. When that condition is attained, it is not difficult for him to deny any one of his appetites if, as in the case of intoxicating liquor, there is a spiritual reason for his doing so. The bridling of the tongue, which James thought was the most difficult of all achievements, so that it should not slander, or lie, or curse, is part of this struggle for the supremacy of the higher over the lower nature. In the whole conflict from first to last, God by his Holy Spirit is waiting to help and the assurance is given for our encouragement that "if ye walk in the Spirit, ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh."

THE ENGLISH C. E. CONVENTION.

The great national Convention of the English Christian Endeavor Societies was held in London, May 12-15. The chief sessions were held in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, in which the huge congregations which used to gather to hear the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, assembled.

On Sunday, May 13, in many of the London churches, special sermons were preached dealing with the work of the Y.P.S.C.E., and the needs of young people generally.

The proceedings of Monday commenced with a prayer and praise-meeting in the Tabernacle at nine o'clock, when there was a large muster of Endeavorers, and a happy time was spent in rendering to God thanks for all his goodness in the blessing which has followed the work of the Christian Endeavor Society, since its start thirteen years ago; and in prayer for still greater and more extended blessing in the days to come.

At eleven o'clock the first session of the Conference was held, presided over by Alderman F. F. Belsey, who welcomed the provincial delegates to London, expressing his belief that the enthusiasm from the northern Societies would give additional in that town had united in prayer and effort against the opening of the new race-course there, and called upon all Endeavorers everywhere to stand together in opposing the evils of betting and gambling. Representatives spoke from India, New South Wales and South Africa. Rev. Wm. Carey evoked a loud outburst of applause when he said, "Let every Christian Endeavor Society have a foreign mission committee, and let there be a missionary in the field representing the Society, and let there be a special fund to support such missionary."

Mrs. Peill drew a very interesting picture of the Christian Endeavorers in Madagascar going out into the rice-fields and telling the bright glad news of the Gospel to their heathen brothers and sisters. A worker from Berkshire told of Gospel effort being carried on in the villages; another told of a society in London the members of which organize for parties of poor children, who seldom have a sight at the green fields in the country; and a delegate from Birmingham brought a message from Dr. Dale, who has a live C. E. Society at Carr's Lane.

Rev. Thomas Spurgeon was the chairman at the evening meeting, and he bade the visitors a cordial welcome. After telling of some of his experiences with Christian ist, the Methodist a better Methodist, and the Presbyterian a better Presbyterian, and, above all, to make them all better Christians, and to inspire them to work together in Christian brotherhood for the one great end of saving the world from sin."

An address of fraternal fellowship was then delivered by the Hon. John Wanamaker, ex-Postmaster-General of the United States. His rising was the signal for a remarkable outburst of enthusiasm, everybody in the building standing and waving handkerchiefs, while Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes were crossed and held aloft while the audience sang the hymn,

Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love.

Mr. Wanamaker gave some interesting particulars of the progress of the movement in America, remarking that an average of 100 new societies were being registered every week. In closing, he called upon all Endeavorers to advance along the line, to keep the flag flying, and to sing the song and tell the story till the whole world is girdled with the love of Christ.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN THE BOWERY.

Differing in many respects from ordinary Association work, the Branch established in the Bowery in New York has a mission, the usefulness of which, especially in these times, cannot be exaggerated. Its aim is to help those who have fallen in the struggle of life and need a kindly hand extended to them. Young men who need employment, who need to be helped over a time of trial and difficulty, in short, who need help of any kind, are welcome there, and an effort is made to serve them and save them. On this page is a picture of the building where many have found a modern type of the Good Samaritan. Besides the provisions for the spiritual needs of the members and strangers, consisting of Praise and Gospel meetings, Daily Family Prayers, a weekly Bible Class, and a weekly Devotional Service, the Association keeps a Free Employment Bureau, and has arrangements for supplying food, clothing and lodgings to destitute young men. Two dormitories are in the building itself, and the Secretary has a standing contract with cheap hotels and private boarding houses in the neighborhood to receive any applicants who cannot be accommodated in the building. The following extracts from letters received recently from men whom the Association has helped, show how beneficent is the work the Association is doing:

Bridgeport, Conn.—"Sometimes I may have come to your mind, and you have perchance wondered how I was doing. At the outset I will say, God is still with me, and I am deeply interested in Mission Work here. We have a lovely Mission Room, seating two hundred, and the place is crowded. I thank God I am privileged to be one of the active ones, and God blesses my efforts. Lately I have been thinking how much I would enjoy dropping in at the Bowery Branch, and when I think of the condition in which I came to you, almost four years ago, homeless, friendless, without one penny or a friend I could go to, with any confidence that my appeal would meet with favorable response, my heart cries out in gratitude to God, that he put it in the heart of men to found an institution like yours. Truly it was the turning point in my life, and since then I have known that there is something in life worth living for. 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me.'"

A young man now at Wilmington, N. C., writes: "Your kind letter, 5th inst., duly to hand. I think one of the grand features of the Bowery Branch work is the conducting of correspondence with its former proteges. I have full charge of the works, and we employ sixty-five hands. My employers seem well satisfied with my work, and this to me is a source of encouragement, but above all I thank God that he has revealed himself to me, for I find in his service a peace and consolation which I never knew before. I hope to visit the dear old Branch at an early date."

Mr. Charles A. Edsall, State President of the Baptist Young people's Union of Pennsylvania, received an ovation on his recent visit to Philadelphia. The occasion was the semi-annual reunion of the city Unions, and Mr. Edsall made a telling speech. After the meeting Mr. Edsall received from each Union a little memento of his visit, presented by a representative of the Union.

impetus to the movement in London and in the southern counties. Those hallowed halls, he said, had rarely contained an assembly presenting features of greater interest than that convention of the youth of the churches consecrating their opening lives to Christ and his Church. He referred to the phenomenally rapid growth of the movement, and spoke with hopefulness as to the blessings it was conferring on the churches. The movement had grown because the churches appreciated it, saw its possibilities and knew its power.

A number of papers were then read on "The Work of the Committee," those dealt with including the "look-out," prayer-meeting, social, temperance, sunshine and good literature committees. A free parliament followed, one after another rising until about twenty had spoken, telling of ways of working in their own Societies, and making all sorts of useful suggestions, and throwing out valuable hints for improving and adapting the "machinery" in use. Emphasis was repeatedly laid on the necessity of getting the members interested in such practical work as spreading the principles of total abstinence. A delegate from Birmingham referred to the way in which the churches and members of the C. E. Societies

Endeavorers in New Zealand, he gave a brief address, exhorting all Endeavorers to covet earnestly the best gifts, and to be constantly provoking one another to love and to good works.

A report of the year's progress was presented by Rev. W. Knight Chaplin, one of the secretaries of the British National Council, who remarked that at the convention held at Bradford last June the existence of 650 registered societies in Great Britain was reported. The registered number is now 1453, or an addition of 803 societies in one year. The societies are distributed among the churches of all denominations. The figures show that there are 391 in Baptist churches, 353 in Congregational, 85 Presbyterian, 4 Episcopalian, 37 Wesleyan, 40 Primitive Methodist, 18 Bible Christian, 60 United Methodist Free Church, and 66 Methodist New Connexion. In an approximate estimate of membership Mr. Chaplin said there were 40,750 active, 18,710 associate, and 5,080 honorary members, making a total of 65,440.

In the course of his address, Mr. Chaplin said:—"This Society is inter-denominational, not anti-denominational. It aims at making the Baptist a better Baptist, the Congregationalist a better Congregational-

The Antwerp Exhibition.

A Remarkable Collection of Art and Industry in the Old Flemish City—Opened by King Leopold in Person.

EXHIBITIONS of the products of art and every branch of human industry have been more numerous in the last half of the closing nineteenth century, than ever before since the world began. London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin, Philadelphia, Chicago, have all contributed to the popularizing of these mammoth national and international enterprises, the very latest of which was recently opened at the ancient Flemish city of Antwerp, in Belgium. Small as Belgium is, and comparatively insignificant beside the powerful European States, the little kingdom has ever held a high position in all that relates to human progress and civilization, whether in the line of science, art, industry or exploration, and in the present exhibition this standard has been well maintained. King Leopold, who had come over from Brussels with all the royal family, opened the exhibition in person on May 5, the ceremonial taking place immediately under the dome at the main entrance (shown in the illustration on this page.) Antwerp kept holiday for the occasion. The military display was unusually fine, and great crowds of citizens and visitors from other parts of Europe assembled on the Antwerp Boulevard, along which the King and Queen drove, accompanied by a number of Belgian and German princes and princesses. At the grand entrance they were received by Count de Colesburg, President of the Executive Committee and other officials of the Exhibition, Ministers, Ambassadors, and many distinguished persons. After the formal opening there was a musical performance in the great festival hall.

During the present month, the Exhibition will be seen at its best. All the European countries are well represented. The Exhibition is situated close to the river Scheldt, in the southern or new quarter of the city. The grounds and buildings cover fully two hundred acres. The main buildings are somewhat florid specimens of architecture, with an elaborate facade and highly decorated dome surrounding the entrance hall. Belgium occupies the central block, with Britain and Germany to her left, and other countries behind, while on the right lie the important maritime section and the machinery hall. Further along are the picture galleries, where, besides the loans from various nations, Belgium holds a special modern "Salon" of her own.

The grounds are full of entertaining additions—a street in Cairo, an Algerian village, a water show, an Indian encampment and many restaurants. The Congo State is in great favor with a most realistic picture of African life, with native Africans busied in family duties. A little lake has canoes and fishermen at work. Then there is "old Antwerp"—the picturesque reproduction of the city in the sixteenth century, with its mediæval inhabitants at their various avocations and amusements. The buildings have been reconstructed from old drawings, and are quaint and beautiful. Festivities of the period are to be given here, and it seems as if "old Antwerp" would undoubtedly prove the feature of the Exhibition. As the Exhibition remains open till November, the Antwerp folks are in high hopes of a rich harvest from visitors.

A Mother's Influence.

A young man who was being examined preparatory to uniting with the church, was asked, "Under whose preaching were you converted?" "Under nobody's preaching," was his reply; "I was converted under my mother's practising." What a tribute to a consecrated motherhood was that young man's answer! How very near to Christ must that mother have lived!

Siamese Marriages.

The declaration of marriage in Siam is very simple: You ask a lady to marry you by merely offering her a flower, or taking a light from a cigarette if it happens to be in her mouth; and your family and the bride's family have to put up at least $200 apiece for a dowry. The principal impediment in the way of marriage is that each year is named after an animal, and only certain as your rich neighbors are with them. Put so much dignity, sincerity, kindness, virtue and love into your simple and inexpensive home that its members will never miss the costly trappings and showy adornments, and be happier in the cosy and comfortable apartments than most of their wealthy neighbors are in their splendid houses.

Providence in Little Things.

God's providence in little things may be abundantly seen if looked for, though frequently they are treated as mere accidents. When a farmer's boy showed Blucher a short cut by which he could bring his army up soon enough to decide Waterloo for England, was it a mere accident? When the Protestants were besieged at Bezors and a drunken drummer came in at midnight and rang the alarm bell, not knowing what he was doing, but waking up the host in time to fight their enemies that moment arriving, was it an accident? When, in the Irish rebellion, a starving mother, flying with her starving child, sank down and fainted on a rock in the night, and her hand fell on a warm bottle of milk, did that just happen so? When the great Duke of Sully, was, as a Protestant student saved from death at the massacre of St. Bartholomew, through walking in the streets with a large book under his arm, by which he was mistaken for a priest, was it an accident? Rather may we not say God is continually working through his providence for the preservation of those whom he has chosen to accomplish his purposes.

The Blues.

Almost every nature, however sprightly, sometimes will drop into a minor key, or a subdued mood that in common parlance is recognized as "the blues." There may be

"GOOD-MORNING!"

"GOOD-MORNING world." On the window seat She balanced her two little timid feet, She clung with her dimpled hands, and stood Framed in like a picture of babyhood.

The clambering vines hung low and green 'Round the sunniest curls that e'er were seen, As she stood with beauty and light imperaled, And bade "Good-morning!" to all the world.

"Good-morning, world!" and the great world heard; Each rustling tree and each singing bird. The dancing flowers and the fields of grass Nodded and waved at the little lass.

And the far-off hills and the sky overhead Listened and beamed as the word was said; And the old sun lifted his head and smiled—"Good-morning, world!" "Good-morning, child!"

HONOR THE MOTHERS.

ALL honor to motherhood! And all confusion seize those ideas and plans and systems, social and otherwise, where motherhood is discouraged. A young wife with a babe six weeks old, recently said with flashing eyes: "There are some women that I hate to see. They make me sad. They speak to me as though it was it a great calamity that I have my beautiful child. They seem to think that all a woman lives for is to gad and go."

In the Hebrew Scriptures those women are spoken of as highly blessed whose house is full of children, and the barren are commiserated. One would think that Christendom was trying to reverse this order. Alas for the wicked selfishness that shrinks from bearing children because the presence of these little ones in the house may interfere with social pleasures! We need to preach more of the honor of motherhood, for of all in the universe no one has so supreme a power for making others better, as the mother, who can write her holy dreams upon the souls of those children that are flesh of her flesh.

The Senses of Children.

Every child, every human being, wants the full use of his senses and other natural faculties. Eyes were made to see with, ears to hear with, vocal organs to speak and sing with, and hands to feel with. Any system of education, therefore, that is inspired by true benevolence toward the child will start by taking stock of his natural endowments, so as to correct, as far as possible, any defects that may attach to them and provide for their fullest development. Children are often far from perceiving the benevolent intent in the systems of education to which they are subjected, and it is little wonder, in general, that it should be so.

But, however, if an earnest effort were being vigorously made to carry every natural faculty they possessed to its perfection—to make the eyes quick and true, the voice sweet and full, the hearing sensitive and discriminating, the bodily movements vigorous and graceful, and so on—the beneficence of the process would impress itself even on the juvenile mind, and thus half the battle would be gained, for we want the children's confidence before we can do them much good.

Nothing, we fully believe, would do so much toward the development of the all-important quality of self-respect as a careful physical training. It would, on the other hand, promote individuality, inasmuch as the child could be made to feel what he or she was capable of individually, and on the other, it would promote true comradeship, as it would awaken a consciousness of that common physical nature, with its varied powers, of which all partake. Here, therefore, is a part of education about which there can be no mistake—a preparation for perfect living in the physical sense—that perfect living which economizes both mental and moral force, and the individual in a position of advantage for the accomplishment of all the ends of life.

THE ANTWERP EXHIBITION—MAIN ENTRANCE ON OPENING DAY.

animals are allowed to intermarry; for instance, a person born in the year of the cat cannot marry with a person born in the year of the dog, or a person born in the year of the cow with a person born in the year of the tiger; and their similar embargoes about months and days, akin, perhaps, to the old superstitions in this country, that a marriage will be unlucky if the birth months of the bride and groom are far apart. April should not wed with November, nor January with June.

Right Living.

It is what is done to keep up appearances that destroys the equilibrium between outgo and income, and makes life a drudgery and vexation. How to live cheaply is a question easy enough to answer if one will be content with a cheap living. Substitute comfort for show. Study simplicity. Refuse to be beguiled into a style of living above what is required by your position in society and justified by your resources. Set a fashion of simplicity, neatness, prudence and inexpensiveness which others will be glad to follow and thank you for introducing. Teach yourself to do without a thousand and one pretty and showy things which wealthy people purchase, and pride yourself on being just as happy without them no adverse causes at work, but somehow the bells of the soul stop ringing, and you feel like sitting quiet, and you strike off fifty per cent. from all your worldly and spiritual prospects. The immediate cause may be a north-east wind, or a balky liver, or an enlarged spleen, or pickled oysters at twelve o'clock the night before. In such depressed state no one can afford to sit for an hour. First of all let him get up and go out of doors. Fresh air, and the faces of cheerful men, and pleasant women, and frolicsome children, will in fifteen minutes kill moping. The first moment your friend strikes the key-board of your soul it will ring music. A hen might as well try on populous Broadway to hatch out a feathery group as for a man to successfully brood over his ills in lively society. Do not go for relief among those who feel as badly as you do. Let not toothache, and rheumatism, and hypochondria rule. Throw back all the shutters of your soul and let the sunlight of genial faces shine in. Besides that, why sit with the blues? Shone upon by such stars, and breathed on by such air, and sung to by so many pleasant sounds, you ought not to be seen moping. Especially if light from the better world strikes its aurora through your night-sky, ought you be cheerful. You can afford, writes Dr. Talmage, to have a rough luncheon by the way if it is soon to end amid the banqueters in white.

ERNEST PAULL'S manner, under the trying circumstances, was self-respectful and deterrent, without a symptom of embarrassment.

"I have called, Mrs. Lanier, upon confidential and personal—that is, family affairs. Can we talk in some less public place?"

"It is my wish to hear what you have to say, here, Mr. Paull. Our interview will be, of necessity, short."

Polished ice would have been as fur compared with her accents; her eyes were steady.

He had known this woman from her childhood and his; as his sister-in-law, he had jested familiarly with her, had been wont to kiss her at meeting and at parting. His head whirled and a pang shot from the left to the right lung like a fiery needle. He must be master of himself,—at any rate, while here.

"I take your meaning, madam, and will be as brief as it is compatible with the gravity of my communication. I have been extremely ill since my unfortunate visit to Pequot, or I should have seen you before. I learned, then, to my astonishment and regret, that my daughter Marie had sailed for France to rejoin me—an extraordinary step which I should have opposed strenuously had I anticipated it. It is my earnest desire to repair, as far as may be, the indirect injury I have done the poor child in writing somewhat freely of the precarious state of my health, thereby inducing her—most unintentionally, as I solemnly declare—to come to me. I wish to sail by to-morrow's steamer to Havre; proceed thence to Pau, and bring her back to her mother and her home. It is the least that I can do and—I am grieved to say—the utmost."

"It is unnecessary to put yourself to so much trouble, Mr. Paull. We have sent a cable dispatch to friends on the other side to meet my niece upon her arrival at Havre, and send her, under a suitable escort, back to New York. You may be quite easy with regard to her."

A movement, slight but expressive, intimated her impression that, his business having been dispatched, he would take his leave. Words would not have been a more explicit dismissal. The blood rushed impetuously to his pale face; the tremor in his voice, if artistic, was genuine, if his ejaculation was more rhetorical than devout.

"Thank God! I have suffered untold agonies in reflecting upon the possible consequences of my child's rash generosity. You have taken an intolerable burden from my heart. I will detain you but a minute longer; Virginia! Mrs. Lanier! is there no mercy in the heart of a good woman for a penitent sinner?"

Another question—more decided and expressive than the former, arrested him on the word. The cold severity of her gaze did not change.

"I must decline to discuss abstract subjects with Mr. Paull," she said pointedly. He raised his head laughingly.

"I might have known what measure of Christian charity I should meet with in this house. I was a fool to hope for anything else. I came here with a heart full of sorrowful and loving thoughts—the broken and contrite spirit which pietists despise;—I am hungry for news of my wife and little ones—I am ruined in health and a beggar—and you, who could tell me all I long to know,—you who profess to follow in the footsteps of Him who called sinners to repentance,—sneer at me in my extremity, trample me under your feet with cold cruelty that reminds me whose pupil you are. I should have known better than to expect one crumb from any table in Roger Lanier's house. He hated me while he lived. I might have comprehended that, as his wife and a Christian, you must meet confession and petition with holy insult."

Furious as he appeared, angry as he really was, he had put the harangue together cleverly until his mention of her husband's name. She lifted the hand that had rested lightly upon the table; chill civility was exchanged for severity as frigid.

"You have set your action in entering this house in the proper light by your last sentence. I have only, in closing this interview, to express my regret at granting it."

She moved toward the bell.

"You need not summon your footman to put me into the street," he said with biting emphasis. "To be driven off the premises of the elect twice in one week should convert even such a reprobate as I. Whatever becomes of the ruin the Laniers have made of what was once a man, the Creator of us all—if you will admit that He had a hand in my makeup—knows where the responsibility will rest."

The rapid patter of small feet sounded on the stairs; two little girls appeared in the arched doorway.

"Mamma!" twittered the taller of the two—"may Gladys and I—Oh! I beg pardon!" as she perceived that her mother was not alone.

Her black frock showed her to be a daughter of the house; the golden silk of her companion's curls, her limpid blue eyes and delicate features were Marie's and her father's.

He took one eager step toward her. Mrs. Lanier interposed her stately figure, and spoke with mild decision:

"Alice, dear, I am engaged, as you see. Take your cousin into the library, and shut the door when you go in. I will be there in a moment."

She was disappointed if she had anticipated a further scene. The wretched man walked directly to the front door, laid his hand on the lock and glanced back.

"Is her mother here, too?" he asked.

"She is not."

He stumbled on the stone steps, and caught at the railing to save himself. A man who was passing, after a quick glance at the handsome house he was leaving, and a keener at himself, stopped and came back.

"Excuse me, sir, but are you ill? Is there anything I can do for you?"

A hot oath flew from Paull's lips.

"What business is that of yours? Do I look like a tramp?"

"Not a bit! not a bit!" rejoined the the would-be helper, jocularly. "I beg your pardon! The man who needs me is my neighbor. If you don't—you're not! Good afternoon."

It was afternoon by now. People who had homes, and liberty to return to them, clogged all the uptown avenues of travel; the sea-air bit at him at every cross-street; raw with salt, and numbing to flesh and bone. Down these shorter streets he had glimpses of the west where the sun was going down and staining the river-fogs a dingy red. This would be one of the nights when it was wise to take the bridge-route to Brooklyn instead of the ferry.

The thought of Brooklyn strayed again into his mind, three hours later, as he emerged from a place he used to frequent when the exchequer was low. It was well down-town and he had had a hot supper there for thirty-five cents, several drinks at the bar, and the chance to gamble with the remaining half-dollar. The man who won it, laughed brutally in handing back eight cents.

"Three for the bridge and five for the street-car!" He was drunker than Paull, and disposed to be liberal. "You belong over the river, don't you? I won't give the New York cops a chance to run you in."

Paull pocketed the coins, and passed into the street. The fog was foul in that quarter, leaving a taint of oily uncleanness upon the tongue. Brooklyn would be sweeter—to breathe—and was a cheaper place to live in. He would go over and "prospect" this very night. He must leave that first-class hotel. He would go back after he had secured lodgings over the river, and get his trunk. It was full of handsome clothing,

A man in his profession could not afford to be shabby.

Apparent prosperity was a part of his capital. Still he must look up a Brooklyn pawnbroker to-morrow and "hock" a few things. He must have food and shelter until he could turn himself. He lived in Brooklyn once—or his family did. He would go to Brooklyn by all means. After all—might not Alice have kept her town-house? It was not likely that she lived all the year round in that beastly country hole. A cunning gleam lit his watery eyes. She was probably there now—in hiding. He laughed outright at the thought of how he would circumvent Virginia Lanier—the cold-blooded snake!

His thoughts were getting hazy. American drinks were "heavy."

He had walked very far, and was tired in legs and head. At 363 Mendebras avenue, they had answered rudely his civil inquiries for Mrs. Paull.

"No such person had ever lived there so far as they knew."

He decided to walk back to New York. That is, if he could "run" the ferry. He had had a watch when he called at Mrs. Lanier's. He recollected looking at it in a saloon on the Brooklyn side of the bridge.

A saloon with scarlet curtains at the windows, and frescoes on the inner walls. A band was playing "Razze Dazze," and girls with pointed bangs and red cheeks were waiting upon men who sat with their hats on and drank beer and cocktails, and smoked strong cigars. He had his watch then—and no small change to pay for his drinks. He mentioned this to the bar-keeper, and promised to call in to-morrow, early, and settle. The bar-keeper—or somebody else—had said that was "all right." He had his watch in his hand then, and did not recollect putting it back into his pocket when he got into the street. He would call at that saloon the first thing in the morning, and see if he had left it on the counter.

This was a nasty night, and Brooklyn had the beastliest climate on the globe. Catarrhal, consumptive, neuralgic—That must be neuralgia that stabbed him to the heart every few minutes. The beef-steak he had for supper was as tough as sole-leather.

Ten knives instead of one were struck into his chest, and a red-hot iron band seemed to crush in his lungs. With a despairing groan, he sank down upon a door-step, tearing at his clothes to loosen the awful pressure.

CHAPTER XIX.

Definite work is not always that which is cut and squared for us, but that which comes as a claim upon the conscience, whether it is nursing in a hospital, or hemming a handkerchief.

E. M. Sewall.

Christ in his heavenly garden walks all day, And calls to souls upon the world's highway. We croud with trifles, maimed and sick with sin, Christ by the gate stands, and invites them in.

—F. T. Inggrave.

"I am sadly afraid that Marie has not been quite candid in this affair," said Mrs. Barnes, with a look of real concern. "I am very fond of that child, with all her faults. She has a heart as deep as a well, and generous impulses. The very devotion to her wretched father which has warped one side of her nature, springs from a worthy root. But I cannot excuse her for telling her mother she has been in correspondence with him since last September, and leaving her to infer that she had not written to, or heard from him until then. Why, the first time I ever met her was in the post office in Fulton street, when she was asking for a stamp that would take a letter to Nice, in France. She stamped it, as it lay on the counter, and in the casual way in which one sees such things, I observed that it was addressed to 'Mr. Paul Morgan.' That was one of his aliases, you know. I should never have thought of the incident again had not her voice sounded so like her mother's that I looked at her, and followed her out to ask if her name were Paull. When Mrs. Paull told me yesterday that her husband had been known abroad as 'Mr. Paul Morgan,' it all flashed upon me. Of course, I said nothing to her of the meeting and the letter. She has sorrow enough without it. But I wish—I wish Marie has not said that!"

Mrs. Williams shook her head dolorously.

"I can't see through it—nor, for the matter of that, far into it. I'd have said, it asked, that while the child is headstrong and highstrung to that extent when her blood is up, I've thought to myself that I'd as lief strike matches on a powder-keg all day as live in the house with her—there isn't an atom of deceit into her. She's too outspoken for her own comfort and that of other people. If she has circumvented the truth this time, it's the outcropping of the father's blood in her. Her teeth are set on edge, and sharpened to make mince-meat of facts, because such sour grapes have been 'the chief of his diet'—as Mother Goose says—for all these years."

"He has much to answer for if only for the wrong done to this one child."

"You may say it. I declare for it, Mrs. Barnes, when I get to studying over what depends upon the way fathers and mothers behave, and think and feel, I think that if I had children to raise, I'd begin to preach to them of their responsibility as parents by the time they could say, 'Now I lay me.'"

"One poor wife who labored prayerfully to bring up her children in the right way, is reaping a woeful harvest of her husband's sowing," returned Mrs. Barnes, sadly. "And here comes trouble upon trouble in his return to America. It was a bold thing to do, and yet, as it now appears, safe enough. Roger Lanier was the only man to be feared, and he knew it. But for her heroic faith, and her practice of trusting God in deed, as well as in theory, to care for the interests she commits to him, she must have gone wild over Ernest Paull's cowardly threat to claim the custody of the children. Of course, as Dr. Barnes says, it was all talk, intended to frighten women and children, but it shows the temper and spirit of the man."

"Where are the poor babies now?"

"Mrs. Morse has the two boys still. She carried them off with her on a visit to her mother in Philadelphia the day after Mr. Paull was in Pequot. Elspeth went to the Parsonage and told her all about it, then took the nine o'clock train to New York with a letter from Mrs. Morse to Mrs. Paull in her pocket, suggesting the very best thing to be done in the circumstances—a cable-gram to Mr. Morse. He answered Mrs. Paull within six hours after the dispatch left New York: 'I will take care of your bird. Do not worry.'"

"Isn't that like Mr. Morse? Who knows—don't laugh and tell me again that I have a keen nose for providence—but wouldn't it be a providence if this wild-geese chase of the dear child's should be the means of drawing her and Dr. Lyell nearer together? If ever a girl needed a steady, kind, right-minded husband, she does."

"I wish I could hope for such an ending to her mad folly. From what I have heard of Dr. Lyell, he considers the price of a discreet woman above rubies. Mrs. Lanier very considerably added to the dispatch, 'Her father is here.' Otherwise, no entreaties or commands would have brought Marie home."

"Gladys is still with Mrs. Lanier, you say?"

"She is. The poor mother went back to Pinehurst alone, three days ago. I spent yesterday and last night with her. She is brave and trustful, but worn to a mere shadow by these latest trials. It was bad enough to learn that her daughter had gone off alone to such a man as we know her father to be. It was worse, if possible, to think of her landing, unprotected and friendless, in a foreign country. But the hardest effort of faith is to believe that good can come of the appearance in the home given her by her brother (where she has toiled so nobly to defray her husband's debt to that brother), of this bad-tempered, vindictive, broken-down adventurer, whom she cannot present to her boys as their father. If he had returned penitent and decent, I believe—I am sure—that she would have received him. Her views of the might of the marriage-contract are exceedingly and righteously strict. As it is, so far as we can see, nothing but misery and disgrace can come of it. The Royal Road—a smile breaking through the cloud—"is the only way that is not hedged up for my afflicted friend."

"That never is hedged up, His Holy Name be praised!" responded Mrs. Williams, devoutly. "It is the highway where the redeemed of the Lord can always walk. She finds the burden of this dark day as much as she can bear with all the help she can get."

"It is all she can carry. I told her so, and she answered, 'Unless the Father should see fit to add to it. Then, He would have to increase the supply of daily grace. I am living up my allowance.' You can think how she would say it, and smile in saying it. As for me I caught myself listening by day and by night for that man's step upon the porch. If a shadow passed the window where we were at work, I started with the fear that he might be there armed with a search-warrant, or a writ of habeas corpus, or determined to see and talk with her."

Saved From Lives of Sin.

Notable Conversions in the Slums—The "Jesus' Friends' Praying Band."

SOME three months ago a number of Christian men and women of New York, under the leadership of Mrs. Josephine Williamson, the well-known evangelist and mission worker, organized the "Jesus' Friends' Praying Band." Their field of duty was to be among the slums in the lower part of the city—a territory in which Mrs. Williamson, during the past twenty years, has been instrumental in rescuing many souls from lives of sin and shame. The Praying Band has opened a mission at 12 Pell street, room 52, where meetings have been held regularly during each week, commencing at 10 o'clock p. m., and lasting to 1 o'clock. It was at first intended for women only, but soon Chinamen began to attend the services. Several knelt with the Band in prayer, and some gave evidence of sins forgiven and promised to follow the Christian life.

Two remarkable conversions have lately occurred through the efforts of the "Jesus' Friends' Praying Band," the subjects in both instances being women who were keepers of notorious houses in the same quarter in which the Band has been working. One of these women, named Minnie —, who has been living in open sin eight years, and had been the means of leading many girls astray, was at last brought to realize her own lost condition, and was pointed to the Lord Jesus Christ. Mrs. Williamson visited her in her room and prayed with her. The woman attended several meetings of the Praying Band, and came under deep conviction of sin. Finally, after a severe struggle, she yielded her heart to Christ, and decided to leave her sinful calling forever.

Mrs. Williamson has learned from her long experience, that, whenever a noted sinner declared for Christ, it was well for her, as well as for all her former companions in sin, that the step should be taken publicly. At the funeral of the notorious "Morphine Laura," who was converted under Mrs. Williamson's ministrations, many of her companions who attended the services were so affected that they broke down, and from that moment decided to lead a new life. Accordingly, Mrs. Williamson persuaded Minnie to make public confession of her new faith, and the woman gladly consented to make her declaration in the presence of all of her former associates who could be summoned together. They were invited to a "Farewell Reception," which was held in the mission room, at No. 12 Pell street, and there Minnie, speaking from the mission platform, read to them from the Bible, prayed with and for them, and advised them to accept Jesus as their Saviour, as she herself had done. The scene was a most affecting one. Over two hundred persons—men and women from the slums and Chinese opium dens, most of them Minnie's old associates in sin—were present. Many broke down and cried out: "We want to follow Jesus!" and some have since then accepted salvation. They are now being visited by Mrs. Williamson. She has had great encouragement that the result of Minnie's example will yet tend to the conversion of other souls.

Another striking case was that of Rene —, also the keeper of a vicious resort, and who, although still young, had spent many years in sin. This woman has boldly come out, renouncing her sinful life and declaring for Christ. In her house were a number of fallen girls, and during her career she had been the means of bringing sorrow to many parents, whose children she had led to shame. She attended several of the meetings of the Praying Band, and was visited by Mrs. Williamson and other members, and after a time her eyes were opened to the enormity of her sins, and she was led to seek forgiveness. She decided to abandon the life she was leading, and was eager to do something to induce others to reform. She talked with the girls in her house in a different way from anything they had ever before heard from her lips, and showed them how the spirit had wrought a change in her, urging them at the same time to ask divine forgiveness and to enter on a new life. Shortly after her conversion, she was taken seriously ill, and the Mission Band sent her to a quiet place in the country to recuperate. Rene was the daughter of a Methodist minister in Pennsylvania, and had an excellent education with many advantages. It is hoped that, when she is restored to health, her expectation of laboring in the field of active mission service may be fulfilled, and that she may yet become an earnest and useful member of the "Jesus' Friends' Praying Band."

These two cases are examples of other lives that have been transformed and souls soundly converted through the instrumentality of this zealous band of workers for Christ. The Band's headquarters are at the Bethany Lodging House, 19 Second street, New York, where all who are interested in the work can find full information regarding it.

Mr. Lai Soon and His Family—Yenths Youths Educated for the Mission Field.

IN a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (toward the photograph which is reproduced on this page), Rev. Arthur Folsom, a returned missionary, writes as follows: Mr. Lai Soon, a tall, handsome Chinaman, was the first to call on us this morning after our arrival in Canton, China, in 1863; and you can imagine our surprise, to find him as well educated as ourselves, a graduate of Yale College and of Andover, Mass., Theological Seminary. He was one of three Christian young men sent on to be educated by the then Canton Mission of the A.B.C.F.M., which was afterwards transferred to the Presbyterian Board. The other two were Mr. Wing, a classmate of Lai dissey, the first lady teacher sent from England to the Chinese in Java, before the Chinese ports were opened. Upon the opening of the ports, Miss Auldiss removed her school to Ningpo, and this pupil escaped from Java, and made herself a stowaway on shipboard till hunger drove her out. Of course, she continued a pupil until she graduated, and in course of events became the worthy wife of Mr. Lai Soon. In later years, I have lost track of them all.

TEMPERANCE IN JAPAN.

In the little Japanese island of Okushiri, the people are all either farmers or fishermen. Until 1884 they had been large consumers of the native intoxicating liquor, saki, spending about £600 a year for it. Sensible of the evil of this, some of the leading men, in July, 1884, induced the people to enter into a covenant to abandon wholly the sale, purchase, and use of alcoholic beverages for five years to test its utility. Order henceforth reigned completely, and prosperity came with rapid strides. The population increased fivefold in five years, and the capital invested in the fishing industry tenfold. Reed thatches were replaced by shingles. Four large granaries were kept full of rice, and, in addition, each house had stores of its own. There is now stored in the island rice sufficient to support the people three or four years, even though the herring fishery should fail entirely. Roads have been constructed in places where nothing of the kind existed before. The princi-

Rev. J. Hudson Taylor's Thrilling Account of the First Work of the Upper Burma Mission.

EVERY year demonstrates more forcibly to the Christian world the value of medical missions among the heathen. Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, in his autobiography, tells a remarkable story of the experience of the English missionaries at the outset of their work in Upper Burma in 1875. Permission had been granted by the Burmese Monarch for the missionaries to proceed to Bhamo. The long summer which followed brought plenty of medical work, for fever, small-pox, measles, and other diseases raged furiously. Some awful scenes were witnessed; and of one day's experience in the Chinese quarter of the city, Mr. Soltan, one of the missionaries, wrote:

"In one house, at the head of a narrow lane, we came upon four men all sick, and a fifth, who had been caring for them, also very ill himself. In the next house the wife is almost blind from virulent ophthalmia; while beyond again is a poor woman, with a little baby a few months old, rapidly sinking from exhaustion. Close by in another hut . . . within ten feet of him, lies the corpse of a man who died last night in the temple. In a shed across the way lies still another nian his eyes fast glazing in death.

"I cannot live," he says; "I have no desire to live, the pain is so great."

"Mr. Stevenson tells him in simple language about the Saviour Jesus, and the great love of God. . . . I understand part of what is said, and lift my heart for him in silent prayer. Leaving this wretched scene, we hasten back to the zavat. A dozen people are already waiting for medicines, and more come in. Having attended to their needs we go on to the river, to care for some sick Burmese there. The place is like a battlefield, dead and dying are all around us. Poor creatures! In their lives they have never heard of Jesus, and in death they pass away with none to comfort them, or tell them of his love."

Patients came to the dispensary from far and wide, the fame of the missionaries' skill and kindness in relieving sickness and pain, spreading very rapidly, and a good feeling was soon established with the people. Great kindness was shown to the visitors as they went from place to place, caring for the sick and preaching the Gospel among the mountain men.

For a long time the action of the Indian government prevented the Gospel message being taken to western Chinese boundaries, but ultimately the gates were opened and the light of Fetter days began to shine. It came when least expected. Mr. Hudson Taylor, now much improved in health, started in 1876, with a band of new missionaries.

Many warnings were given that war was expected, and the missionaries already in the field were told to expect to receive orders to leave without delay! "But," wrote Mr. Taylor, "prayer had not failed." And this was true, for a change came over the spirit of the Chinese government, and on September 15th, 1876, was concluded the Chefoo Convention, which opened the door of access more widely than ever before to the heart of the Eastern Empire. In many cases the C. I. M. missionaries were the first to enter districts after the proclamation had been issued. For the next few years they traveled far and wide, scattering the good seed of the Kingdom, making journeys of long duration and no little peril, in remarkable safety and peace.

MR. LAI SOON AND HIS FAMILY.

Soon, and Dr. Wong, a graduate of Hamilton College and of the Medical Department of Edinburgh, Scotland University. It was thought that man thus prepared would make the best of native helpers in mission work. But it was soon found that there was no place for them at that stage of progress in the mission field, by reason of the disparity between them and other native helpers, who were so much less educated. They were then counseled to enter other avocations of their own choice, rather of God's choice, for at the time of the great Tim Sim massacre in 1871, they were called upon to assist the Chinese Government in settling matters with the several aggrieved nations; and thereafter it was upon their suggestion that their Government sent the three delegations of Chinese youth, one hundred in each, being appointed to have charge of them.

Mr. Lai Soon's two boys were among the number. The name of one of them was Elijah, who when Sophomore in Yale, took a prize for English declamation, and was elected class poet when Senior. I think it was in Mr. Hayes' Administration that Mr. Lai Soon as Ambassador represented his Government at Washington, D. C. I recollect reading about Mrs. Lai Soon and her two daughters at the President's reception, as being the peers of any of the ladies present, in point of education and culture.

Mrs. Lai Soon was a pupil of Miss Aulpal school has been greatly improved, and several branch schools have been established. New lands have been brought into cultivation, and hemp to the value of $2,000 is grown annually for the manufacture of fishing nets, which before had to be imported entirely from the mainland. A large community of settlers in the neighboring island of Ezo, pledged themselves to a covenant similar to that of Okushiri, and with similar results. When the five years expired it was renewed for another term of five years.

CHRIST WILL GATHER HIS OWN.

CHRIST will gather his own To the place where he has gone, Where our heart and treasure lie, Where our life is hid on high.

Had he ask'd us, well we know We should cry, "O, spare this blow!" Yes, with streaming tears should pray, "Lord, we love him; let him stay."

But the Lord doth naught amiss, And, since he hath ordered this, We have naught to do but still Rest in silence on his will.

HELPFUL ANECDOTES

REVIVAL BARRIERS.

DISCOVERY made by a missionary in Madagascar may be useful to some ministers in our own land. The Rev. J. Peill, who is laboring at Ambohimanga in Madagascar, writes that he and one or two of his people were deeply anxious for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Special meetings for prayer were held and special sermons were preached; the Gospel invitation was pressed earnestly and the hymns were chosen with a view to the nature of the work, and were well sung, but the blessing did not come. Mr. Peill was discouraged and begged God for light on the subject. None that he could recognize as such came. He preached, however, a series of sermons on the Lord's Prayer. On the Sunday when the subject of the sermon was: "Forgive us our trespasses, for we have forgiven them that trespassed against us," he asked his people if they felt quite sure of God's forgiveness of them if they withheld forgiveness of one another. "I was led," he says, "to expand and explain and illustrate Christ's own emphatic teaching on this subject, where he distinctly states that 'if ye will not forgive men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses.'"

"After that address two women, both Christians, who had entertained bitter and unkind thoughts of each other, and who had not even spoken for weeks, passing each other on the road without even a sign of recognition, both impelled by the same spirit, shook hands and each begged the other's pardon. That same day two church leaders, a pastor and an evangelist, forgave one another and were reconciled, and the spirit of reconciliation spread, until a much better and more loving spirit ruled in the hearts of many of the people. Then the way was opened, the Holy Spirit began to bless; hindrances were removed that had blocked up the path, and many were converted and turned to the Lord, in answer to the now united prayer and desire of God's people."

A CAPTIVE EAGLE SET FREE.

In an address to an audience in which were many worldly people of middle and old age an evangelist told this incident: An eagle had been confined under cover for many years, and no one had seen it even attempt to escape. Perfectly subdued, apparently unconscious of its native power, it remained inactive, and to all appearance, contented. But its owner was about to leave for a far country, never to return. He could not take the eagle with him. "I will do one act of kindness before I go," said he, and unloosed the chain from the captive bird. The bird continued to walk the usual round which had been the length of its chain, unconscious that it was free. Neighbors and children looked on in surprise and pity. The discovery came in a few moments. The slow rustling of a wing was heard. It was stretched, and then folded. Anon it was stretched to its full extent, and then slyly folded again. Then, slowly and cautiously, the eagle expanded both wings and looked up into the sky. One effort to mount, then another, and the wings have found their lost cunning; and upward, higher and speedier he mounted, until he soared right out of sight. Hast thou, O child of God, been pinioned long to the cares and toils of earth, so that thy wings of faith and love have lost their power to rise? Thou mayest soar again, "His grace is sufficient for thee."

TWO MANY FAREWELLS.

The question is often asked why Christ objected to one whom he called, saying farewell to his friends before he set out to follow him. (Luke 9: 61.) The reason probably was because of the temptations to which he would be subject, and also that his wishing to go indicated a spirit not yet given to Christ. An amusing illustration of this necessary separation is furnished by an incident reported in a Toronto journal. It states that after a wedding at Courtland, the bride and bridegroom repaired to the railway station to go to St. Thomas to spend their honeymoon. A large crowd assembled at the station to see them off, and after the groom had assisted his wife into the coach of a Grand Trunk Railway train, he alighted upon the platform to shake hands with some of his friends. While he was doing so the train moved off with his bride. She arrived in the city, and upon telling her story to a fellow passenger, he assisted her in hunting up friends. On the following morning the husband arrived, and found his wife. The incident must have been annoying to both parties, but especially so to the gentleman, as it was the result of his own carelessness. He must have wished that he had paid less attention to his friends and more to his wife.

A DANGEROUS CROSSING.

As an illustration of the testimony of Paul to his concentration of purpose and energy, "I press toward the mark." (Phil. 3: 14.) Dr. J. B. Ross relates the following: When I was a very little boy I had to make a journey of some length in company with my father. We lived in the unsettled part of the State, and the journey lay over a stream which came down from the hills. On setting out we crossed this stream, stepping from stone to stone, and so got over almost dry-shod; but when we were returning we found the stream greatly swollen, there having been rain in the interval, and what had in the morning been a small stream was now a roaring torrent. At first my father hesitated to attempt to ford it; but, gathering courage, he took me by the hand, and we stepped into the stream.

As we advanced, the water gradually rose to my knees, to my waist, to my neck; we were then in the middle of the stream, and as I looked round and saw the water on every side, my heart failed me, my strength gave way, and I felt myself losing my feet. Just then my father looked down, and seeing my state, said, "Johnnie, do you see that white mark over there?" "Yes," I said. "Then keep your eyes on it and don't look from it." I did as I was told, and soon, under the careful guidance of my father, I reached the other side in safety. And is it not much the same way with the Christian? Though we are in a way trust in Christ, yet when we look around us and see the cares, trials and temptations of this life, we are apt to be troubled and lose our footing—our faith. But just then the voice of our Father comes, saying, "Fix your eyes on the mark in front—on the blessed Lord Jesus," and walking in faith, looking unto Jesus, and with our Father's tender care, we shall soon reach the other side in safety.

A NAIVE QUESTION.

Speaking recently on the text Ezek. 18: 20, "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord," a minister told the following story of President Lincoln: Daniel J. Morrell took the mother of a runaway soldier to see President Lincoln in Washington, to plead for the life of her darling boy, who had been court-martialed and was to be shot in a few days. Lincoln first upbraided my friend for subjecting him to such an ordeal, but the poor woman was already in the room, sobbing as if her heart would break, and there was no help for it. Lincoln conducted her to a seat and asked a great many questions, learned that the boy had returned to work at Johnstown, and provided for his mother and sister from his earnings, giving as an excuse for leaving the army, that it was lying idle on the banks of the Potomac, and he knew it could not move until spring. The President mused a few moments, apparently undecided what action to take. Even the woman held her breath for the time, and awaited in silence the word which was to rejoice her or doom her to misery.

"Well, I don't believe it would do him any good to shoot him, do you, madam?" asked Abraham of the mother, in a tone of inquiry so natural that one would have thought he was actually in doubt upon the subject himself, and wanted the opinion of the person who knew the boy best.

The mother was speechless. During the inquiry the President had been rolling a small strip of paper into a ball. He handed this to Mr. Morrell, saying, "Read that when you get out, Daniel, but mind you don't tell Stanton."

Mr. Morrell beckoned the woman to the door, placed her in the carriage, read the slip, and ordered the coachman to drive at once to the office of the Provost Marshal. Here is what he found in that tiny strip: "P. M. Washington—Send Private Johnston, Company B, Ninth Pennsylvania Infantry, to his regiment. A. L."

A NURSE GIRL'S PLEA.

In speaking not long ago about the failings of ministers, Rev. Sam Jones said:

Just a few years ago, one morning in our family room, I was sitting reading just after breakfast. There was a little nurse girl there, about sixteen years of age, and I heard my wife say to her, "Sally, you may go this morning, and tell your mother I don't want you any longer." I read along a minute or two, and then I looked. The girl was standing with the big tears running down her cheeks. She looked at my wife and said, "Mrs. Jones," and the lip began to quiver, "Mrs. Jones, please, ma'am, don't turn me off. I know I am the poorest servant you ever had, but let me stay with you and I'll try and do better." I got in to beg for the poor girl just as hard as I could, and I thought to myself if the Lord should come down here and say, "You may go; I don't want you any longer," I would do just like that poor girl—I would fall down at his feet and say, "Please, Lord, don't turn me off; I know I am the poorest servant you ever had; but, please, Lord, I'll try to do better." Let me live and die in God's service. But God won't turn you off. Go to work; let's do what we can for the glory of God and for the good of our fellow-men.

MY CHOICE.

If I'd my wish of house or land,

Of hill, or vale, or sea,

If I'd my choice of all the earth,

I'd choose but Thee.

If I'd my wish, not gold or stones,

If I had thousands at my feet,

I'd choose but Thee.

If I'd my wish of Cross or crown,

My choice the Cross would be,

Because I know, in choosing it,

I'd choose but thee.

AN INDIAN MASSACRE.*

MASSASOIT, chief sachem of the Wampanoags and the faithful ally of the Plymouth colonists, died in 1660, leaving two sons, Wamsuta and Metacom, or, as they were nicknamed by the English, Alexander and Philip. The former succeeded his father, but his reign was brief. He died on his return from Plymouth, where he was summoned to appear before the general court to explain rumors then current regarding certain hostile designs. In the summer of 1675 the jealousies and hostilities that had long been gathering, like a dark cloud, broke out into a furious and desolating war which spread terror and devastation to almost every settlement in New England. It lasted more than a year, and for a time threatened the extermination of the colonies. Of the ninety towns, according to Fiske, twelve were utterly destroyed, while more than forty others were the scene of fire and slaughter. More than a thousand men lost their lives, while scores of women and little children perished under the tomahawk. It was the most distressing period the country had ever seen, and almost every family was in mourning. On this occasion, for the first time, Rhode Island became exposed to the hostile attacks of the Indians. Many of the inhabitants of Providence and other towns removed to the island for safety. Williams, however, remained at home and accepted a commission as captain in the militia, and drilled companies in Providence. He also petitioned the town for leave to convert one of the houses into a garrison, and erect other defenses for the security of women and children. The petition was granted, and the defenses were made entirely at private expense, for which he subscribed ten pounds—by far the largest subscription on the list.

In spite of these preparations, Providence was attacked and twenty-nine houses were burned, among them the one in which the town records were kept. The records were partly destroyed, and the remainder were saved by being thrown into a pond, from which they were afterwards recovered. It is stated in the old traditions of Providence that when the Indians appeared on the heights north of the town, Williams took his staff and went forth to meet them, hoping, as on former occasions, to appease their vengeance. He counselled them to cease hostilities, by telling them of the power of England, and that Massachusetts could raise thousands of men, and, if they were killed, the King of England would supply their places as fast as they fell. "Well," answered one of the chieftains, "let them come. We are ready for them. But as for you, brother Williams, you are a good man. You have been kind to us for many years. Not a hair of your head shall be touched." This, the bloodiest of all the Indian wars, was brought to a close in August, 1676, by the death of Philip. The Pokanokets were nearly exterminated, and of the once powerful Narragansetts scarcely a hundred of them were left to return and occupy the lodges of the tribe. The terror, disaster and loss of life this war produced will explain, if they do not justify, the many acts of cruelty on the part of the whites, and their consigning the captives into slavery. . . . The most we can urge is that Williams, after long years of effort to better the condition of the Indians, his hopes for their civilization were completely shattered. Yet even in this frame of mind, he was more merciful than the leading men, ministers, and members of the general court of the other colonies.

The Yachts and Yachting of America: A standard work of reference, being a history of Yachting and Yacht Clubs, as well as of the various yachts, with biographies of the founders and members of the different Clubs in the United States and Canada. Edited by Henry A. Mott, Ph.D., LL.D., etc. Volume I. Published by the International Yacht Publishing Company, 155-157 Broadway, New York. This imposing volume, printed on excellent paper and superbly illustrated with numerous half-tone and line engravings, will be greatly appreciated not only by professional and amateur yachtsmen, but by all who take an interest in this healthy, manly sport. It is a work of great completeness, giving evidence of much painstaking research, and presenting in the most comprehensive form everything that the modern yachtsman wants to know. The evolution of boat and yacht building from the primitive raft or hollowed log to the magnificent floating palace of the present day, is closely followed and forms a most instructive opening chapter. The first volume contains 692 pages, and is valuable as a work of reference. Over $50,000 have been expended in the preparation of the book.

ELI BROWN.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh to yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN. Discovered by Accident--In Concerning, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on noles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPPLIES ARE SENT EVERYWHERE. Recommended by all who have tested its merits--Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, with hair as precious as Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.04 per bottle. Send money by letter, with full address written plainly. (Correspondence strictly private.) Cut this advertisement out and send it to the MODENE MANUFACTURING CO., CINCINNATI, O., U.S.A. You can register our letter at any Post-office to insure its safe delivery. We offer $1,000 FOR FAILURE or the SLIGHTEST INJURY. EVERY BOTTLE GUARANTEED.

No part of the widespread philanthropic work accomplished by the Food Fund afforded more gratifying results than this effort at reclaiming those waifs, and of setting the children is one that has the cordial sympathy and approval of all who were in terested in the Food Fund, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has arranged for its continuance, by opening a Children's Home on the banks of the beautiful Hudgaged in the work of relieving the destitute families of New York, the puny and neglected condition of the little children in many of these afflicted homes appealed strongly to the sympathies of the pastors and missionaries who were then laboring among them. Ill-clad and worse fed, untaught, and in many cases almost wholly neglected, hundreds of these tender little ones were found surrounded by conditions that augured ominously for their future.

Many had never seen a Sabbath School, and knew not the name of Jesus, except when they heard that sacred name uttered in profanity. They were as godless as heathen children. A movement was begun among them which has already been productive of much good. Parents, who had been careless before, touch-their feet in the right path for the Heavenly Kingdom. Convinced that this special work among the village of Nyack, in a delightful location, where hundreds of little ones, from the tenement alleys and slums of the sweltering metropolis, will be healthfully and pleasantly housed. The buildings at Mont Lawn consist of two commodious cottages, a chapel and a barn, with about two acres of ground. In the larger of the two cottages—which will be the Home proper—it is shown in the photograph on this page, the hall has been attractively fitted up as a Reception-room.

On the left, upon entering, is a spacious, well-ventilated and cheerful Dormitory for the children. Back of it is the Dining-room with Kitchen and laundry conveniently located alongside, equipped with closets, store-rooms etc. Upstairs are seven rooms that can be used as additional dormitories and which, together with the lower floor, are capable of accommodating altogether about sixty girls. The plumbing is of the latest modern sanitary type and best quality. The second cottage is the Lodge, and will be used as sleeping quarters for the help at the Children's Home, with the exception of the second story, which is devoted to the purpose of a playroom for the children in stormy weather, when it is

THE EXCITED GOVERNOR.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Latest Sermon. Text: Acts 24: 25, "Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee."

A CITY of marble was Cesarea—wharves of marble, houses of marble, temples of marble. This being the ordinary architecture of the place, you may imagine something of the splendor of Governor Felix's residence. In a room of that palace, floor tessellated, windows curtained, ceiling fretted, the whole scene affluent with Tyrian purple, and statues, and pictures, and carvings, sat a very dark-complexioned man by the name of Felix, and beside him a woman of extraordinary beauty, whom he had stolen by breaking up another domestic circle. She was only eighteen years of age, a princess by birth, and unwittingly waiting for her doom—that of being buried alive in the ashes and scoræ of Mount Vesuvius, which in sudden eruption, one day, put an end to her abominations. Well, one afternoon Drusilla, seated in the palace, weary with the magnificent stupidities of the place, says to Felix: "You have a very distinguished prisoner, I believe, by the name of Paul. Do you know he is one of my countrymen? I should very much like to see him, and I should very much like to hear him speak, for I have heard so much about his eloquence. Besides that, the other day, when he was being tried in another room of this palace, and the windows were open, I heard the applause that greeted the speech of Lawyer Tertullus, as he denounced Paul. Now, I very much wish I could hear Paul speak. Won't you let me hear him speak?" "Yes," said Felix, "I will. I will order him up now from the guard-room." Clank, clank, comes a chain up the marble stairway and there is a shuffle at the door, and in comes Paul, a little old man, prematurely old through exposure—only sixty years of age, but looking as though he were eighty. He bows very courteously before the Governor and the beautiful woman by his side. They say: "Paul, we have heard a great deal about your speaking; give us now a specimen of your eloquence." Oh! if there ever was a chance for a man to show off, Paul had a chance there. He might have harangued them about Grecian art, about the wonderful water-works he had seen at Corinth, about the Acropolis by moonlight, about prison life in Philippi, about "what I saw in Thessalonica," about the old mythologies; but "No!" Paul said to himself: "I am now on the way to martyrdom, and this man and woman will soon be dead, and this is my only opportunity to talk to them about the things of eternity." And just there and then, there broke in upon the scene a peal of thunder. It was the voice of a judgment day speaking through the words of the decrepit apostle. As that grand old missionary proceeded with his remarks, the stoop begins to go out of his shoulders, and he rises up, and his countenance is illumined with the glories of a future life, and his shackles rattle and grind as he lifts his fettered arm, and with it hurls upon his abashed auditors the bolts of God's indignation. Felix grew very white about the lips. His heart beat unevenly. He put his hand to his brow, as though to stop the quickness and violence of his thoughts. He drew his robe tighter about him, as under a sudden chill. His eyes glare and his knees shake, and, as he clutches the side of his chair in a very paroxysm of terror, he orders the sheriff to take Paul back to the guard-room. "Felix trembled, and said, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee." A young man came one night to our services, with pencil in hand, to caricature the whole scene, and make mirth of those who should express any anxiety about their souls; but I met him at the door, his face very white, tears running down his cheek, as he said, "Do you think there is any chance for me?" Felix trembled, and so may God grant it may be so with others.

I propose to give you two or three reasons why I think Felix sent Paul back to the guard-room, and adjourned this whole subject of religion. The first reason was, he did not want to give up his sins. He looked around; there was Drusilla. He knew that when he became a Christian, he must send her back to Azizus, her lawful husband, and he said to himself, "I will risk the destruction of my immortal soul, sooner than I will do that." How many there are now who cannot get to be Christians, because they will not abandon their sins! In vain all their prayers and all their church-going. You cannot keep these darling sins and win heaven; and now some of you will have to decide between the wine-cup, and unlawful amusements, and lascivious gratifications on the one hand, and eternal salvation on the other. Delilah sheared the locks of Samson; Salome danced Herod into the pit; Drusilla blocked up the way to heaven for Felix. Yet when I present the subject now, I fear that some of you will say, "Not quite yet. Don't be so precipitate in your demands. I have a few tickets yet that I have to use. I have a few engagements that I must keep. I want to stay a little longer in the whirl of conviviality—a few more guffaws of unclean laughter, a few more steps on the road to death, and then, sir, I will listen to what you say. 'Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.'"

Another reason why Felix sent Paul back to the guard-room and adjourned this subject was, he was so very busy. In ordinary times he found the affairs of state absorbing, but those were extraordinary times. The whole land was ripe for insurrection. The Sicarii, a band of assassins, were already prowling around the palace, and I suppose he thought, "I can't attend to religion while I am so pressed by affairs of state." It was business, among other things, that ruined his soul, and I suppose there are thousands of people who are not children of God because they have so much business. It is business in the store—losses, gains, unfaithful employees. It is business in your law office—subpoenas, writs you have to write out, papers you have to file, arguments you have to make. It is your medical profession, with its broken nights, and the exhausted anxieties of life hanging upon your treatment. It is your real estate office, your business with landlords and tenants, and the failure of men to meet their obligations with you. Ay, with some of those who are here, it is the annoyance of the kitchen, and the sitting-room, and the parlor—the wearing economy of trying to meet large expenses with a small income. Ten thousand voices of "business, business, business," drown the voice of the Eternal Spirit, silencing the voice of the advancing judgment day, overcoming the voice of eternity; and they cannot hear, they cannot listen. They say, "Go thy way for this time." Some of you look upon your goods, look upon your profession, you look upon your memorandum-books, and you see the demands that are made this very week upon your time and your patience and your money; and while I am entreating you about you soul and the danger of procrastination, you say, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee." Oh Felix, why be bothered about the affairs of this world so much more than about the affairs of eternity? Do you not know that when death comes you will have to stop business, though it be in the most exacting period of it—between the payment of the money and the taking of the receipt? The moment he comes you will have to go. Death waits for no man, however high, however low. Will you put your office, will you put your shop in comparison with the affairs of an eternal world? Affairs that involve thrones, palaces, dominions eternal? Will you put two hundred acres of ground against immensity? Will you put forty or fifty years of your life against millions of ages? Oh Felix, you might better postpone everything else! for do you not know that the upholstery of Tyrian purple in your palace will fade, and the marble blocks of Cesarea will crumble, and the breakwater at the beach, made of great blocks of stone sixty feet long, must give way before the perpetual wash of the sea; but the redemption that Paul offers you will be forever? And yet, and yet, and yet you wave him back to the guard-room, saying, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee."

Again, Felix adjourned this subject of religion and put off Paul's argument, because he could not give up the honors of the world. He was afraid somehow he would be compromised himself in this matter. Remarks he made afterward showed him to be intensely ambitious. Oh, how he hugged the favor of men!

I never saw the honors of this world in their hollowness and hypocrisy so much as in the life and death of that wonderful man, Charles Sumner. As he went toward the place of burial, even Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, asked that his remains stop there on their way to Boston. The flags were at half-mast, and the minute-guns on Boston Common throbbed after his heart had ceased to beat. Was it always so? While he lived, how censured of legislative resolutions, how caricatured of the pictorials; how charged with every motive mean and ridiculous; how all the urns of scorn and hatred and billingsgate emptied upon his head; how, when struck down in Senate chamber, there were hundreds of thousands of people who said, "Good for him, served him right!" how he had to put the ocean between him and his maligners, that he might have a little peace, and how, when he went off sick, they said he was broken-hearted because he could not get to be President or Secretary of State. Oh Commonwealth of Massachusetts! who is that man that slept in your public hall, covered with garlands and wrapped in the Stars and Stripes? Is that the man who, only a few months before, you denounced as the foe of republican and democratic institutions? Is that the same man? Ye American people, ye could not, by one week of funeral eulogium and newspaper leaders, which the dead senator could neither read nor hear, atone for twenty-five years of maltreatment and caricature. When I see a man like that, pursued by all the hounds of the political kennel so long as he lives, and then buried under a great pile of garlands, and amidst the lamentations of a whole nation, I say to myself: What an unutterably hypocritical thing is all human applause and all human favor! You took twenty-five years in trying to pull down his fame, and then take twenty-five years in trying to build his monument. My friends, was there ever a better commentary on the hollowness of all earthly favor? If there are young men who read this who are postponing religion in order that they may have the favors of this world, let me persuade them of their complete folly. If you are looking forward to gubernatorial, senatorial, or presidential chair, let me show you your great mistake. Can it be that there is now any young man saying, "Let me have political office, let me have some of the high positions of trust and power, and then I will attend to religion; but not now. 'Go thy way' for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee!"

And now my subject takes a deeper tone, and it shows what a dangerous thing is this deferring of religion. When Paul's chain rattled down the marble stairs of Felix, that was Felix's last chance for heaven. Judging from his character afterward, he was reprobate and abandoned. And so was Drusilla.

One day in Southern Italy there was a trembling of the earth, and the air got black with smoke intershot with liquid rocks, and Vesuvius rained upon Drusilla and upon her son a horrible tempest of ashes and fire. They did not reject religion; they only put it off. They did not understand that that day, that that hour when Paul stood before them, was the pivotal hour upon which everything was poised, and that it tipped the wrong way. Their convenient season came when Paul and his guardsman entered the palace; it went away when Paul and his guardsman left. Have you never seen men waiting for a convenient season? There is such a great fascination about it, that though you may have great respect to the truth of Christ, yet somehow there is in your soul the thought, "Not quite yet. It is not time for me to become a Christian." I say to a boy, "Seek Christ." He says, "No; wait until I get to be a young man." I say to the young man, "Seek Christ." He says, "Wait until I come to mid-life." I meet the same person in mid-life, and I say, "Seek Christ." He says, "Wait until I get old." I meet the same person in old age, and say to him, "Seek Christ." He says, "Wait until I am on my dying bed." I am called to his dying couch. His last moments have come. I bend over the couch and listen for his last words. I have partially to guess what they are by the motion of his lips, he is so feeble; but rallying himself, he whispers, until I can hear him say, "I—am—waiting—for—a more—convenient—season"—and he is gone!

I can tell you when your convenient season will come. I can tell you the year—it will be 1894. I can tell you what kind of a day it will be—it will be the Sabbath-day. I can tell you what hour it will be—it will be between eight and ten o'clock. It other words, it is now. Do you ask me how I know this is your convenient season? I know it because you are here, and because the Holy Spirit is here, and because the elect sons and daughters of God are praying for your redemption. Ah, I know it is your convenient season because some of you, like Felix, tremble as all your past life comes upon you with its sin, and all the future life comes upon you with its terror. This night air is aglare with torches to show you up or to show you down. It is rustling with wings to lift you into light, or smite you into despair, and there is a rushing to and fro, and a beating against the door of your soul as with a great thunder of emphasis, telling you, "Now, now is the best time, as it may be the only time."

May God Almighty forbid that any of you, my brethren or sisters, act the part of Felix and Drusilla, and put away this great subject. If you are going to be saved ever, why not begin to-night? Throw down your sins and take the Lord's pardon. Christ has been tramping after you many a day. An Indian and a white man became Christians. The Indian, almost as soon as he heard the Gospel, believed and was saved; but the white man struggled on in arkness for a long while before he found light. After their peace in Christ, the white man said to the Indian, "Why was it that I was kept so long in the darkness, and you immediately found peace? The Indian replied, "I will tell you. A prince comes along, and he offers you a coat. You look at your coat, and you say, 'My coat is good enough,' and you refuse his offer; but the prince comes along and he offers me the coat, and I look at my old blanket and I throw that away, and take his offer. You, sir," continued the Indian, "are clinging to your own righteousness, you think you are good enough, and you keep your own righteousness; but I have nothing, nothing, and so when Jesus offers me pardon and peace, I simply take it." My reader, why not now throw away the worn-out blanket of your sin and take the robe of a Saviour's righteousness—a robe so white, so fair, so lustrous, that no fuller on earth can whiten it? Oh, Shepherd, to-night bring home the lost sheep! Oh, Father, to-night give a welcoming kiss to the wan prodigal! Oh, friend of Lazarus, to-night break down the door of the sepulchre, and say to all these dead souls as by irresistible fiat, "Live! Live!"

"LITTLE FAITHFUL."

gers of a large steamer were in a state of despair. A little boy, about eight years old, was seen sitting quietly at one end of the ship, apparently not in the least afraid. At last a gentleman, who was rather calmer than most of the people, spoke to the little fellow. "Are you not afraid?" he asked; "do you know that we are in great danger?" "Yes, I know," replied the little boy; "but I am not afraid, because I have asked God to take care of me, so I know I shall be all right." The gentleman stared in astonishment at the little fellow who had such faith in God that he could sit without fear, when every one else was in such terror. Gradually it spread all over the ship that a little boy was not afraid, because he had asked God to save him, and firmly believed that he would. "Oh! will you pray for us?" some of them cried out; "perhaps God will answer the prayer of one who has so much faith." The request spread, and the little boy was hoisted on to a seat, where, with folded hands he prayed that "God would save all the people, and not let them be drowned."

The sight of the dear, trustful little fellow with his sweet, earnest expression, seemed to calm a great many, and there was not so much screaming at the close of the short prayer. For half an hour longer the storm raged without seeming to abate. Then, at the end of that time, when some of the people were beginning to lose heart once more, the captain's voice was heard in a ringing cheer. The wind had changed and the danger was over.

A shout of gratitude burst forth from many lips, and then arose the cry, "Where is little Faithful?" Once more the little boy was hoisted up, this time on the shoulders of the gentleman who first asked why he was not afraid, and from many hearts there went up a prayer that God would bless the dear child who trusted him when the faith of so many older people left them. "May it be a lesson to us," they said, "and may we never be so ready to doubt again."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

GOSPEL PROGRESS IN INDIA.

Bishop Thoburn Tells of the Work the Missionaries are Accomplishing There.

REV. J. M. THOBURN, the Methodist Missionary Bishop of India, whose work among the unevangelized natives of that populous country has already been fully described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, recently arrived in America on a business visit connected with the mission. In the course of an interview with the Bishop, the Northwestern Christian Advocate gives the following from his lips:

"When I left India, the statistics showed that we had somewhat more than 72,000 converts, of all ages. These were pure natives, no Europeans or Eurasians included, but my brethren have no doubt added 1,500 additional converts since I left the country. For three years past our people have baptized an average of fifty new converts every day throughout the year. There is no sign of abatement of the harvest. On the other hand, we all see marked signs of a still more vigorous advance. In fact, we have been holding back our native preachers during the past year, and urging them to give less attention to gaining new converts, and more attention to instructing those we already have.

"We have men of many kinds among men did in former years. The reason is that they everywhere find so many people who can speak English that they are not forced to use the native tongue, and hence learn it slowly.

"We have missions in all parts of India, and in Malaysia also. Malaysia is a great island empire that lies beyond India. Our work in that remote region is extremely interesting, and bids fair to become very successful. Our missionaries are now preaching in sixteen languages. We have four printing presses in different parts of that great region, so that we may be able to print freely in all the sixteen languages in which we preach the gospel. The whole of this vast work is united, not only by being placed under the care of a bishop who superintends it all, but by its connection with a governing body called the "Central conference," which meets once in two years. The last session of this body took place a few months ago, and was an occasion of extreme interest. Delegates were present from distant Malaysia and from all parts of India. The interest at times became intense. As the delegates talked and sang in different languages, and all told the same story of victory, intense enthusiasm was manifested. If the success with which God has favored us continues ten or fifteen years longer, our mission will assume proportions which will attract the attention of the world, and produce a profound impression in all artistic and should be ignored. This is a grave mistake. One may be a lover, even to infatuation, of the highest forms of symphonic music by the great composers and yet love the simple melodies which appeal to sentiment and the affections, many of which are connected with the services and ordinances of the church. If music is to be discarded merely because it is simple, we must give up "Sweet Home," "Nearer, My God to Thee," and a multitude of others. These and kindred songs may be sung by the best artists with the best effect, and he who despises them because they are simple may be a technical musician of a high order, with little appreciation of that which moves the heart.

PAUL'S PRISON AT CÆSAREA.

The illustration on this page (taken from a recent photograph), shows the ruins of the traditional prison-house of Paul, the Apostle, at Cæsarea, referred to by Rev. Dr. Talmage in his latest sermon published in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Cæsarea was one of the fortified cities built by Herod the Great, and was erected on a site known as Strato's Tower. Its fine, natural harbor gave it great commercial advantages over neighboring cities, and it had broad quays, splendid bazaars, noble public buildings and magnificently shaded avenues. One of the most imposing and fashionable cities of its time, Cæsarea derived additional importance from the fact that there Herod had his palace and court, the whole group of buildings constituting the fortress spoken of in the Gospel narrative of Paul's visit. It was in this fortress, whose walls alone are now standing, that Paul was confined, and he remained in "Herod's judgment hall" until he was conveyed to Rome. Here also occurred his famous experience with Agrippa and with Felix and Drusilla, which must be regarded as among the most remarkable episodes in the Apostle's eventful life.

MAORI MISSIONS.

In a recent address in England, Bishop Stuart, of New Zealand, said: "The last two Maori clergymen I ordained I laid hands on at the request of the Bishop of Auckland, to minister to the Waikatos. A meeting of the native church synod was held on the following day, when there was considerable opposition expressed on the part of many of the Maori members of the synod to their being sent out of the diocese. It was considered that these young men were eminently qualified, and were likely to be so useful among already professing Christians, that it was a matter of deep regret that they should be sent to the heathen Waikatos. When it came my turn to sum up I was able to say, 'My dear friends, these arguments which you have urged are not new to me. I have often heard such arguments in my own country. I have no doubt they were urged in the case of those missionaries who first brought you the Gospel, but if they had prevailed, you would not be Christians now.'

"When they could not prevail with the young men themselves, they appealed to the wife of one. They said to her, 'You are here among your own people, beloved and respected, and you will go there among a strange people, and your very home will be doubtful, and the circumstances will be full of danger. Why don't you stop at home and do good work as the wife of a parish minister?' What did that good woman answer? She simply took the language of the Old Testament, and said of her husband, 'Where he goeth I will go. His God is my God. With him where he dieth I will die, and where he is buried will I be buried.' She could not be turned from her purpose of sharing his toil."

our native preachers, just as you have in this country; but we have now reached a stage where we can lay our hands upon a large number of men who are as true, and faithful, and trustworthy as any men on the globe. We now have four presiding elders who are natives in the strictest sense of the word, and three others who are Eurasians, that is, men of mixed Indian and European parentage, but the four natives win more converts than any other presiding elders we have.

"I cannot say precisely how many ordained missionaries we have, but during the past six years I have ordained 300 ministers. We had quite a number before I was placed in episcopal charge of the work. Of other preachers we have a great host. We have also a large number of Christian women who are regularly appointed at our conferences to the work. During the past year I assigned more than 2,000 workers of all kinds to different kinds of work in connection with our mission.

"The use of the English language is rapidly extending. I have for some time felt a little concern because our young men who go out from America no longer learn the Hindustani language as well as our young mission fields. The next century will, in my opinion, be a century of missionary triumph. Nothing could produce a more telling and thrilling effect upon the great missionary bodies of the world than the spectacle of a thoroughly organized body of men and women working among the nationalities of Southern Asia, and winning 100,000 or more converts every year. The great victories of Christianity are in the near future. As I believe in God, I believe that an era of stupendous victories will attend the opening of another century."

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

Is the love of children's music in connection with Sunday School work dying out? By no means. Let a large choir be organized and properly drilled to-day, with suitable music, and it would have the same drawing power that it had thirty years ago. What is the cause of a decline of interest in children's singing? First, whenever recent attempts have been made to prepare a choir of children for some public occasion the musical selections have been such as the children dislike to sing or the people to hear.

An idea prevails among a certain class of musicians, viz., that simple melodies are in-

The Sons of Ishmael.

Our Traveler accepts a Great Sheikh's Invitation to Breakfast—A Bedouin Ceremonial—Eastern Hospitality.

MAKING COFFEE IN TENT.

WE see the black tents clustered, in winter, in sheltered hollows of the hills, which have been, from the date of our entrance into the Holy Land, objects of peculiar interest to us. Unlike those of Kedar, they are comely in our observant eyes. Once and again, we have alighted at a small encampment, and sat, for an hour in the tent of the sheikh, accepted coffee, and declined pipes and cigarettes upon one or another civil pretext, and talked (at second-hand) with the inmates of the temporary home. More frequently we have ridden near enough to witness the hospitable stir created by our approach, exchanged friendly salutations and passed on, for a twenty-minute, or half-hour call is an impossibility without giving deep offence to the astonished host.

We are now to pay our first regular visit to a Bedouin sheikh, whose village lies within three miles of the table-land where we pitched our camp last night, and directly in line with our projected route for to-day.

The potentate, in passing our door at sunset, had alighted to proffer in person a courteous request that we would honor his poor abode by a call at whatever hour it might please us to do so. All that he has, and whatever he can do, is according to his showing at our service, now and forever. His grave dignity and graceful deference of tone precluded ungrateful doubts of his sincerity.

Without emulating his deportment, we accepted the invitation, leaving our major-domo, as master of ceremonies, to clothe the acquiescence in terms sufficiently high-flown to satisfy himself and our would-be entertainer. Jamal came to the dining-tent when dinner was over, to post us up to the sheikh's rank and importance. He is one of the richest and most powerful Bedouins on this side of the Jordan, with a following of over five hundred families. His flocks of sheep, his herds of goats and larger cattle are immense, and his horses are the finest for many miles around. "He has but two wives," is a part of the story. "He is only forty years of age, and may, of course, add to the number. Yet that is not likely. He is a sensible man." Having witnessed the parting between the proprietor of our camp and the mighty sheikh, we quite comprehend the compliment of the call, and the friendliness of the pair.

We talk Bedouin until our early bed-time, comparing impressions and information with regard to the strange nomads. The two hours discussion is thus boiled down in Alides's note-book.

"Their object in living seems to be to rob other tribes, and to fight the injured parties afterward; to hunt, to ride, marry, and to wander from one chosen place to another. Their ostensible business is agriculture and stock-raising.

"Leading characteristics: Politeness and hospitality to guests; revenge and ill-doing to enemies, and a large and level eye to the main chance, especially in the matter of robbery and horse-trades.

"In morals of other kinds, their methods are summary. If a man suspects his wife of undue liking for another man, he invites her to accompany him upon a hunting expedition, or a pleasure ride, and comes back without her. She is never seen or named again and the murderer is honored for the deed. If a girl gets 'talked about,' there is no investigation of proofs. Her father or brother takes her off out of sight of the camp, and shoots her as he would a dog suspected of hydrophobia. Half-way measures are unpopular among this simple-minded people."

At breakfast, the theme is still the sons of Ishmael and the visit we are to make. Imbarak, dwarfing the tent, as usual, waits without, tea-pot in hand, five minutes before his presence is perceived. He is too decorous to "hem," or shuffle, to call attention to the unimportant circumstance of his existence. And this morning, alas! he casts no shadow. He never casts much, as to width, but the sun which arose "red and lowering" has, as the old saying is, "gone to bed again," under an uncompromising gray curtain.

The curtain lets down more closely, on our side of the nearer hills, by the time we are on the march. As we reach the one irregular street defined by the low, black tents, preliminary drops have lengthened into business-like streams. It rains, and rains straight.

OUR HOST, THE BEDOUIN SHEIKH.

(Photographed by Marion Harland for "The Christian Herald.")

"They were meaning to remove the encampment to-morrow, up to the hills," David says. "As you will see, the rains have made this flat, low situation quite muddy."

There are perhaps one hundred tents, all low, and some long, covered with a coarse fabric, woven of mingled goat's and camel's hair. Oddly enough, although smoke is rising everywhere through this stuff as through mosquito-netting, it is practically water-proof. On the rainward side curtains are fastened to the ground. As the day is not cold, only wet, the other sides and ends of the tents are open. The settlement is sparse in the suburbs, and diversified by trees and bushes. As we go on, the tents are nearer together, almost touching one another. They vary from ten to forty feet in length, and from ten to fifteen in depth; the sides are five feet high at the lowest, and about eight from the earth to the ridge-pole running from end to end. The largest is, as a matter of course, the sheikh's, and is further designated by a spear stuck in the ground.

Before we halt, half-a-dozen men rush out, ready to seize the bridles of the horses and assist us in alighting. As each takes a visitor's hand to help him down, he tries to kiss it, with a gesture of profound humility. Alcides, whom David "coaches" upon nice points of Syrian etiquette, dexterously evades this ceremony by withdrawing his hand and touching the back of it to his own lips. A woman and a foreigner permits the salute, bowing and smiling appreciation of the compliment paid to her. We are escorted into the largest compartment of the tent, the reception, or guest-room. There are three divisions, that in which we are received, and one apiece for each wife and her children. In the middle of the earthen floor smoulders a fire of coals, and in the hot ashes are set three brass coffee-pots, the tops attached to them by slender chains.

The sheikh rises from a low stool at the left of the fire, and advances to welcome us, raising his hand first to his forehead, then to his heart. Behind him is a row of men, cross-legged upon rush matting unrolled from one end of the tent to another. All bow and touch their foreheads without rising. At the right of the fire, servants spread a crimson rug, thick and soft, the place in the centre of it a camel's saddle and housings, richly embroidered. Upon this, as the seat of honor, we are invited to place ourselves. Little is said while all this goes on, gestures, much salaaming and a few sedate Arabic gutturals doing the work of making us at home and comfortable. When we are seated, the attendants back to the rear wall of the tent, and stand, alert, but motionless, behind the line of sitting figures.

These, we are now aware, are fellow-guests with ourselves, invited to do us honor. Almost simultaneously, we find out smoking mess of broth, thickened with lentils, until it would almost stand alone. About the basin is arranged upon the matting a circle of round, flat cakes of unleavened bread, hot from the oven or griddle on which they were baked. The central dish is flanked by a smaller of honey and one of lopped goats' milk, or lebben, the same delicacy offered by Jael to Sisera in a "lordly dish," probably no better as to quality than the brown ware in which the national article of diet is placed before us. As many guests as can conveniently gather about the "dishes," are collected by the host. They double their legs under them with the ease acquired by long practice, and each tearing off a fragment of the tough, warm cake, folds it with thumb and forefinger, plunges it into the reeking mess, and carries his spoil to his mouth. Portions of lebben and honey are partaken between times.

Our guide, always considerate of our well-being, assures us, in a guarded undertone, that we need not eat unless we desire it. He will represent the late and hearty breakfast we have had, and make all right. Alcides politely waives the apology, takes a distinguished place in the ring and tears off one "spoon" after another from his round of bread, as to the manor born. It is excruciatingly funny to behold when one's stomach has nothing at stake in the exhibition, and the trifling accident of a brown thumb withdrawn, dripping, from the trencher, and carried with the bread-ladle to bearded lips, signifies less than if the next dip and sop were to feed the beholder's inner man—or woman.

Coffee-making goes on all the time. The raw berries are roasted upon an iron plate shaken by a long handle over the enlivened coals; then they are turned into a mortar made of oak from Bashan and of a rich brown with age and use, and pounded with a pestle by a servant. As he pounds and grinds, he beats a sort of tune upon the resonant sides of the mortar, monotonous and not unmusical. Lastly, the coffee powder is put into one of the brass kettles, simmering on the fire, and boiled up three times, before it is poured into small cups, without handles, and passed to the guests. I taste it, and even drink half of the contents of the cup, although it is thick, unsweetened, and made absolutely odious to the uninitiated by a liberal pinch of allspice. The exhilarating draught is dispensed five times during the two hours of our stay within the hospitable precincts. Cooking is carried on as industriously in the adjoining compartment, to a subdued accompaniment of women's and children's voices. In the presence of so many men, the wives and women-servants are not allowed to show themselves. In view of the prejudice—or principle—enjoining the seclusion, we cannot admire too heartily, the perfection of breeding that extends to the paler-faced stranger of the interior sex, attention as marked as that received by her escorts. Not a glance, much less a word, testified to surprise at her uncovered face and assumption of equality with the men surrounding her. Furthermore, not a question is asked as to the antecedents or intentions or destination of the foreigners. The talk runs (or walks) on the weather, the crops and horses, and is led by the sheikh, who eats apart from the rest, as a token of humility. He is not worthy, he intimates by the separation, to dip his fingers in the dish prepared for those he delights to honor.

When the first guests have satisfied their hunger, another set takes their place; the central bowl is carried away to be refilled, more bread is brought in, and the bowls of honey and lebben, if emptied, are replenished. Napkins, finger-bowls, spoons, knives, and forks are unheard of accessories of civilization. All the furniture in the "drawing-room" has been mentioned, and there is little more in the "harem," or women's tent, except rugs and quilts used for bedding, and the few brass and earthenware vessels needed for primitive cookery.

"The Bedouin's life is not a happy one (in winter)," is scribbled upon a page of "Notes by the Wayside." The valleys and low-lying plains, selected because the winds there are less violent than upon higher ground, are at this season sodden with rain, and when the storm is violent, fowls and cattle rush pell-mell to the one available shelter, and will not be excluded. The floor is drenched by dripping fleeces and hides, and trodden into a quagmire by many hoofs, and it is not a rare circumstance for the human family to be driven to take refuge in one compartment, leaving the others for the mb creatures. However crowded the premises, the guest, be he friend, stranger, or even foe, has the best place in the tent and the choicest portion of food, and the host would protect him at the risk of his life against insult or attack, were the assailant his own tribe and kindred. The parting token of hospitality that effects self in the desire to gratify the visitor given by our host, when, the sun breaking forth for a brief half-hour, we are in the act of leaving the encampment, and Alcides quietly tries to get a picture of a woman crossing the open space about the principal tent. The intention is perceived by the Sheikh who overtakes her with a few strides, lays a hand upon her shoulder and turns her toward the kodak. He probably has no suspicion that he also appears upon the plate; the attitude is one which his compeers would consider derogatory to the dignity of his sex and office. Nevertheless, we believe that his action would have been the same had he had time to weigh the consequences of the attempt to meet the wishes of the parting guest.

MARION HARLAND.

WALKING ACROSS CHINA.

It was during the year 1877, writes Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, that Mr. John McCarthy made his historic walk across China, traversing many a hitherto untraveled region, and completing a solitary journey of seven months' duration and three thousand miles in length from east to west. He was the earliest non-official traveler to cross China, and the first evangelist to herald the glad tidings of the Gospel throughout a large part of the provinces, and thus solved the problem whether the interior was open to the evangelist or not.

His proposal to undertake the journey was first received with ridicule, "Walk across China? What madness!" said the critics. After waiting some months, however, Mr. Hudson Taylor's arrival at Shanghai at the end of the year liberated Mr. McCarthy from duties at the coast, to start upon the undertaking that had so long been laid upon his heart. A native Christian volunteered to accompany him on the bold expedition, but Mr. McCarthy, although glad of the offer, thought it well to warn him of the dangers they would encounter. "If Mr. McCarthy, a stranger from a foreign land, does not fear," replied the young man, "if he feels it laid upon his heart to carry the Gospel to Western China, at the risk of his life, certainly I, Ts'uen-ling, a native of the country, and also a believer in the one true God, must have equal faith."

This ended the matter, and so January, 1877, found them "en route" westward. Following the great Yang-tse, the travelers came to the magnificent, rich and fertile province of Si-chu'en, containing a population of at least twenty millions, with not a single Protestant missionary. In a lovely country district not far from Kwang-gau, the evangelists were entertained at the house of a young man they had met at Gan-k'ing, hundreds of miles away. Here they stopped about a fortnight, being invited from house to house and village to village. This made an excellent opening, and the curiosity of the natives was greatly aroused, not only in the "new religion," but in the condition of life in foreign lands.

Quaint Legends and Traditions of the West African Tribes.

AFRICAN folk-lore possesses many attractions for the linguist, the student of human nature and the philosopher. Of late years, considerable attention has been given to it, but by far the most important and interesting work on the subject is the volume, entitled, "Folk Tales of Angola," by 'Heli Chate-lain, just issued by the American Folk Lore Society, from the presses of Houghton, Mifflin & Co., publishers, New York. Mr. Chate-lain, who is missionary, linguist, explorer and author, has resided in Angola for several years, and was recently United States Commercial Agent at St. Paul de Loanda. He has thus enjoyed special facilities for conducting a very thorough and valuable investigation into the subject, and the fifty tales with the Ki-Mbundu text, literal English translation and notes which he now gives in this volume will be accepted as the first comprehensive and satisfactory work that has been issued on the subject. Below, we give a few examples in English of these simple stories.

DOG AND THE KINGSHIP.

Mr. Dog, they wanted to invest him with the kingship. They sought all the things of royalty: the cap, the sceptre, the rings, the skin of mukaka. The things are complete; they say: "The day has come to install."

The headmen all came in full; they sent for the players of drum and marimba; they have come. They spread coarse mats and fine mats. Where the lord is going to sit, they laid a coarse mat; they spread on it a fine mat; they set a chair on. They say: "Let the lord sit down." He sat down. The people began to divide the victuals.

He, Mr. Dog, on seeing the breast of a fowl, greed grasped him. He stood up in haste; took the breast of the fowl; ran into the bush. The people said: "The lord, whom we are installing, has run away with the breast of the fowl into the bush!" The people separated.

Mr. Dog, who was going to be invested with the kingship, because of his thievery, the kingship he lost it.

THE YOUNG MAN AND THE SKULL.

A young man started on a journey; he arrived in middle of the path. He finds a skull of the head of a person. They all used to pass it by there. But he, when he arrived there, he struck it (with) staff, saying: "Thou, foolishness has killed thee." The skull said: "I, foolishness has killed me; thou, soon smartness shall kill thee." The young man said: "I have met an omen. The head of a person has spoken to me!"

And he returned: arrived at home. He finds others, old men, says. "You, gentlemen, I have met an ominous wonder." The old men said: "What omen?" He says: "The head of a person has spoken to me." The people say: "O man, thou hast told a lie. We all of us, at same place we are wont to pass by the head. We never yet heard it speak: how has the head spoken to thee?" He said: "Let us go. When I beat it (with) staff, if it does not speak, I, cut off my head." They say: "All right."

The crowd starts with him: they arrive at the place: they found it. The young man beat it (with) his staff: "Foolishness has killed thee." The head kept silent. He beat it again, the second time, saying: "Foolishness has killed thee." The head kept silent. The crowd say: "O man! thou didst tell a lie." They cut off his head. When they finished cutting it off, the skull said: "I, foolishness has killed me; thou, smartness has killed thee." The people said: "Why, we killed him unjustly: the head of a person has spoken."

Wits and foolishness, all are equal. The young man, his wits killed him.

THE WHITE MAN AND THE NEGRO.

Two men, a white man and a negro, had a discussion.

The white man said: "I, in my house there is lacking nothing. I have all (things). The negro said: "Untruth! In thy house, I look for a thing, I do not find it." The white man said: "You, negroes, you lack all things: I have to look for nothing."

The negro assented; went to his house. He spent a month. He wove his mat; he is sewing it. He arrives in the middle of the mat: the cords give out. There is no more a place where he can take the dry cords. He says: "How shall I do? I will go to the house of the white man, that he give me the cords, that I may finish the mat."

He arose: arrives at the white man's, says: "Sir, I am in need at the place) whence I come." The white man says: "What needest thou?" He says: "I was weaving a mat. It gave out. I said, 'I will go to the house, in which are all things: the white man that he give me a few cords, that I may finish my mat.'"

The white man looks at him: he laughs. He goes into the store: he looks in it. He says: "Negro, thou art lucky." He takes a hundred macutas; he gives them to the negro. The discussion, that the white man had with the negro, the negro won (it), the white man lost (it).

THE BUILDER OF ABILITY AND THE BUILDER OF HASTE.

Two men called themselves one name. This one said: "I (am) Ndala, the builder of ability." The other said: "I am Ndala, the builder of haste."

"They say: "We will go to trade." They start: they arrive in middle of road. A storm comes. They stop, saying: "Let us build grass-huts!"

Ndala, the builder of haste, built in haste; he entered into his hut. Ndala, the builder of ability, is building carefully. The storm comes: it kills him outside. Ndala, the Royal Converts for Christ.

Princesses of Uganda, Daughters of King M'tesa, Serving the Saviour.

DESPITE the wars, rebellions and other troubles during the past two years, and in the face of a powerful Mohammedan influence, the Gospel continues to make substantial progress in Uganda. The chief interest centres in the work so long and successfully carried on by the Church Missionary Society of England. This work was commenced in 1876, in consequence of a request from M'tesa, King of Uganda made through Stanley the explorer. The first five converts to Christianity from Mohammedanism, the general religion of Uganda, were baptized in March, 1882. M'tesa died in 1884, and was succeeded by King M'wanga who, in 1885, attempted to exterminate Christianity. Some native Christians were cruelly tortured and afterwards burned to death. The cruelties of M'wanga caused a hostile combination of the Mohammedans and Christians and he was forced to flee the country, upon which he professed conversion to the Roman Catholic religion, for the Catholics had followed the Protestant missionaries and obtained a large number of adherents. Subsequently he was restored, and professed to become a believer in Protestantism.

Some of the earliest converts of the Christian missions in Uganda, Africa, conducted by the Church Missionary Society, brought their wives for instruction. In 1883, a "women's class" was established. Several of King M'tesa's daughters placed themselves under instruction among others, and a number were baptized. The illustration on this page is from a photograph by a missionary, showing a group of these native converts, awaiting baptism. During the subsequent persecution, not a few of these African women gave evidence that they possessed the true martyr spirit. One wo-builder of haste, escaped: because his hut was finished; it sheltered him when the storm came on."

THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.

Two men were walking on road. They arrive in midst of road; they found a tapper of palm-wine: they say: "Give us palm-wine!"

The tapper says: "If I give you palm-wine, tell me your names!" The first said: "I am Whence-we-come." He who remained behind said: "I am Where-we-go." The tapper of palm-wine said: "Thou, Whence-we-come, hast a beautiful name; thou, Where-we-go, spakest evil. I will not give thee palm-wine!"

They began to quarrel: they go to be judged. They find So and So: they plead. So and So says: "Where-we-go is right, the tapper is wrong; because, where we have already left, we cannot thence get anything more. The thing that we shall find, is where we are going to." Finished.

man, named Sara, the widow of a convert, was put in stocks for the crime of teaching the Gospel to the princesses, and was only liberated through the intercession of the missionaries. Numbers of the Uganda women were eager for religious instruction. Book after book in the Gospels was read through with avidity and a fair appreciation of its truths. To-day the greatest need in Uganda is of women teachers. Considerable inconvenience has at times been experienced from this want: but until the route is rendered easier and more secure, it is difficult to send them out. Some Christian women have been appointed deaconesses.

Uganda is a large country and lies to the west and north-west of Lake Victoria Nyanza, about 600 miles from the coast. Its area is 90,000 square miles, and its population is estimated at between 300,000 and 500,000. It is part of the territory in East Africa allotted to England by the Anglo-German agreement, and was occupied by the East Africa Company until last year.

THE GREAT AND GROWING WEST.

THE hardest and weariest thing I ever do is to do nothing. The most restful place in the world to me is the car of an express train going a mile a minute. Rest with me is not idleness, but change of occupation. The most entertaining prospect to me is not mountain, or valley, or lake, or sea, but the upturned faces of a genial and sympathetic audience. With these feelings I started to cross the continent. I might as well try to judge of your house by standing on the front steps, as you to judge this country by what you see on the Atlantic coast. Six days and nights of consecutive railroad travel will forever extirpate from your mind all fears that we are going to be overcrowded in this country. One pear tree alone, on a farm of a thousand acres, might as well shiver through all its leaves at the fear of not having room enough. Five hundred millions of people will not crowd us. Let the English come, five thousand a month. Let the Irish come. Let the French come. Let the Germans come. Let the Chinese come. Let all nations come. Plenty of room. If you do not believe it, take the Central Pacific or the Union Pacific railroad train. There are the great deserts, by artesian wells or tunnels from the snow-covered mountains, to be irrigated into gardens. The richest gardens on the American continent to-day are those growing where forty years ago there had never been one blade of grass. Irrigation! There is California once on the map of our schoolboy days set down as a mere strip of land, but really larger than the States of New York and Pennsylvania, with all the New England States added. Room for fifty nations between Omaha and Cheyenne. Room for more nations between Cheyenne and Ogden. Room for still more nations between Sacramento and Salt Lake City. Those who took Horace Greeley's advice about going West as a joke, staved here and consider themselves now fortunate if they can get a poor round of beef and no pudding; while many of those who took his advice in dead earnest are living to-day on venison and broiled pigeon.

Nothing more impressed me, and I think nothing would more impress you, by a transcontinental journey, than the capacity of this country for rapid city building. San Francisco forty-five years old only. Kansas City thirty-five years. Denver thirty-five years. Leadville sixteen years. A foreigner looking upon the city of Denver, with its palatial hotels and elegant private residences and cathedral churches, would say that the city had stood a hundred years.

On your way to San Francisco you will see as sweet and fruitful valleys as we ever gazed on. Everything grows in that climate and grows enormously. Beets weighing one hundred and twenty-seven pounds each. Cabbages eighty pounds each. Apples, pears, peaches, plums, grapes, apricots fill the lap of the State of California. The tables morning, noon and night crowded with fruit the most luxurious. The season is not satisfied with giving one crop a year. The fig tree yields three crops and the potato two crops, and strawberries every month in the year. Fine stock everywhere. A thousand head of cattle grazing in one herd. Vast harvests of wheat. A few years ago a Mr. Jones of Stockton, raising 16,000 acres of wheat, preparing the ground for which, at one time he had 900 horses plowing. A single vineyard of 5,000 acres. It is a vast farm field, Sierra Nevada Mountains the fence on the one side and the Coast Range the fence on the other side. Fed by these orchards and grain fields, and swept by the most delicious air, stands San Francisco, looking off to the Pacific and up to the mountain. Her streets alive with business and fashion and mirth. The two finest, grandest hotels on this planet. Zoological gardens inviting the people to fresh air and recreation. Large and beautiful churches, in which stand a live and forceful ministry. Steamers pushing out for China and Japan. Rail trains starting for New York. A mere boy of a city, yet putting its hand on every land, lifting its voice in every money market, commanding the attention of the world. Everything on the largest and simplest scale. Chicago intensified. Quick, mighty, glorious city, long live San Francisco, prosperous be her commerce, crowded be her markets, blessed be her churches.

A GREAT QUESTION.

WHATEVER your worldly successes, do not lose your interest in the greatest secular question that this world has before it, and that is the question of bread. What a grand thing it is to have enough to eat, and to have that sufficiency year after year and through all our lives. What an awful thing to be hungry, and that hunger, as with hundreds of thousands, accompanying every step from cradle to grave. They are born hungry and they die hungry. The food that multitudes are compelled to take, or take nothing at all, is depraved. With no surplus of wages that allows them to purchase in bulk, and therefore purchase cheap, they are compelled to pay high prices for adulterated food which poisons them and poisons their children. The poor man's coffee is made out of chicory, and his sugar out of glass, and his tea out of hayseed, and his milk out of water, and his butter out of lard. Exhausted from lack of healthy food, he feels the need of stimulus and goes in for a bracing drink, and often there, instead of getting honest fire, it is mixed up with copperas and logwood and strychnine and cochineal and blue vitriol and nux vomica and deadly nightshade; and instead of the pure article of destruction it is adulterated damnation.

Churches of America, come down off your stilts and look after the bodily wants as well as the spiritual necessities of the human race. Bread for this life as well as bread for the next life is what is wanted. You cannot get men to take the Gospel on an empty stomach. The physical improvement of the race must go along with its spiritual elevation. In the time of the French Revolution, a great procession of starving women marched to the palace of Versailles and to the hall where the National Assembly were discussing some technicalities, and while one of the members was making a fine point about nothing one of the women cried out: "Stop that babble; that isn't the question; the question is bread!" We need to analyze this fearful cry which has been going up for centuries. Do not confuse it with the Anarchistic cry which demands bread, while it refuses to earn it even when wages are offered. It is a well man have work offered him and he refuses to do it, let him starve—let him starve. The apostle was right when he declared, "If any would not work, neither should he eat." Gibbon, the historian, mentions it as one of the signs of rapid decline, that a vast population refused to do any kind of work, and for their advantage great public ovens were kept baking bread and these lazy people would get tickets and come there for bread for themselves and their families, declining actually to earn their living. But do not mix this communistic demand with the pleadings of those who cannot get work which they would gladly do, or who have invalids to support and the expense is beyond their ability, or those whom trouble and misfortune and sickness have flung. Draw a wide and positive line between the insolent demand of lazy desperadoes and the moan of God's poor.

Just why I should feel so sympathetic with this subject of bread I cannot say, for I have always had enough to eat, though my parents had to work hard to get it, as the perspiration on their brow and their tired look often attested. They somehow always won food enough for their children. But there is nothing that so stirs my soul as to see a hungry man or a hungry woman, and I say a hundred times at my family table, "what a grand thing it is to have enough to eat." May God balk all grain gamblers. Some of them, I am told, are members of churches. I should think that when they recite the Lord's prayer they would leave out as being too suggestive the words "daily bread," and when they are seated at the communion table and the silver plate is passed I would think that as they reached up to take the consecrated bread, it would cry out and say, "Hypocrite, how dare you touch me when you have robbed a hundred thousand of the Lord's poor of their honest bread?"

OUR MAIL-BAG.

S. E. Armitage, Troy, N. Y., R. H., N. Y. City, and several others, replying to the inquiry by Belle Waidman, Junction, N. J., write that the hymn she asked for can be found in the "Harp of Zion," published in New York, by John Arthur, in 1833. It opens:

Now in a song of grateful praise
To my dear Lord my voice I'll raise;
With all the saints I'll join to tell:
My Jesus hath done all things well.

It was a great favorite in England during Richard Weaver's time. It can also be found in the "Songs of the Pentecost," issued by Hughes & Co., publishers, New York, where it is called "The Yorkshire Doxology," being No. 23 in the collection. Words and music are by Isaac Naylor. Among those who have sent in letters in answer to Belle Waidman's request are Henry Jenkin, Larrabee, Iowa; A. W. Hutchings, Stratford; Annie F. Muller, Lutor, Iowa; J. H. Griffin, Salem, W. Va.; Katie Ford, Providence, R. I.; Mrs. G. Colville, Maratine, Mo.; H. Baker, Lancaster, Wis.; E. Matthews, Philadelphia, and others.

Mrs. F. L. Pratt, North Adams, Mass.: I was very much pleased with the idea which J. G. Randall, Des Moines, Iowa, sent in this week's correspondence column relating to a badge for Christians. I think it might help young Christians, and in fact all who wear it, to stand up for Christ our Lord in every place, when perhaps otherwise their courage might fail them. The cost should be very small, so that even the poorest could obtain one.

Subscriber, Hiawatha, Kan.: Was there more than one Pharaoh in Egypt?

Yes; many Pharaohs. The name was a title or dynastic appellation, like King, Emperor, or Czar. It was the common title of the kings of ancient Egypt.

M. J. S., Stoues Mills, Pa.: Where does the quotation, "God tempests the wind to the shorn lamb" occur?

We believe it can be found in the writings of Laurence Sterne. It is frequently mistaken for a Bible quotation.

Miss K. Mack, Jackson, Pa.: The question, "of what tribe was Christ?" was asked last Sunday. Please answer through the Mail-Bag.

Jesus derived his earthly descent from David (according to the tables of Matthew and Luke), not only by Joseph, but by Mary. He was of the tribe of Judah.

H. R. R., Linwood, N. Y.: Is discussing the Temperance question talking politics?

Not necessarily so. Although the question has become a political one, yet it can be discussed entirely on moral, economic and physiological grounds, wholly apart from politics and regardless of campaigns or candidates.

H. E. Cooke, Slatersville, R. I.: Please give the correct pronunciation of the following words: Pharaoh, Sinai, Sarai.

According to Webster, Pharaoh may be pronounced as if written Fair-o or Fair-a-o, but he prefers the former. So with Sinai. In Sarai he directs the second a to be sounded.

Wm. Stiles, Trenton, N. J.: Where does cholera start and how often has it appeared in this country?

Its starting points are variously given as Hurdwar, in Upper India—the scene of a great annual religious festival—Mecca, the focus of the Moslem pilgrimages, and Meshed, in Persia, where vast multitudes assemble every year to worship at the tomb of a Mohammedan saint. It is usually brought to Europe by pilgrims. Several times it has appeared in the United States, but never to the same alarming extent as abroad. The experiences of 1892 and 1893 showed that rigid sanitation and strict quarantine are effective against cholera.

Graduate. Is it proper for a young girl to ask her gentleman friend to escort her the night she graduates, or should the parents alone accompany her in the carriage?

It would not be in good taste for a young girl to be escorted on such an occasion by any other than a relative, or by some friend of her own sex. Her friend could, however, with perfect propriety, witness the graduating exercises as a spectator.

W. F. H., Washington, D. C.: Will you please inform me by whom the Parliament of Religion at the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, was opened? Was he the party originally invited to perform that office, or was he the substitute for another who failed to be present? If so, who was that party who failed?

The opening address, or address of welcome, was delivered by President Charles C. Bonney, of the World's Congress Auxiliary. If there was any other selection for opening speaker, it does not appear upon the official record of the Congress, published by Rev. John H. Barrows, D. D., Chairman of the General Committee.

Constant Reader, Thomaston, Conn.: Does not the statement in Hebrew 10: 26 exclude many from hope?

No; it simply means that all has been done that can be done for the salvation of men. "There remaineth no more sacrifice." If Christ's atonement does not avail to save men from sin and they go on sinning wilfully after they know all about it, what is there that could redeem them? Even God can do no more, having given his own Son.

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y.: At what hour of the day did the crucifixion take place? There appears to be some divergence in the accounts of the Evangelists.

Mark says (15: 25), it was about the third hour, or as we should say nine o'clock. Again the sixth hour is referred to by three of the Evangelists (Matt. 27: 45; Mark 15: 33; Luke 23: 44), when Jesus had apparently been three hours on the cross. In the next verses, in all three cases, the ninth hour is mentioned as the time of death, which would be three o'clock. The statement of John (19: 14), is believed to be due to a copyist's error or to his using the Roman mode of reckoning.

Oliver Harden, Ft. Worth, Tex.: Does Eccles. 3: 18-21 imply that there is no difference between the standing of a man and a beast?

The Preacher is describing the course of his thoughts during his search after the great and best good in life. At this stage (Chapter 3), he is disconsolate. It seems to him that a man has no advantages over the beast. Both die and are buried and turn to dust. But in the twenty-first verse, the thought of a difference occurs to him. Although the bodies of both have the same end, there is nothing to show that their souls go in the same direction. Indeed, the evidence is the other way. That thought causes him to pause, and he proceeds to describe his further meditations with the consideration in his mind.

I. W. Browne, Wells, Iowa.: 1. Why is the prohibition in Exodus 23: 3 given? 2. What kind of prayers are to be offered in compliance with Matt. 5: 44 for those who despiciously use us?

1. It means that strict and exact justice should be done in every case. The poor man is not to be favored because he is poor any more than should the rich litigant. 2. Prayers to their good, for their eyes to be opened to the wickedness of their conduct, and that they may be brought to a better state of mind. No prayer that they may be punished, but that they may be reclaimed.

Inquirer, Manhattan, Ill.: 1. In a recent lecture here, the statement was made that there still exists a footprint of the Saviour on Mt. Olivet, the very spot where Jesus ascended into heaven. Now, as Dr. Talmage and Dr. Klopsch were there, and no doubt made a thorough investigation, will they not kindly tell us, what truth there is in such a statement? 2. The same lecture also said, that years ago an attempt was made to erect a large building over the spot, but that one morning after the roof was already being put on, the whole building—material and all—had suddenly disappeared during the night in mysterious way. Who is the author of this tradition, and what truth is there in it?

1. There is a small domed building on Olivet covering a rock, on which is an indentation which tradition declares to be the impress of Christ's foot, where he last touched the earth. According to the tradition, there were two such marks, but the Moslems removed one and placed it in the centre of the Mosque-el-Aksa. 2. We know nothing of such an occurrence. There are many legends and traditions relating concerning the sacred places of Palestine that are utterly untrustworthy, and are accorded no recognition by authoritative writers on this subject.

J. E. V., Greensburg, Pa.: It means the "seal of the Treasury of America," and the number of the decade—G. M. A., Schellerville. As far as can be learned he was not—J. L. S. Welch, Georgia. We have no data to supply the information desired.—Mr. E. B. Ball, Madison, N. J.: Send them to Chaplain Well, Sing Sing Prison, Sing Sing, N. Y.—Subscriber, Newark, N. J., and Mrs. E. We do not know.—Reader, Montreal, Can.: Dr. Talmage is a Presbyterian.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

TWO POLAR EXPEDITIONS.

POLAR exploration is to be pushed this season with extraordinary vigor. Beside the Peary and the Nansen parties which are already in the Polar regions, two other parties have just started. One of these is essentially a searching party. It has been organized primarily to find the two Swedish explorers Bjorling and Kallstenius who went to the Arctic two years ago and have not returned. Portraits of these two men appear on this page. Bjorling is a botanist twenty-three years of age and Kallstenius is three years older. They set out from St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1893, in a schooner named the "Ripple" with a crew of three men to explore the unknown region beyond Hayes Sound. In June of last year the "Ripple" was found, by the Captain of a whaling vessel, ashore on one of the Cary Islands. Near by was a cairn in which was buried the body of one of the sailors. A tin case was also found which contained a statement by Bjorling dated October, 1892. In that he said that the provisions being low and the vessel lost they were going to seek Esquimaux with whom, if they could find them, they should spend the winter. Another cairn would be erected at Clarence Point on the western side of Baffin's Bay in which he would place a later account of the expedition. The whaling captain was unable because of the ice to penetrate to Clarence Point, but he carried home the news he had obtained. An expedition was organized under the leadership of Dr. Ohlin, and Wilson to reach Cape Clarence and find Bjorling's cairn. They will be guided by the statement they find there as to what course they take afterward. The second expedition is led by the American explorer Wellman, who has started from Tromso, in Norway with a novel equipment in the whaler, "Ragnvald Jarl," of which a picture appears on this page. Wellman takes with him a party of fifteen men beside the ship's crew of nine. He has also forty-eight dogs, accustomed to the work of towing boats on the Belgian canals. He also carries three aluminium sledges which the dogs are expected to drag over the ice. Rubber boots for the dogs are part of the equipment to protect their feet from the sharp edges of ice. The sledges have air-tight cases, which, when affixed, make them available as boats; so that the party may travel in them on land or water. Wellman's plan is to land as far north as he can get, probably about seven hundred miles from the Pole and then proceed for sixty days due north. At the end of twenty-five days half the party will return with dogs and sledges to report progress. The others will continue the journey on foot for thirty-five days longer, at the end of which time they will commence their retreat. A party is to meet them in October and bring them back to Tromso. Wellman is sanguine of reaching the Pole and has given minute attention to every detail of equipment and has carefully studied the history of former expeditions. Both parties are well aware that they are starting on a dangerous enterprise in the pursuit of which many have already lost their lives. It may be hoped in view of this fact that they have given the same careful attention to the preparations for that journey heavenward that they have given to their journey to the Arctic. Sometimes people distinguished for their foresight in worldly matters neglect the other matter, although it is infinitely more momentous to them. (Mark 8: 36).

A Cat's Service.

A citizen of Goshen, N. Y., relates an interesting experience of the affectionate behavior of a cat of which he has long made a pet. He was sick recently and his pet at first would not leave his room. She evidently knew something was wrong with her master and watched him with concern. She hung about his bed in a disconsolate way, as if she wished to show her affection and sympathy. One day she caught a mouse and brought it and laid it on his bed. He threw the thing off, but the cat brought it back, and did so each time he flung it off. She apparently wanted him to eat it, and, to get rid of the nuisance, he pretended to do so. The cat was satisfied, and lay down contentedly at his feet. The next day she brought a squirrel and the following day a bird, both of which were laid by the cat as an offering on his bed, and which he pretended to eat. In each instance the cat would not leave until she thought her gift had been accepted and eaten. She evidently supposed that he would appreciate what would be dainties to her. Her master was much touched by her proofs of affection. He did not want the carrion she brought him, but he could understand why she brought it and was pleased, realizing that she could use only such intelligence as she had. So has it been in man's relations to God. It was not sacrifices that he desired, but he delighted and does so still in the love which prompts sacrifice. (Ps. 51: 16, 17.)

An Irishman's Passport.

Some discussion arose recently between the State Department and a prominent citizen of Irish birth in relation to a passport for which he applied. The Irishman proposed making a tour in Ireland, and was anxious to obtain a pledge from the Government assuring him of immunity from arrest. There was good reason for his con-ing promised to those of whom men speak evil, if men have valid reason for speaking evil of them. (1 Peter 4: 15, 16.)

A Missing Marriage Certificate.

A hotel romance occupied a place in the New York daily journals a few days ago. When one of the old hotels of the city went out of business last year and was dismantled, a Bible was found in each room, which had been placed there through the benevolence of a friend of the Bible Society. A question arose as to what should be done with the Bibles as there would be no more guests to use them, and it was decided to distribute them among the regular patrons of the establishment. One of the recipients on looking into his copy found between its leaves the certificate of a marriage at which the late Dr. C. F. Deems officiated some years ago. He preserved the document and caused the fact of his having it to be published in the newspapers. No claimant, however, appeared, but he did not destroy it. The other day a widow came to his house and saying she had heard that he had found a certificate asked to see it. Her joy on perusing it, led him to ask if it was of importance to her. She told him that she and her husband traveled extensively after their marriage and her husband died before reaching home. She went to his parents who lived in Virginia and presented her claims as his widow for support for herself and her child. They had never approved of the marriage, and, as she had no certificate to show, they refused to believe that any marriage had taken place. She became almost destitute, although her husband had possessed a large estate. When she heard of the certificate being found in the Bible in the New York Hotel, she remembered placing it there after her marriage and at once came to New York to find it. She ought to have a kindly feelings for the book in which the paper was found that establishes her claims to an inheritance. If she will look into it, she will

Twice he killed a lamb in the presence of his trainer, and the second time he nearly killed the trainer, who rather recklessly tried to get away the carcass. Finally the lion would tolerate the lamb in its den just as long as the keeper stood over it with an iron bar. But the effort was so evidently forced, and the performance was so utterly lacking in smoothness and interest, that it was abandoned after two or three attempts. The circus-man believed it could never be done. So people have often said about the reformation of some evil-minded vicious man and have spoken of him as "a hopeless case." But no case is hopeless to a man of strong faith. Experience has proved that the most fierce and wicked and abandoned man can be transformed by the same Divine Power which yet will cause the lion to lie down with the lamb. (Isa. 11: 6.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Owing to the Destruction of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, the organizations of the church have availed themselves of various hospitalities. The Christian Endeavor Society meets in the Duryea Memorial Presbyterian Church; the Prayer Meeting assemblies in the Hanson Place Baptist Church; the Sunday School is held in the Pouch Mansion, and the Sunday preaching services in the Columbia Theatre.

Major George A. Hilton has been holding very successful services at Galt, Ont. The "Daily Reformer," of that town, says that six hundred persons were brought to Christ under the preaching of the evangelist. On the last Sunday of the meetings the large Baptist Church was filled with brief intermissions, from six in the morning till late at night.

The Last Day of the Munhall meetings in Mobile, Ala., will never be forgotten by any one who witnessed them. Three thousand persons are believed to have crowded into the Rink, and there were thrilling scenes as those who had been converted rose to their feet. Dr. Munhall preached an impressive farewell sermon in which he exhorted those whom he had been the means of blessing to hold fast their faith.

The Summer School of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy will be held at Chautauqua, July 3-12. The general topic will be "The Unification of Christendom." This will be treated under the three heads "The Incarnation," "The Church," and "The Reunion of Christendom." Many eminent professors and pastors have promised to read papers. The address of the President, Rev. Amory H. Bradford, D.D., will be given on July 10. Full particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Rev. John B. Devins, 339 East Fourth street, New York.

The Many Friends of Major Whittle will deeply sympathize with him in the sudden death of his son Charles, who was killed by a railroad train while riding his bicycle. The funeral services were held in the Chicago Avenue Church, and were conducted by Dr. E. P. Goodwin, who preached the funeral sermon. His pastor, Mr. Matteson, of Wheaton, bore witness to his manly Christian character and told how he had, especially of late, been greatly blessed in his work for the Master. He was twenty-eight years of age, and leaves a wife and two children.

Rev. B. Fay Mills Preached on Sunday last to the Brooklyn Tabernacle congregation. Large audiences filled the Columbia Theatre, Brooklyn, Mr. Mills preaches there again next Sunday.

Dr. A. T. Pierson has Arranged to supply Salem Street Church, Worcester, Mass., for two months. In August Dr. Pierson preaches in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass., for his friend, Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, and in September in the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

Foreigners Resident in Corea, including the missionaries, are in danger. The king has instructed his minister in Washington, D. C., to inform Mr. Gresham that a rebellion directed chiefly against his hospitality to foreigners has broken out. He urges the Government to send a warship to Seoul for the protection of American citizens.

The Gosner Mission in India has a Leper asylum with two hundred and forty-three inmates, of whom all but fifteen new-comers have been baptized. On a single Sunday of last year sixty-six received baptism; and the bulk of the evangelizing is performed by the poor creatures who themselves have tasted the joy of forgiveness through Christ.

cern, for he had already been imprisoned in Ireland for plotting against the Government, and was released only on condition that he should not return to the country for a term of years. The term has expired, but he is suspected of having continued his plots while it was running, and the British Government were inclined to attribute several of the dynamite outrages to his influences. Our Government received his application, but declined to grant such assurances of protection as he wished. On the other hand, they were willing to furnish him with a certificate showing that he was a naturalized citizen of the United States, and with that certificate he has been obliged to content himself. It will prove to the British Government that it has no longer any claim on his allegiance, but if during his visit he breaks the laws of the country, he will be liable to arrest. Christian people are placed in much the same position. God will not protect them from the consequences of their own wrong-doing, nor give them the bless-

A Circus-Manager's Failure.

A retired circus-manager in giving some reminiscences to a newspaper man said that there was scarcely an animal trick that had ever been suggested to him that he had not succeeded in training the animal to perform. Sometimes it had involved great trouble and loss of time, but in only one case had he absolutely failed. It was in getting a lion to lie down with a lamb. Some dominie in a Western town had asked him if it had ever been done and told him of the Biblical reference. The circus-man had never heard of it, but perceived what an effective tableau it would make and determined to add it to the attractions of the show. The experiment was made with a very docile lion then in the circus. It took several lambs and also several weeks before the lion, which was

LIFE AND INCORRUPTION.

S. S. Lesson for June 24, 1. Cor. 15: 35-58. Golden Text, 2 Tim. 1: 9, 10. By Mrs. Baxter.*

WE live in a world which is subject to corruption. Death reigns; wherever man lives, provision is made for dying. Near to every town and village there is a burying ground, telling the story of death. The decay which tells of death, prevails around us; our garments wear out, our food, if left for a little time, corrupts and becomes unfit for use. Our houses fall to pieces, if they are not kept in repair; railroads, bridges, roads, ships, factories, and machinery, all are subject to corruption and decay; the stamp of corruptible and temporal is on every earthly thing. In vegetation, perhaps, more than in all else, we see corruption and decay, but here we have, as nowhere else, the promise and the fulfilment of life out of death, and the glory of the resurrection. "Sin entered into the world and death by sin," and most surely death has reigned, not over only the bodies of mankind; "Dead in trespasses and sins" speaks of something more than the body, yet most surely our Saviour Christ Jesus, brought life and incorruption to light through the Gospel.

Christ and the resurrection is the glory of the Church, but it is the stone of offence to the unbelieving world, where death reigns, not only in the church-yards and cemeteries, but in the grovelling, earthly spirits of those who know nothing better, and expect nothing better, than what savors of corruption and decay. God never made man to die, death could never have found entrance into the world but by sin. Before our beloved and glorious Lord Jesus could redeem us from sin, which brought death, he must himself pass through death and prove himself its Master by the undeniable fact that he, the Sin offering, "made sin" by identifying himself with us, was nevertheless "without sin" and therefore it was not possible that he should be holden of (death). He partook of flesh and blood "that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage. By this means, by his death and resurrection, he had abolished death and brought life and incorruption to light through the Gospel."

But just as corruption, decay, death, touch all parts of our being; spirit, soul and body, so through the Gospel the good news of Christ and the resurrection—life and incorruption can enter into and transform all parts of our being, as we believe and so accept him. But all our being must come under the law of death and resurrection as Christ himself came under it for our sakes, that life and incorruption may take possession of us. In speaking of the death of the body says St. Paul, "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come? Thou fool! that which thou sowest is

Not Quickened Except it Die."

All incorruptible life comes out of the death of the corruptible life; whether it is the physical body or whether it is the intellectual, emotional life, or whether it is the life of the spirit that "hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible," that "inward man" which is "renewed day by day." Just as God did not create our bodies to corrupt and to die, so he did not create our souls to think corruptible thoughts or to be actuated by corruptible feelings. He did not mean our joys and sorrows to be passing things, or our thoughts and ideas to be such as could be transient and passing, like a fading flower or a withering leaf. Because sin has entered in, therefore "all flesh—the flesh which means our human bodies and the flesh in the sense of "the mind of the flesh"—is as grass, "and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field, the grass withereth, the flower fadeth; because the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it." The same Spirit who is life to the inward man withers all which is corruptible and of the flesh; all which is of self; all which is no blessing to others. By virtue of his death for us, Jesus has given him, by his Father, power over all flesh, to give eternal life to as many as he has given him. Eternal life is the exact opposite to what is corruptible and transient; it cannot change or first Adam in Paul was "a living soul," but there was no power to quicken others by his blameless life, his power of intellect, his high standing as a Hebrew and a Pharisee, while the incorruptible seed of the Word of God by which he was begotten again, and which was now making him its channel, was "a life-giving spirit." Even on earth, long before his body died, and before Christ could raise it again at his coming, it had become in some sense "a celestial body," for through his life and words he gave light from God to those who were still earthly, "terrestrial" bodies, and who were not living as though their citizenship was in heaven, because he had understood that that only can be quickened which dies. Paul understood very practically the Cross of Christ when he said: "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

pass away. There is in it "the power of an endless life."

Elements of Incorruption.

But just as the seed which is sown in the earth must needs die, that it may bring forth fruit, just as the body which is to be raised incorruptible must needs die "sown in incorruption," so is it with the life of our will; our choice, our love and hate, our intellect and imagination; all must pass through death before it can be raised incorruptible. The very goodness of the flesh must wither as much as its badness. "All flesh is grass." The beautiful moral character of a Cornelius had to be crucified with Christ as much as the depraved demon-possessed character of a Mary Magdalene. All "old things must pass away," and all, without exception, "must become new." Not only must the terrible "breathing out threatenings and slaughter" of the persecuting Saul of Tarsus pass through death, but also the blamelessness of which he writes: "Touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless." All that he was as an unconverted man, all that he was in himself as a converted man, must be crossed, must wither and fade, as the corruptible thing it was before life and incorruption could so permeate him as to make him such a conqueror over circumstances that he could see all things working together for good, that he could be in every trial, "more than conqueror through him that loved him." Thus in face of coming bonds and imprisonments he could see only the finishing his course with joy, and say: "None of these things move me," and could speak of his near martyrdom as a true conqueror: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I've kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." In self-pity there is corruption; it begets doubt of God's love and wisdom, it encourages dissatisfaction.

But the eternal life and incorruption, which lay in these words of Paul, which we have quoted, have quickened and encouraged thousands of God's children. The tested against the heartless speech and would have flung the man a rope. But the others interfered. "He is a Jew; let him sink," they said. But a tall athletic man came up to the crowd and looked at the struggle. He heard the speech and disregarded it. Flinging off his coat and boots, he jumped into the river, seized the man as he was sinking, and struck out for the shore. In a few minutes both had come to land, when, to the confusion of the heartless crowd, it was discovered that the man who had been in danger of drowning, was not a Jew at all, but a Christian. His rescuer was a Jew.

He reproved kings for their sakes. Kings and lords and princes are apt to think that they are entitled to special favors and are not to be treated as common men. Even when justice is concerned some of them have thought that they ought to have what they want although justice is on the side of their less distinguished adversary. It is related that a Duke went to the home of Sir Matthew Hale, one of England's greatest judges and told him that he was engaged in a lawsuit which would come before Hale for judgment in a few days. He said he wanted to give Hale a statement of the case so that he might understand it when it came into his court. Hale reproved him sharply. "Not one word," he said, "will I hear. I will listen to the case in open court and decide it on its merits." The Duke said that the plaintiff was "only a common farmer." "That makes no difference," Hale said. "When a man comes into my court, it is his case, not his rank that I consider." The Duke still protested. He wanted to acquaint the judge with certain facts that it would not be pleasant to mention in open court. Hale answered that if his visitor persisted and did not leave the house at once, he would commit him to prison. The Duke left and went to the King to complain. The King heard his story and laughed. "Faith," he said, "I think you are lucky. I wonder he did not send you to prison. I verily believe he would not hesitate to commit me to prison if he thought I was trying to get him to help me do some one a wrong."

Seek the Lord and his strength. A familiar object in the erection of buildings in moist soil is the pile-driver. It consists of a heavy weight raised by steam power to a great height, which being suddenly released, falls through a groove and strikes the head of the pile driving it into the ground. The principle is the secret of power for any one who hopes to do effectual work in building for Christ. The higher he is drawn toward God, the greater force he will have in his attempt to influence others for Christ.

He brought forth his people. An old Jewish legend has it that the pillar of cloud and fire which went before the people when they went out of Egypt, not only showed them the way, but planned it for them. Thus a road was made through all rough places, rocks and stones and bushes were cleared away and a road made hard and smooth over the desert sand. Doubtless, there is no truth in the legend, but God does sometimes make the path of duty straight and firm when he goes before his people to lead them to duties that he has set them to perform.

Made them stronger than their enemies. God is the fountain of strength. It is therefore the most obvious folly to rebel against a Being so powerful. Yet the infidel and the blasphemous are measuring their puny strength against him. Dr. Thomas tells the story of an ambitious Athenian, who, having been the victor in the Olympic games, desired to stand first in the respect of his countrymen. One thing vexed him. It was hearing others speak of a famous wrestler to whom he was compared to his disadvantage. He could not challenge this wrestler, for the man was dead, and he lamented that whatever he might do, men might still say that the wrestler was greater than he. But there was a marble statue of him erected in the public way, and with this statue he wrestled night after night. The statue was not moved, but the nightly conflict was renewed again and again. At last, by a mighty effort, the statue was stirred. He put forth all his strength, as he would if the wrestler himself was his antagonist, and then the statue reeled and fell upon him, crushing him by its dead weight.

A MISSIONARY'S LETTER.

ONE of the most earnest and faithful missionaries that ever went out to the heathen was James Gilmour, who traveled through Mongolia, telling the people of Jesus and his love. After he had been there for some years his wife died, and his two boys were sent to Scotland to be educated. Mr. Gilmour wrote many letters to his boys, and some of these are now printed. One letter says:

"My Dear Sons, — I am getting on well. I have had terrible weather lately, though my tent is only a cloth roof on six bamboo poles, put up in the market-place. We have had three days' wind. The first day the dust was terrible. But I had lots of patients and remained out all day. Next day the tent was blown down twice. I am so glad the people like us and trust us, and come about us for medicines. Just now the school-boys have holidays for the fair, and they stand for a long time together looking at me doctoring the people. When a man comes to have a tooth pulled, even the men are delighted, and advise him to have it out. They want to see the fun. Mothers send their little boys for medicine, and I am so pleased with some of the little lads. They are so modest and polite, making a deep bow as they go away. Always be modest and polite, my sons, and people will love you, and treat you well.

"The boys buy a lot of books, too, and I preach to them earnestly, because in ten years to come they will be men, and if they know about Jesus now, they may more easily become Christians some day soon. You, James, know Jesus. Does Willie? Teach him. Mamma is not here to teach him, and I am far away. You are his big brother.

"The other day when I was preaching, a man was standing beside me with a little black pig under his arm. He wanted to hear me preach, but the pig would not be quiet. He held his mouth shut, but the little pig would still manage to give a squeak now and then. At last it would not be quiet at all, and he had to go away with it. I could not help smiling at him.

"Our Mongol donkey-man wants to be a Christian. I hope he is sincere, but he is very dull and slow at learning. There are three other men here who are learning about Jesus, but it is too early yet to say much about them. A good many people learn some and then stop."

BISHOP SMYTHIES' AFRICAN WORK.

In May, 1889, Bishop Smythies, (the missionary Bishop of Zanzibar and East Africa, who died last month), was in Usambara country, East Africa. He was so satisfied that the missionaries in the Usambara country were no longer in any danger that he felt he could safely proceed on his journey to Lake Nyassa, which he reached after a very trying and difficult walk through the valley of the Rovuma. He was often up to the waist in water, and the consequence was that he was laid up for a short time with fever. While in the Rovuma district he was able to confirm seventy candidates, twenty-two of them being at a station which had been in charge of a native deacon for only a year and a half. Later on he had the happiness of ordaining that native deacon to be the first native minister of the East African Church. The anxieties at this time so told on the Bishop's health that on arriving at Zanzibar he had a sharp attack of fever, lasting fifteen days, and he was ordered to England. He landed in April, 1890, but returned to Africa in the following November, restored to health by his rest.

Upon his return, the Bishop again entered zealously into his work, with the usual result in that climate, that he was soon again on the sick list, and was obliged to return to England in the summer of 1892. While there he called attention to the vastness of his diocese, and the great strides which had been made in missionary work, especially in the Nyassa district, with the result that a new bishopric of Nyassaland was made, over which Bishop Hornby was appointed first bishop, while Bishop Smythies' title was changed to that of Bishop of Zanzibar and Missionary Bishop of East Africa. Under his care the churches of East and Central Africa have flourished and extended to a degree that calls for devout gratitude from the children of God. The clergy and staff over whom he was placed number 150. Of these the Europeans are seventy-two, including twenty-three ladies, who are doing useful work alike in teaching and in tending the sick.

HEAVEN!

THERE is a dark and dismal stream,
And o'er its sullen wave
There is the land of which I dream,
Where vales with fadeless flowers teem,
Beyond the silent grave!

There is a city in that land,
Whose walls of jasper, bright,
Add beauty to the blooming strand,
Where walk the angels—happy land!
And there there is no night!

That city's streets are paved with gold,
Of pearl the gates are made,
Oh, wondrous city to behold!
Where funeral bells are never tolled,
Where flowers never fade!

No death is there and those who meet
Their friends upon that shore,
Upon the city's golden street,
Where tread the spotless angels' feet,
Are joined to part no more!

My dear ones on that happy side
Are waiting now for me:

Soon I shall cross the dismal tide
With them through ages to abide,
From sin and sorrow free!

Oh, happy morn when I shall rise,
To view my home above,
To pass beyond the starry skies,
Where that bright land of splendor lies,
That land of perfect love!

GOD'S FORGETFULNESS.

GOD can forget—else how could he
Whose presence fills immensity,
Have patience with our daily strife,
The cares and foibles of our life;
If he in love did not forget
All our shortcomings—things that fret
Our nature? When the night comes on,
And duties of the day are done,
As we kneel down, and in our way
Tell him the story of the day,
With all its cares and joys and slips,
From the confession of our lips
He treasures that which he thinks best,
And kissing us, forgets the rest.

THE PORTENTS.

Signs to be Recognized as Indications of Christ's Coming.

NOW observe, further, the bearing of this on the signs of the times. Is the Church in her infancy, or has she long ago reached maturity; has she, who was so small, become a great spreading tree, and have the birds of the air come and built in her branches? All this has become history, all has been fulfilled; so also another event foretold has taken place. In the history of the Church there has been a great falling away from the faith, and that apostasy was distinctly foretold. The subject there is ecclesiastical; the apostasy was to take place, not in the world, but in the Christian Church. Paul is writing of what is to take place in the Church, and of that pure and practical hope; and he is writing just there and then with reference to the coming of the Lord and our gathering together to him. Now, if that is not the coming of Christ for his people, I know not what is.

Now, it is a question of our gathering to him, and Paul says, "That day shall not come except there comes the falling away first." I believe that: just as I accept any other statement of inspiration.

I make but a brief allusion to the remaining three signs. Now, Mohammedanism is a tremendous fact, a tremendous factor in the world's history, in the history of Palestine, the Jewish race, and in that of the Christian Church. Mohammedanism is, as we know, a woe, as it was foretold it should be, a tremendous woe, on the apostate Eastern Church; and, of course, it has been a woe on Palestine, and on the Jewish people, too. It is remarkable how the Jews have been oppressed by the Papacy in the West, as well as by Mohammedanism in the East. And so Mohammedanism has oppressed the Jewish people, besides treading down their land and erecting the Mosque of Omar, still occupying the site of the temple—though now perhaps it may not be there much longer. Mohammedanism dominates one hundred and fifty millions of the human race. How long has it been in power? Some twelve to thirteen centuries. You remember how our Lord told us that Jerusalem should be trodden down "till the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled;" and that power has trodden it down. But when you look on that power, and compare its present position with its past, with what it was in the days of its pomp and pride, when we compare that with the present state of things; when we recall the eight hundred years' history of the Turkish Empire; when the Ottoman power (the bone-breaker, as the name means), the destroyer of men, was shedding such a deluge of blood and proving himself a resistless and merciless destroyer—when we look at the present condition of Turkey, with its resources exhausted, see it lying sick and perishing, we judge ourselves justified in drawing an important inference with regard to the times in which we live, that these are the closing days of the Jewish desolation. We say, then, from the Mohammedan signs, it is very clear that the end is drawing very near.

With regard to Jewish signs, I will say only a sentence or two. I have here a Jewish calendar by Lindo, in which an outline is given of Jewish history; and I glance over the record of the suffering the Jews have passed through for twenty-five centuries, and especially during the last eighteen centuries.

On comparing their past experiences with the present position of the Jews, we see the yoke broken, the fetters snapped, liberty, freedom, equality granted, power and position gained. We find them members of Government, teachers in universities, amassing wealth enormously, and so forth. Seeing these things, what is the conclusion you reach? That the time of Jewish restoration is come. Palestine is being lifted up on the one hand; and we seem to hear the voice which has gone forth bidding desolate Zion, though long disconsolate, lift herself, and shake her garments from the dust of ages, for the time of her liberation and emancipation has come.

CHRIST'S IDEALS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning June 24. Matt. 5: 1-16, 48.

WARRING sects and rival creeds have contused our idea of Christ's mission and his kingdom. It is important that we come back to his own ideal. He is our King. What does he expect his subjects to be and to do? To his people and to all who aspire to become his people, this statement from his own lips is of supreme moment. There are, as he declares, eight kinds of character which he regards as blessed. They are not the kinds that are generally esteemed. Christ was an original Teacher, for he was a Revealer. He spoke the words he had heard of his Father. So we get from him new concepts, new standpoints and new ideals. This list of eight does not include the rich, nor the noble, nor the powerful, nor the learned. Surely they are blessed! We have always been taught so. But they are not in the list. It is made up of the poor in spirit, the mourners, the meek, they who hunger after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, and they who are persecuted for righteousness. Then anyone, however humble and poor and ignorant may be blessed. The qualifications are all of character and conduct. It is not what men have, nor even what they believe, that makes them eligible—it is what they are. The most illustrious and the most lowly enter at the same gate. Neither is excluded on account of his condition or circumstances. The traits enumerated are those which characterize those whom Christ recognizes as his subjects.

Two qualities are expected in such a people. They are to be like salt and like light. Like salt in their preserving, penetrating, purifying influence, permeating the world which is tainted with corruption, putrid with sin and loathsome evils. "Ye are the salt," Christ says, your city, your street, workshop is to be the better and the purer for your being in it. We know such men, whose silent presence is a reproof to evil speaking, to profanity, to lying and slandering. His people are also to be light. The divine spark kindled within them is to shine and glow. Men will judge of God by them. Their character is to be so pure that when men look upon them they shall esteem God whom they have not seen, because these who have his nature in them, whom they can see, are so lovable and beneficent. Therefore, Christ says, let your light shine; it will lead darkened souls to the ineffable light. Although it be but a feeble spark, let it shine. It is the same in its nature as the sun, and it may give help to some benighted traveller. Thus we get, by simple figures, Christ's ideal of his church—good and doing good. Of such is the kingdom of heaven.

THE INTERNATIONAL Y. W. C. A.

On this page is a group of portraits of ladies who are toiling in the interest of the young women of this and other lands, seeking their best interests and helping them in their difficulties. They are the officers of the International Young Women's Christian Association, which now has branches in all our large cities and has been the means of great usefulness.

Few people enjoy being known by the reputation already gained by other members of the family, but the International Young Women's Christian Association is an exception, in that, as an organization, it so closely resembles the Y. M. C. A. that it is proud to be recognized by their leaders and workers as their complementary organization and sister Association, doing among young women what they are doing among young men. The International Association is the result of an uprising in the universities and colleges of the country, dating as far back as 1872, inspired by and named for the Inter-collegiate movement of the young men. In 1886 there were 100 associations grouped in seven State organizations and these meeting in a convent at Lake Geneva, formulated the present International Association, with headquarters and executive Committee located in Chicago.

The departments of organization are the local i. e., city and college Associations, these unite to form the State Associations, and all in turn combine to make the International Association, and America

States, while the supervisory work of the entire country and Canada, and the organization and upbuilding of new local and state organizations belongs to the International Association through its executive, the International Committee.

The International Committee is composed of thirty-three women, and is divided into the following sub-committees: Publication, Secretarial, Finance, City, College, State, and Executive. Five of the Sub-committee as well as the entire International Committee hold a monthly meeting for the supervision of the work in all its departments.

With the opening of the fall, a general, two office, a college, editorial and international secretaries will be engaged all the time in the International Work, besides the many State and local Secretaries.

The summer schools, for Secretaries and the training of workers, have become quite a feature in the Association. This summer is the fourth season and three assemblies will be held, one each in Northfield, Mass., Lake Geneva, Wis., and Casadero, Cal.

The International Association measures its vitality and power for usefulness, not by years of existence but by actual work accomplished. In eight years it has grown to over three hundred associations in thirty-eight states with nineteen states supervised by thoroughly organized state organizations many of which have their own traveling secretaries. It stands for the best in womanhood and a large army of edu-is linked with five other nations in a World's Young Women's Christian Association.

Each association governs its own work though limiting it to certain principles agreed upon by all. The Associations have opened gymnasias, parlors and halls in which a wide range of social life and entertainment is enjoyed; they have libraries and class rooms where thorough educational work is supplemented by practical talk along many important lines, noon-rest and lunch rooms, offices for general information and employment, Boarding House Directory and Boarding Clubs. They hold meetings for Bible Study and Special Training in Christian Work, services for prayer, praise and personal work, in fact, all that ministers to the physical, social, business, intellectual, and spiritual inspiration and development of young women.

The State Association, and its executive committee, becomes responsible for the extension and development of the work in the

THE B. Y. P. U. AT SARATOGA.

At the Baptist anniversaries at Saratoga, the Young People's Union was by no means overlooked. The Union is growing in the appreciation of the pastors and those most interested in the real work of the denomination. A series of morning conferences was held by the officers and members of the Union, in which several eminent ministers assisted. Among them were Dr. MacLaurin of Detroit, Mr. H. C. Vedder, Revs. C. H. Dodd, A. K. Fuller, Dr. A. G. Upham, C. A. Reese and Prof. J. M. Stifler. "The Baptist Union" reports a conference between its editor and other officers of the Society and the Secretaries of the older societies. Secretary Wilkins and Dr. Ira M. Price, representing B. Y. P. U. A., laid before them the plans of the Course, and asked their co-operation in carrying out the same as far as it may concern their several societies. Dr. H. C. Mabie and O. O. Fletcher were present for the Missionary Union, Drs. T. J. Morgan and William M. Haigh for the Home Mission Society, and Col. Chas. H. Banes for the Publication Society. Mr. Henry C. Vedder, who has given valuable aid during the year as one of the official conductors of the C. C. C., was also present as a mutual friend and adviser. After a very full canvass of the whole subject, the following expression was placed on record as the result of the conference. "Having heard a statement from the officers of the B. Y. P. U. A. of the plan of the Conquest Missionary Studies, we, representatives of the American Baptist Missionary Union, the American Baptist Publication Society and the American Baptist Home Missionary Society express our approbation of the general scheme and our willingness to co-operate in utilizing it. Charles H. Banes, T. J. Morgan, H. C. Mabie."

It is understood that each of the old societies represented will take care that their missionary publications, their periodicals, pamphlets, books, etc., shall provide side-light reading for the students following the Missionary Course as the readings of the Course proceed.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A Christian Endeavor society at Cedar Rapids, Neb., in nine months has increased from eleven to ninety members and brought twelve members to the church.

One of the delegates to the Jubilee Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations in London is Prince Oscar Bernadotte, son of the King of Norway and Sweden. He has been elected a Vice-President of the International Y. M. C. A.

The membership of the different Circles of King's Daughters in Nashua, N. H., have united and formed a Benevolent Fund. They report a membership of more than one hundred, with the number increasing at every meeting.

Over five hundred delegates and visitors attended the recent Epworth League convention at Pueblo, Colo. There are in Colorado ninety senior chapters of the League, and thirty junior chapters with 2,680 seniors and 1,720 juniors, a gain of 2,171 during the year. The convention continued through two days. Among the speakers were General Secretary Schell, Dr. F. M. White, Dr. B. T. Vincent and Rev. Frank Crane.

The Christian Endeavor Society, at Fairhaven, Mass., meets every week in rooms hired in the poorest quarter of the town. These rooms are also open in the afternoon once or twice a week that the women that live near may gather there, bring their work and receive help about it.

The new Secretary and Editor of the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is Rev. S. A. Steel, D.D. He is a native of Mississippi.

The honor of knighthood has been conferred by Queen Victoria on Mr. George Williams, the founder of the Young Men's Christian Association in recognition of the service he thus rendered to the young men of the nation. Henceforward he will be addressed as Sir George Williams.

The fine building of the Melbourne Y. M. C. A., which cost $275,000, and which was erected just prior to the commencement of the commercial depression still affecting Australia, has lapsed into the hands of the mortgagees, the savings bank, who had advanced half the purchase money.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of India recently held an enthusiastic meeting at Calcutta. About 500 persons were present, and songs were sung in Hindustani, Bengali, Malay, Chinese, English, German and Swedish. There was a delightful social reunion, and much enthusiasm was awakened by the reports that were given of work done.

Hawaiian Simplicity.

A Comparatively Happy, Pastoral People, Despite Recent Troubles—Rev. Dr. Talmage's Visit to the Islands.

BEFORE this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of its readers, Rev. Dr. Talmage, its editor, will have arrived in Hawaii, he having sailed from San Francisco individual possessions, in many parts of Hawaii, seem to be valued only for the pleasure they enable the possessor to confer upon those around him, and there is no false modesty about asking for a thing, on the part of those who wish to share their neighbor's good fortune. It has sometimes happened that this very general custom has been decidedly embarrassing to foreigners traveling in Hawaii.

These islands owe much to the United States. It was the first country to establish missions there, and it has given them, too, about all the civilization they have. But life to the average Hawaiian is hardly the serious problem it is to the American or the European; he is a child of nature still, and for Honolulu in the steamship, "Alameda," on May 31. This Sandwich Island port will be the first stage or stopping-place on his journey around the globe.

Of late years, Hawaii has been gradually becoming more and more Americanized. Not only do American commercial interests preponderate there, but since the monarchy was superseded by the republican "Provisional Government," the fraternal relations of the two countries have become closer than before, and the people of the little "Paradise of the Pacific" regard the powerful Western republic as their protector and defender.

Social life in Hawaii is in a state of transformation, the people being Christianized and civilized, yet clinging with patriotic tenacity to many of the old customs as well as the old style of native dress. In the seaport cities and especially in Honolulu and Hilo, where there is a liberal mixture of nationalities—the garb of modern civilization may be said to predominate; but in the privacy of native homes both there and in the rural districts, the simpler and less burdensome Hawaiian costume is preferred. Women wear the "holoku" or loose, flowing, native gown; but on festive occasions they appear in much more graceful dress, usually white, and garlanded on head, neck and shoulders with leis or wreaths of beautiful flowers. Flowers are everywhere in Hawaii. At a feast, the table is all abloom with them and the guests are each decked with leis as they take their seats.

If the dinner or supper be served native fashion, there are no chairs, but the guests recline on low benches or divans, in oriental style, some squatting on their heels. At receptions, too, flowers form a prominent and delightfully fragrant feature of the occasion, and almost the last thing a Hawaiian host does, before bidding his stranger guest good-bye, is to tling around his neck a wreath of the most beautiful flowers the gardens and woods afford—and there are many varieties to choose from.

Our illustration shows a group of Sandwich Island maids in festival dress. They are almost covered with garlands; indeed no one of either sex would ever attend a festival without them. But, although the natives are a pleasure-loving, easy-going people, their recreations are simple and comparatively innocent. Possessed of a happy temperament and with the most attractive surroundings; with few ambitions and no need of excessive toil, the average Hawaiian leads almost an ideal life. In village communities, the greatest sociability prevails. Those that are well to-do share freely with others less fortunate and the result is that while there are few rich, there are no paupers. Indeed, his fishing, surf-riding, horse-back riding and flowers are of greater moment than aught else. He is probably the best specimen, physically and intellectually, of the Polynesian races, and has done what no other Polynesians have done, in endeavoring to give to others the excellent Gospel training he himself has received.

The Humors of Sea-Bathing.

While bathing, the ludicrous will often break through the grand. Swept hither and thither, you find, moving in reel and cotillon, saraband and rigadon and hornpipe, Quakers and Presbyterians who are down on the dance. Your sparse clothing feels the stress of the waves, and you think what an awful thing it would be if the girdle should burst or a button break, and you should have, out of respect to the feelings of others, to go up the beach sidewise or backward or on your hands and knees.

Close beside you, in the surf, is a judge of the Court of Appeals, with a garment on that looks like his grandmother's nightgown just lifted from the wash-tub and not yet wrung out. On the other side is a maiden with a twenty-five-cent straw hat on a head that ordinarily sports a hundred dollars' worth of millinery. Yonder is a doctor of divinity with his head in the sand and his feet beating the air, traveling heavenward, while his right hand clutches his wife's foot, as much as to say, "My feet are useless in this emergency, give me the benefit of yours."

Now a stronger wave, for which none are ready, dashes in, and with it tumble ashore, in one great wreck of humanity, small craft and large, stout hulk and swift clipper, helm first, topsail down, forestay-sail in tatters, keel up, everything gone to pieces in the swash of the surges. This is the season when the humors of sea-bathing are about to begin.

The Nature of Obedience.

In the home, writes Emily Huntington Miller, the child ought to learn neatness and order. The market value of a child's work is not the measure of its worth. Whatever portion of the daily work falls to the ourselves. If promptness be the most difficult of all virtues to teach our children, it is that whose possession will be a priceless boon to them. It is worth a small fortune to them to be taught to go without delay from one thing to another, neither wasting their own time nor stealing that of others.

CHOOSE JESUS TO-DAY.

BOAST not of to-morrow;
Though fair it may rise,
No rays of its glory
May gladden your eyes;
Your life as a vapor
May vanish away;
Wait not till to-morrow,
Choose Jesus to-day.

The ways you are treading
Apart from the Lord,
No real enjoyment
Can ever afford;
Your pleasures are fleeting
And mingled with pain;
All losses for Jesus
Are infinite gain.

This day of salvation
Be wise to improve,
Away from your peril
Make haste to remove;
In weak indecision
No longer delay;
Wait not till to-morrow,
Choose Jesus to-day.

DEAN STANLEY AND THE CHILDREN.

IT is related of Dean Stanley, that he always enjoyed the companionship of children, and the interest which he displayed in them in public was a most marked characteristic of his private life. As a young man he delighted to collect a number of them into a room with him by himself, to play with them and tell them stories; at Norwich, when staying at his father's house, he was accustomed to hold a Bible class for them on Sunday afternoons. As Dean of Westminster, he enjoyed taking them over the Abbey, especially if they were not too old to be on their good behavior, and would ask questions and listen to the answers. Dear little Barbara James had been his favorite companion on the Rhine steamer in 1840; the children of his servant, Waters, were his playmates in his home at Christchurch; the deanery at Westminster was seldom without the presence of a small nephew. And at all times his playful tenderness and thorough sympathy with innocent mirth and fun, not only attracted him to children, but in turn drew children to him. Services for children he especially delighted in. The Psalms were selected for such an occasion. The eighth Psalm was chosen to show how little children may find out the glory of God in the great works of nature; the fifteenth Psalm, that they might see how, from our earliest years down to our latest age, that in which God finds the most pleasure is the humble, pure, truthful, honorable mind; the 127th Psalm, in order to impress on parents what precious, inestimable gifts are given them in their little children.

The lessons were in the same way especially selected: "The first lesson to remind you how little Samuel knelt upon his knees morning and evening, waiting for the voice of God to tell him what he was to do: and the second, to set before us the example of our Saviour, Jesus Christ himself, as the little child."

Bible Toys.

Lately, a wise woman, long accustomed to infant-school teaching and skilled in kindergarten methods, has invented a set of Bible toys, in the shape, easily adjustable, of ladders, stars, and other devices, by which, while playing games, the children are taught the beautiful old Bible stories, as fascinating to the childish ear as stories from Homer or from fairyland—stories of the Garden of Eden, of the deluge, of Joseph, of Samson, of Gideon, of Samuel, of David and Goliath, of Solomon and Josiah, and, coming to later times, the wonderful stories of the New Testament.

"CS for our brave Elspeth," Mrs. Barnes' love of fun getting the better of her sympathy, in an actual laugh—"she stalks about the place like a grenadier, eyes alert and ears pricked up, and nostrils quivering—ready for battle. I have my suspicions that she feeds that big dog upon raw meat to make him savage. I know that she keeps him chained by the kitchen door all day, and that he patrols the premises all night. I used to hear his heavy feet marching up and down the piazza, and once an hour making the rounds of the house. Even Robert had a watchful look. I had not believed him capable of. Up to ten o'clock to-day, nothing more had been heard of Paul than if Elspeth had throttled him and thrust him under the rotten ice which is beginning to float down the lake. My husband does not like the looks of this. He thinks that Paul is planning some ugly—surprise that will annoy, if it does not terrify his wife; such as spying out the children's hiding-places, and trying to seize them. I think that he is waiting to get legal advice, or, what is more likely, hoping to wear out Alice's spirit by a mysterious silence. There is nothing harder to bear than a vague dread. I believe him to be capable of anything," added the wholesome little woman, who, like most warm lovers, was a good hater.

"If I had any opinion on the subject—which I don't presume to have"—Nurse Williams announced, folding up her knitting preparatory to going home—"it would be that he has taken vessel and gone back where he came from, to see if he can get hold of his daughter. He's maybe uneasy about her, knowing the ways of foreign parts as he does, and that women can't go kitting around there alone—especially when they are young and pretty—as they can over here (and particularly, as I will and always say in Brooklyn!) and he must have some natural feeling for the poor child. Leastways, he knows that she is the best card in his hand."

"Will you listen to me using gambling talk in my old age when I don't know queens from spades, nor hearts from jacks? It must be the talking and thinking so much about a man who's made his living that way. There's more things that's catching than measles and cholera. You'll let me know if you've any further news of them all? They are in my mind and prayers all the time I'm awake."

She had run in for an hour that evening expressly to inquire as to the case of her Pinehurst friends, and she carried them upon her great heart in her homeward walk. The weather was much colder than when she went into her pastor's house. The salt, yellow fogs were rolling seaward before a brisk nor'wester; the stars blinked frostily overhead.

"March will die like a roaring lion!" soliloquized the good soul "stepping out" at a rate of speed disproportioned to her years and weight. "His teeth are sharp, too!"

The nor'wester was a young gale when she faced it, bullying all weaker things after the manner of March winds, capricious, and no respecter of persons. Substantial as was her build, she had to duck her head, and shoulder the blast sidelong in crossing the streets. Thus advancing, she brought herself into contact with a stout man at the junction of the Avenue with Post Street. Both staggered, and he seized her arm to save her from falling, with—

"I beg your pardon, madam!"

"If it ain't Mr. Stevens!" cried she, with what breath the gale and shock had spared to her.

The home missionary laughed—a right round, jovial laugh that must have come all the way from his heels.

"This is one of the things people who know no better call 'wonderful!'" he said, jolly. "Such things as are all the time happening to me—and to anybody who is on the lookout for them. I am on my way to your house. Just got off the car at the corner below."

"King's business?"

"That's as you look at it. Busy?"

"Just home from a billious-remittent yesterday, and pretty well rested out last night. Why! what's this?"

Mr. Stevens said "Halloo!" and both halted at the bottom of the steps leading up to the sign of "Mary Williams, Nurse, &c." A man crouched there, doubled up until his forehead rested on his knees, not—as the practised eye of the two spectators at once discerned—in the limp attitude of the drunkard, but tense with physical anguish. Mr. Stevens took him gently by the shoulder. He moaned, and tried to raise himself. The light of the street-lamp showed a face like chalk, made keen and old by extremity of pain.

"Aha!" escaped the missionary.

He let go of the shoulder, and beckoned the nurse a few steps apart.

"I've seen this man before to-day. He swore at me, then. That brings him fairly within the category of 'them that curse and spitefully use you.' So, my duty is to bless him. Can you take him in for an hour or so? He has a convulsion of some sort, and ought to be attended to at once."

"I'll see if the men-folks downstairs are at home. They can help you up to my sitting-room with him,"—mounting the steps hastily.

The "men-folks," a father and grown son—willingly lent a hand in the charitable deed. Whatever Mrs. Williams ordained respecting sick people was law and gospel to them. The three men got the groaning, and almost unconscious sufferer up the second floor, and laid him upon the lounge under the illustrated poem, Mrs. Williams's pride. At her next behest, the son ran off for Dr. Bacon.

"It's angina pectoris!" said Mr. Stevens, presently, watching the fierce spasms.

"We used to call it 'breast-pang,'" said the nurse in the same guarded key. "There's few worse things that the human body can endure. He's been drinking hard, too. May be to try to quit the pain, poor fellow! I've known people to mistake it for cramp in the stomach in the first stages. He looks like a gentleman."

The missionary nodded his grave pitying regards upon the convulsed features. Used as he was to witnessing every form of suffering, he appreciated that this was an extraordinary case, and that the peril was imminent. Hot fomentations were applied to his chest, and hot water-bags to his feet, without mitigation of the symptoms. It was a tedious half hour that rolled by before the bustle of the physician's arrival was heard upon the stairs. For the next hour little was said in the room besides the quick, authoritative directions of the chief in command, and the queries of the subordinates.

In that time, medicines were brought in; a folding bed was lowered and made up, the sufferer undressed and laid within it, apparently unconscious of everything except the intolerable torture of his mysterious malady. It was twelve o'clock when his groans ceased, and he lay in the stupor induced by anodynes and exhaustion.

Dr. Bacon picked up the coat he had taken off, the better to handle the writhing man, and whistled.

"By Jap! that was a near thing! I thought he was off a dozen times. Who and what is he? and how came you two in charge of this private hospital?"

"He was taken upon my steps," said Mrs. Williams.

"And you took him in. You may be thankful if he doesn't turn the tables. Such impulsive charity is pious, but poor policy, so far as the life that now is goes. What do you know of our patient, Mr. Stevens?"

"He is a traveler on the Jericho road, and my neighbor. The priest and the Levite had probably had their look and their say about him, but they were out of sight before we came up."

The doctor's eyes twinkled with merry malice.

"S-o-o! a pair of good Samaritans, eh? The sacred drama is likely to cost you more than a pocketful of tuppences, and more time than you calculated upon. He can't be moved to-night, or to-morrow, without endangering his life. Which isn't worth taking odds upon, in any event. You've got a white elephant on your hands, my good sister. My advice (unprofessional) is that you examine his clothing for some clue to his identity. If he has friends, they ought to be informed as to what has happened."

The search was futile. Not a letter, or so much as a handkerchief, was in the pockets, and none of the garments were marked.

The doctor whistled again.

"That saying about the Jericho road wasn't amiss. Our uncertain man has certainly fallen among thieves, and thieves without honor at that."

The smile he turned upon the hostess was a broad grin of mischievous satisfaction.

"Here's a station on the Royal Road for you! Not having taken a ticket on that line myself, I humbly propose that you bundle him out of this to the hospital the minute I can say with any degree of truthfulness that he isn't likely to die on the way. If he dies here, there will be a newspaper inquest, and there's no telling what amount of talk and fuss."

"That's for to-morrow to decide—no you, nor yet me," she rejoined the nurse, composedly. "But this much I do say—until it's safe to move him, here he stays! A human life is a human life, and I haven't lived to be fifty-five years old to be scared by newspaper powder. They are mostly blank cartridges."

"O, I know you of old! No matter whom you are dealing with always write yourself down as 'No. 2.' See here, my friend—for I am your friend, whether you are foolish or sensible—this man is not one of your kind. There isn't a sign of the disciple about him. We doctors see enough of the side of life the knots are on, to make us keen in these matters. He's a genteel 'tough'—that's what he is—and just off of a hard 'tear.' Don't set your heart upon nursing him into a sheep. He's an out-and-out goat. I don't say you're to put him into the street to-night, but I'll look in to-morrow with a hospital permit in my pocket, and an elastic conscience in my manly bosom."

"Did you ever behold a more obstinate countenance in your born days?" pointing to Mrs. Williams who was quietly setting the disordered room into its accustomed condition. "She's a respectable woman, with a professional reputation to maintain, and it really won't do for her to be housing stragglers in this promiscuous manner. She ought, in the first place, to have sent off post-haste for an ambulance and shipped him to the hospital."

"Or station-house," put in Mr. Stevens, smiling quietly. "There were probably none on the turnpike to Jericho, or the priest and Levite would have thought of one. The Royal Road I heard you speak of just now is lined with Houses of Mercy and Ready Reliefs, and so on. That comes of living in the nineteenth century, I suppose."

The doctor was not disconcerted.

"As to charity—real charity—I believe in it as truly as any man. But these words of supererogation are outside of my province—and comprehension. I dare affirm—for I know you and respect your principles—that five out of every ten cases of so-called distress you relieve, prove, when you come to look into them, to have been frauds, or at least, exaggerated for the purpose of working up your sympathies to the alms-point. There is a continual pull upon your nervous forces and purse-strings, and for what? To further pauperize paupers, to instruct designing scamps in hypocrisy and cunning, and deplete good men's pockets. Am I right?"

"Better that ninety-nine guilty men go free than that one innocent man should be punished," quoted Mr. Stevens. "My conscience is easier for not taking the chance against the innocent one. As to the unworthy whom I feed and clothe, believing that I am obeying the Master's precept to provide for the destitute—what follows the action performed in this spirit is none of my business. It is done unto God—not unto man."

Dr. Bacon shrugged his shoulders and spread out his hands.

"And it is none of my business, you might say, to dictate to whom you are to give and when and how. Only, I beg you to believe that I am sincerely interested in our excellent Mrs. Williams, and I don't fancy the contract she has on her hands just now."

He moved toward the bed. The conversation had been held in the sub-tones trained nurses understand (or ought to understand) how to use, audible only to the interlocutor and free from the sibilations that arouse a sleeper more readily than a loud call.

The man lay like one dead, but for his low, labored respiration, the ground swell after the storm. His face was livid, the cheeks had fallen in; his jaw hung loosely.

"Send for me should the pain return," said the doctor, in leaving his side. "Should you find him sinking, don't call me up. It would be over before I could get here. It is touch-and-go with him for the next few hours."

Mr. Stevens took his departure half an hour later. He had left a sick man in New York to whom he had meant to send Mrs. Williams. He must secure another nurse before he could go to his own home.

"I will look in upon you to-morrow forenoon," was his parting promise. "Keep up a brave heart, my sister—and may the Sleepless Eye watch you!"

He had made his call, and Dr. Bacon his, before the patient gave any sign that he knew where he was—or indeed that he was at all. It was then the recurrence of the horrible grip upon his chest that aroused him from the protracted stupor. The paroxysm was slighter and briefer than the former, and when it was relieved, he moved and spoke with comparative ease. Another long night of lethargic slumber succeeded, and the Sabbath day dawned brightly.

"Treacherous, but delicious," Dr. Bacon pronounced the weather. "Nice, while it lasts, and profitable to the profession when it is over. I wish you could get a mouthful of the outer air before the storm it is breeding comes."

For answer, she looked at him across the stranger's pillow.

"O, I suppose so!" he retorted, crossly. "I feel like shaking you, all the same!"

The patient seemed unobservant of the by-play, although he was rational and fully awake, replying coherently, and in well-chosen terms to the physician's questions as to his physical condition. He suffered little actual pain, he said, but there were moments of distressing prostration when his heart stopped beating for a moment, and resumed action with difficulty. He supposed that, with returning strength, this sensation would pass away. He thanked the doctor for his kindly attentions, and complimented him, briefly but courteously, upon his skill.

"I was more dangerously ill from the same cause in February. I am not alarmed as to the final result."

After the doctor had gone, Mrs. Williams was slightly confused by the unexpected query: "Why did he want to shake you?"

"Pshaw! you mustn't mind Dr. Bacon's nonsense. He and I have worked together so many years that he says pretty much whatever comes into his head. Will you take your broth now?"

He complied, said "Thank you!" as she laid his head again on the pillow, and was so still she would have believed him drowsy, but for the wide gaze of the eyes straight forward into vacancy.

"You and Dr. Bacon consider me extremely ill,—do you not?" he asked, at length, without apparent emotion. "You may be nearer right than I."

"Nobody can suffer as you do, without becoming seriously ill, sir. There's always more or less danger in such attacks. I am very thankful to see you so much easier."

"You do not say 'better,'" I observe! Why are you taking care of me?"

"You fell ill at my door at ten o'clock at night. What could a Christian woman do but see that you did not die there? Then, too, I am a professional nurse, and there seemed to be a providence in it."

In the next interval of silence between them, the church-bell began to chime for the morning service; that of the Jeremy Taylor Memorial sonorous and clear, because close at hand. Mrs. Williams's head was reverently inclined as the final toll sounded the call to worship in the sanctuary of her love; believing herself unnoticed by her lodger, she folded her hands and joined in spirit in the invocation which she knew was said at that minute over the congregation bowed in prayer.

THE BOOK SHELF

THE STORY OF ISSA.*

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, reference was made to the alleged discovery in a Thibetan monastery by Nicolas Notovitch, a Russian traveler, of a very ancient manuscript, in the Pali language, purporting to be a record of the life of "Saint Issa," whom the Thibetans identify with Jesus. The chief value of the record, if authentic, would be to show how the intervening years from Christ's childhood in Nazareth to the time of his entrance upon his ministry, were passed—a matter touching which the New Testament affords us little information. The document, though still regarded with doubt by the most distinguished Biblical scholars, is of such interest that we feel justified in presenting to our readers the extracts below:

"When Issa was thirteen, the age at which an Israelite is expected to marry,

"Then Issa secretly absented himself from his father's house; left Jerusalem, and, in a train of merchants, journeyed toward the Sindh.

"With the object of perfecting himself in the knowledge of the word of God and the study of the laws of the great Buddhas.

"In his fourteenth year, young Issa, the Blessed One, came this side of the Sindh and settled among the Aryas, in the country beloved by his God.

"The common people loved Issa, for he lived in peace with the Vaisyas and the Sudras, to whom he taught the Holy Scriptures.

"He declaimed strongly against man's arrogating to himself the authority to deprive his fellow-beings of their human and spiritual rights. 'Verily,' he said, 'God has made no difference between his children, who are all alike dear to him.'

"Issa denied the divine inspiration of the Vedas and the Puranas, for, as he taught his followers, 'One law has been given to man to guide him in his actions.'

"The white priests and the warriors, who had learned of Issa's discourse to the Sudras, resolved upon his death, and sent their servants to find the young teacher and slay him.

"But Issa, warned by the Sudras of his danger, left by night Djagguernat, gained the mountain, and settled in the country of the Gautamides.

"When the just Issa had acquired the Pali language, he applied himself to the study of the sacred scrolls of the Sutras.

"After six years of study, he left Nepaul and the Himalaya mountains, descended into the valley of Radjipoutan and directed his steps toward the West, everywhere preaching to the people the supreme perfection attainable by man;

"And the good he must do to his fellow-men, which is the sure means of speedy union with the eternal Spirit. 'He who has recovered his primitive purity,' said Issa, 'shall die with his transgressions forgiven and have the right to contemplate the majesty of God.'

"When the divine Issa traversed the territories of the Pagans, he taught that the adoration of visible gods was contrary to natural law. He said:

"The eternal Lawgiver is One; there are no other Gods than he; he has parted the world with none, nor had he any counselor.

"Even as a father shows kindness toward his children, so will God judge men after death, in conformity with his merciful laws. He will never humiliate his child by casting his soul for chastisement into the body of a beast.

"The heavenly laws,' said the Creator, through the mouth of Issa, 'are opposed to the immolation of human sacrifices to a statue or an animal; for I, the God, have sacrificed to man all the animals and all that the world contains.'

"The words of Issa spread among the Pagans, through whose country he passed, and the inhabitants abandoned their idols.

"Issa furthermore taught the Pagans that they should not endeavor to see the eternal Spirit with their eyes; but to perceive him with their hearts, and make themselves worthy of his favors by the purity of their souls.

"The countries round about were filled with the renown of Issa's preachings, and when he came into Persia, the priests grew afraid and forbade the people hearing him.

"Issa—whom the Creator had selected to recall to the worship of the true God, men sunk in sin—was twenty-nine years old when he arrived in the land of Israel.

"Since the departure therefrom of Issa, the Pagans had caused the Israelites to endure more atrocious sufferings than before, and they were filled with despair.

"Many among them had begun to neglect the laws of their God and those of Mossa (Moses), in the hope of winning the favor of their brutal conquerors.

"But Issa, notwithstanding their unhappy condition, exhorted his countrymen not to despair, because the day of their redemption from the yoke of sin was near, and he himself, by his example, confirmed their faith in the God of their fathers.

"Issa went from one city to another, strengthening by the word of God the courage of the Israelites, who were near to succumbing under their weight of woe, and thousands of people followed him to hear his teachings."

JESUS THE MAGNET.

Without coming in contact with Christ and receiving his Spirit, his drawing power, we will never influence others to do that which is right and good and holy. If we desire to have an influence for good in this world we must, first of all, come to Christ ourselves, and receive this drawing power from him. You have doubtless seen those who have become Christians, and after they have given their hearts to Christ they have immediately begun to draw others. They go out and invite others to come to church, they invite others to go with them to the prayer-meeting, to come with them to the Sunday School, and so in every way they seek to influence others and draw them to Christ.

When Jesus was upon the earth vast multitudes attended him. Where he went they followed. But now when Jesus is no longer bodily present upon the earth, when we cannot see him with our natural eyes, we speak of walking by faith, and you may be curious to know what is meant by walking by faith. I think that I can illustrate it in this way: Here is a sheet of writing paper. Now above the writing paper I will place this magnet, and then below it I will place this small bit of iron. The attracting power of the magnet holds the iron up against the paper. Now, when I move this magnet on the upper side of the sheet from place to place, you will observe that this little piece of iron on the lower side of the sheet goes in the same direction. It follows the magnet very closely. The paper is between them. Now, if this paper was enlarged so as to be as long and as broad as the ceiling of this room, of course you would not be able to see the magnet. But as you would move the magnet from place to place, the little iron below would continue to follow it.

So Jesus Christ is no longer visible; we cannot see him with our natural eyes, but he draws the Christian who is in this world, and so the Christian follows him.

Dr. Talmage Bids Good-bye.

He Starts on his Globe-Girdling Tour—Crossing the Continent—Some Reflections on Great Disasters—Church Fires and their Causes—A Word of Farewell.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 26, 1894.

AT half past nine o'clock, on the night of May 14th, 1894, I descended the front steps of my home in Brooklyn, New York. The sensation of leaving for a journey around the world is not all made up of bright anticipation. The miles to be traveled are so numerous, the seas to be crossed are so treacherous, the peradventures are so many, that the solemnities outnumber the expectations. My family accompany me to the railway train; will we all meet again? The climatic changes, the ships, the shoals, the hurricanes, the bridges, the cars, the epidemics, the possibilities, hinder any positiveness of prophecy. I come down the front steps of my home; will I ever again ascend them? The remarks made by Hon. Wm. M. Everts a few evenings before at the public Reception—on the conclusion of my twenty-fifth year of Brooklyn pastorate—though uttered in tactlessness, were consolatory. He said: "Dr. Talmage ought to realize that if he goes around the world, he will come out at the same place from which he started." May the God who holds the winds in one fist, and the ocean in the hollow of the other hand, protect us!

I leave home while the timbers of our destroyed church are still smoking. Three great churches have been consumed. Why this series of huge calamities, I know not. Had I not made all the arrangements for departure, and been assured by the Trustees of my church that they would take all the responsibilities upon themselves, I would have postponed my intended tour, or adjourned it forever; but all whom I have consulted tell me now is the time to go, and my face is toward the setting sun.

Six times before this have I crossed the American Continent, and I have seen the sun rise from the golden cradle of the Eastern sky and seen him buried beneath the pomp of the Western horizon. Three girths have been put around the American Continent; the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, and the Southern Pacific. All these girths have been tightened, and the buckles are moving ever and anon until the Continent is less and less in circumference. When I first crossed it, it took fully seven days. Instead of the elegant dining-cars of to-day, we stopped at restaurants with table-covers indescribable, for they had on them layers of other strata of breakfasts insulting in appearance. The first time I ever saw Judge Field, of the United States Supreme Court, was at one of these tables on the Rocky Mountains. Like myself, he had dismounted from the Union Pacific train. We sat opposite each other; the different courses of food were put upon the table, but his appetite and mine declined everything presented. Our eyes met, and we burst into a guffaw of laughter that was the introduction of a friendship that has been valuable to me ever since. A smile, as well as a tear, may open a chapter of hearty acquaintance-ship.

What is the meaning of the three fires? As I leave, people in many lands are discussing the question, for telegrams from across the Atlantic, as well as from many parts of this country, show that the fiery news had leaped every whither. Three vast structures dedicated to God, and the work of trying to make the world better, gone down, and all this within a few years. They were well built as to permanence and durability. All the talk about these buildings as mere fire-traps is the usual cant, for there is as much secular cant as religious cant. Have you heard in the last forty years of any church, or any hall, or any theatre which, after destruction, was not called a fire-trap? That charge always makes a lively opening for any description of a fire. There have been no better structures, secular or religious, put up in the last twenty-five years than the three Brooklyn Tabernacles, and the modes of egress from them so ample that the thousands of worshippers assembled in any of them could be put safely on the street inside of five minutes. The fact is that there is nothing in this world incombustible. When the great Chicago and Boston fires took place they burned up buildings and iron. The human race will go on building incombustible churches and incombustible banks and incombustible store-houses and incombustible cities, and then all will be consumed in the world's last fire.

Builders who had large experience and established reputation, pronounced the Brooklyn Tabernacles perfect structures. But what is the meaning of the three fires? There may be a hundred different lessons learned by a hundred different people, and legitimate lessons. As for myself, I adjourn the most of the meaning to the next world. We will learn there in two minutes more than we can find out here in fifty years. With that anticipation, mysteries do not often bother me.

One reason for these consecutive disasters may be that the patience of the best people in the world, the members of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, was to be perfected. "Purified by fire." Mighty discipline for one of the Lord's hosts. Whether I ever meet them on earth or not, it will be a theme of heavenly reminiscence. We shall talk it all over, the story of the three fires.

Another reason why the last church went down may have been that some of us were idolizing the building, and the Lord will not allow idolatry. The house was such a Midsummer Night's Dream of beauty. Enchantment lifted in galleries and sprung in arches, and glorified in the light that came through windows, touching it with their dearest fingers. The acoustics so rare that thousands of ears were in easy reach of common accentuation. An organ which was a lullabie set up in pipes and banked in keys, waiting for a musician's manipulation, that would lead the congregational song as an archangel might lead heaven. Glorious organ! When it died down into the ashes of that fire, perhaps its soul went up where Handel and Haydn began to play on it. The most superb audience room that I ever gazed on, or ever expect to see, until I enter the Temple of the Sun. On one memorial wall of that building, a stone which I had rolled down from Mt. Calvary, where our Lord died, and two tables of stone that were sawed off from Mt. Sinai, and brought on camels across the desert by my arrangement, and a part of Paul's pulpit, which the Queen of Greece allowed me, from Mars Hill. Architecture so chaste, so grand, so appropriate, so suggestive, so stupendous. One of the doxologies of Heaven alighted. Well, perhaps we thought too much of it. When we think too much of our children, the Lord takes them, and when we think too much of our church, the Lord summarily removes it.

I suppose another reason for the departure of that house was that it had done its work. Church building, like individuals, accomplish what they were built for and then go. One person lives ninety years, another forty years, another three years, and when God takes an individual, whether at ninety, or forty, or three years, his mission is ended. This last church stood three years, and any person who knows what multitudes have there assembled, and what transactions for eternity have there taken place, will admit that it was well to build it, even if we had known at the start that it would only last from 1891 to 1894.

Another reason why I think this last church went down was to keep me humble. The Lord had widened my work through Christendom, and with two receptions the week before the conflagration, the one a city reception presided over by our Mayor, and the other a National and International reception, presided over by one of the chief men of the nation, who had recently stepped from the presidential cabinet, and the occasion honored by addresses, and letters, and cablegrams from men of world-wide fame in church and state, and the whole scene brilliant beyond description, and in compliment to myself, who was brought up a farmer's boy; there was danger that I might become puffed up and my soul be weakened for future work. I did not yet feel any stirrings of that sort, and had only felt an humble gratitude for what had been said and done by friends transatlantic and cisatlantic, but I had ordered full reports of the meeting laid aside for future perusal, and I had engaged the fleetest stenographer I know of to take down every word, from the opening doxology of the first reception to the benediction of the last reception, and sometime, when less busy, I would take in all the eloquence and kindness and splendor of that memorable week. What might have been the result upon myself, I know not. I have seen upon others the withering effect of human praise. A cold chill of the world's neglect is no more destructive than the sunstroke from too much heat of popular approval. The disaster may have been needed, and it came so close upon the adulation, that it acted as an everlasting prevention. In the light of that awful blaze of that Sabbath in May, 1894, no self-sufficiency could stand a second.

Another reason for the fires, I think, is that somehow, and in a way that I know not, my opportunities are to widen. After each of the other fires, new doors were open. I prayerfully expect that such will be the sequence of the last conflagration.

Will the Brooklyn Tabernacle be re-built? I know not. What or when or where shall be my work, I cannot even guess, nor have I the least anxiety. Nothing but an inspired utterance of the Bible could bear such repetition as I have for the last twelve days given to the words of the Psalmist: "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice."

I have safely arrived on the Pacific Coast. A startling question was asked me just before I reached here. I was in deep slumber in a section of a sleeping car, when the curtain was pushed back, and a venerable lady seized hold of me and shrieked: "Who are you and what are you doing here?" It was a sudden calling of the roll of passengers, and I did not feel like answering to my name. The question was repeated in more earnestness and with louder voice. I could not at first understand why the interrogation as to my identity, but after gathering my senses together, I mildly suggested that perhaps she had mistaken my place for her own. This was no doubt the case, and she made a quick retreat. The fact is that the sections and berths of a sleeping car are very much alike. The new mode of hanging the number of the berth in large figures on the outside of the drapery of the sleeping place is a great improvement; but midnight perambulation, even under the best of circumstances, is more or less confusing. The mistake that the venerable lady made is a mistake that thousands of people make, for they think some one else has their place. Most of the struggle in the world is in trying to get some one else's berth. Better go back contented and take the place assigned you. In trying to get some one else's place, we may lose our own without getting his. I cannot jeer at the old lady's mistake, for that night on the Southern Pacific Railroad, I bethought myself that there are during every Presidential campaign at least 100,000 people trying to get the berths of the 100,000 present occupants.

Good-bye, my friends all over! On the other side of the world, I will think of those who have put me under obligation, and the first hour I have passed the latitude and longitude farthest away from home, and begin to return, I will count the weeks and days that stand between me and the lowest step of the front door, from which, on the evening of May 14th, I departed.

A Children's Paradise.

impossible for them to frolic out-doors. The Chapel across the way, is a neat substantial wooden structure, capable of seating two hundred persons. Just behind it and in the same building is a nice, roomy Dining-hall, where one hundred children can sit down simultaneously at table. Off the Dining-hall is a wing in which sixty boys are to sleep in thirty double beds. The beds are of iron, and each has a bolster and mattress of woven wire, over which is a double blanket and sheet, then another sheet and a double blanket above.

On the grounds at Mont Lawn, there is an abundance of fruit and shade trees. A large lawn affords an ample play-ground. The property affords a magnificent view of the Hudson River and the villages of Nyack and Tarrytown, the elevation being over 300 feet above sea level. It has been leased for the purposes of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home from Rev. A. D. Laurence Jewett, D.D., at the nominal rental of $30 per month. All the buildings have been comfortably furnished and every room will be utilized, not a niche being left unoccupied. It has been arranged that the children are to be brought from the city tenements and from the Sunday Schools belonging to the churches that co-operated with the Food Fund. Each relay or detachment of fifteen children will be assembled in room 98 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, New York, before being taken to the Home, and there examined by a physician. Those suffering from scalp diseases, affections of the eyes or ears, or any contagious or infectious maladies will be excluded. Those who pass the examination will be conveyed to the pier at the foot of West Tenth street, North River, and there transferred to the steamer "Chrystenah," in charge of a missionary, and taken to Nyack. A relay of fifteen children, boys and girls, will be taken up daily in the afternoon, starting at 4 p. m. and reaching their destination a little before 6 o'clock. Each returning relay of fifteen, having completed their ten days' stay at the Home, will be conveyed to the steamer dock at Nyack at 8 a. m. and will reach the Bible House about 10 a. m., where they will be safely restored to their parents or guardians. Every child, on leaving the Home, will receive some small souvenir to remind him of the pleasant days he has enjoyed. The first hundred to be sent to Mont Lawn will be exclusively Food Fund children, whose parents were helped during last winter. Fifteen hundred children will, during the summer, share the advantages thus afforded them through the liberality of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

At the Home, the stay of the children will be made a pleasant one. When the complement is full, there will be a happy family of sixty boys and sixty girls, all between the ages of six and twelve, and it is not improbable that an additional building may be secured sufficient to accommodate eighty more. One missionary is detailed to wait upon and care for every fifteen children. While the strictest discipline will be maintained, no effort will be spared to make the place as like a real home as possible, and to remove the idea of an institution. The dormitories are divided into large and small rooms, instead of being used as common sleeping halls, and the pretty white iron bedsteads and snowy spreads, with enough cosy little chairs for all, and the floors covered with soft Chinese matting, give them a neat and tasteful appearance.

Rising bell will ring at 7 o'clock and breakfast will be served at 8, preceded by a brief service in the chapel. The children, on leaving the chapel, will march to their places at table, and, while standing, will sing this little verse as their "grace" before the meal:

God is great and God is good,
And we thank Him for his food.
By His hand must all be fed,
Give us, Lord, our daily bread.

Wonderful Cures of Catarrh and Consumption by a New Discovery.

Wonderful cures of Lung Diseases, Catarrh Bronchitis and Consumption, are made by the new treatment known in Europe as the Andral-Proca Discovery. If you are a sufferer you should write to the New Medical Advance, 67 East 6th Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and they will send you this new treatment free for trial. State age and all particulars of your disease.

It is impossible to travel far with the man who rides with a hobby. But if you and your companion take Hood's Sarsaparilla you will have health and strength for long journeys.

This is repeated at each meal. For breakfast the bill of fare will be rice, hominy, oatmeal, cracked wheat, sugar, bread and butter, and as much milk as the children can drink. At twelve o'clock dinner, soup, meat, two vegetables, milk, bread and butter, and pudding will be served. Tea, or supper, at 5 p. m., will consist of some light dish, fruit, cake and milk. All the food will be of the best quality and served in sufficiently generous quantities to appease even the hungriest of the youngsters. Every week-day afternoon, when the weather permits, the children will be seated around the flag-staff on the lawn, with the Union flag flying above them, and taught to sing patriotic songs, "My Country, 'tis of Thee," "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "Hail Columbia," etc. It will be a pretty as well as a stirring sight to see those little ones, representing many different nationalities, joining in the tuneful praise of the great Republic that has given them shelter. Nor will the juvenile sports and pastimes of the children be forgotten, and whatever is necessary to their health and happiness during their stay at the Home will be supplied. It need hardly be added that the moral training of the children, brief as it must necessarily be, will be a prominent feature in the Home, and it is hoped the seeds of Christian kindness sown in those young hearts may bear much fruit hereafter.

The Children's Home will be opened on June 15, and when this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches our readers it will practically be in actual operation. It will be under the management of skilful and experienced mission workers, Miss Matilda Faulhaber, formerly in charge of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund Station, No. 13, being Superintendent, with a staff consisting of six missionaries and several assistants, nearly all of whom were actively connected with the Food Fund's work during the past winter. From time to time, as the work advances, accounts of its progress will appear in these columns. It is a work in which we feel that all our readers have a deep personal interest since it was, like its predecessor the Food Fund, the offspring of their Christian generosity and sympathy for the "Lord's Poor."

HERE KINGS FOUGHT AND FELL.

Ancient Ramoth-Gilead, as it Now Appears — Once a Fortified City of Refuge, the Spoil of Armies, now an almost Forgotten and Ruinous Village.

ENSCONCED on a slope of the mountain range known to the Arabs as Jebel Jilad (Mount Gilead), and in one of the most ruggedly picturesque parts of Palestine, lies the village of Es-Salt, which the leading Biblical scholars and explorers of the present day have identified with the ancient city of Ramoth-Gilead. Few cities have played a more important part in the history of Israel than this, which is shown in the accompanying illustration. Ramoth was allotted to the tribe of Levi, and occupied a central position in their territory. It was apparently a strong fortress, and there are even yet remains that point to the existence of ancient fortifications, such as might well surround a city which was considered the military key of the country. When Ramoth was captured by the Syrians, the kings of Israel and Judah both regarded the event as a national disaster and united their forces against the invader in a battle in which the Israelitish monarch sustained a mortal wound. (1. Kings 22: 34-37.) Josephus, the Jewish historian, relates with much detail, the circumstances of its recapture, years afterward, by the Israelites, and sacred chronicle tells of the subsequent struggle of Hazael, King of Syria, to regain it, of the wounding of King Joram and his retirement to Jezreel to be healed, leaving the renowned Captain Jehu in command of the forces. It was at Ramoth that Jehu was anointed King of Israel, II. Kings 9: 12, and from thence that doughty warrior set out on his divine commission to execute the vengeance of Jehovah on the house of Ahab.

After a series of wars, lasting over several reigns, and during which the city repeatedly exchanged masters, Ramoth seems to have disappeared from the stage of Jewish history. Possibly, like Jezreel, its numerous tragedies had made it no longer popular with the Jewish people and their rulers, or it may be that its demolition was effected in some of the last great campaigns in which it seems to have been the centre of military operations.

As its name (Ramoth, "heights"), implies, the city occupied a commanding position on the range of Gilead. It was at one time appointed a city of refuge, and from its lofty eminence must have been visible at a great distance. The ruins seen on the summit, are those of an ancient castle, with towers at the corners and a deep, rock-hewn moat surrounding it on all sides. Around the town itself are strong natural defenses in the shape of deep ravines and impassable cliffs. Numerous tombs and grottoes of great antiquity are found in these ravines.

On the neighboring slopes of the hills are famous vineyards that produce the finest raisins in Palestine, sweet and delicately flavored, which the inhabitants still produce in considerable quantities for the Jerusalem market. Small and insignificant as is the modern village, having less than three thousand inhabitants, it is still a place of remarkable strength, and its garrison, which is furnished by the Pasha of Damascus, keeps the plundering Bedouins of the district under comparative control. Only the walls and a part of the arch of the ancient fortress are standing and even now the antiquity of these ruins is somewhat doubtful, as some authorities hold that they are of Turkish and others of Saracenic origin, rather than Israelitish. Between the city and the river Jordan is a plateau where the battle was fought in which Ahab received his mortal wound. In no other part of that region could chariots have been used effectively.

ANOTHER CHANCE.

Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Eccles. 11: 3, "If the tree fall toward the south or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth there it shall be."

HERE is a hovering hope in the minds of a vast multitude that there will be an opportunity in the next world to correct the mistakes of this; that, if we do make complete shipwreck of our earthly life, it will be on a shore up which we may walk to a palace; that, as a defendant may lose his case in the Circuit Court, and carry it up to the Supreme Court or Court of Chancery and get a reversal of judgment in his behalf, all the costs being thrown over on the other party, so, if we fail in the earthly trial, we may in the higher jurisdiction of eternity have the judgment of the lower court set aside, all the costs remitted, and we may be victorious defendants forever. My object in this sermon is to show that common sense, as well as my text, declares that such an expectation is chimerical. You say that the impenitent man, having got into the next world and seeing the disaster, will, as a result of that disaster, turn, the pain the cause of his reformation. But you can find ten thousand instances in this world of men who have done wrong and distress overtook them suddenly. Did the distress heal them? No; they went right on.

That man was flung of dissipations. "You must stop drinking," said the doctor, "and quit the fast life you are leading, or it will destroy you." The patient suffers paroxysm after paroxysm; but, under skilful medical treatment, he begins to sit up, begins to walk about the room, begins to go to business. And, lo! he goes back to the same grog-shops for his morning dram, and his evening dram, and the drams between. Flat down again! Same doctor! Same physical anguish. Same medical warning. Now, the illness is more protracted; the liver is more stubborn, the stomach more irritable, and the digestive organs are more rebellious. But after awhile he is out again, goes back to the same dram-shops, and goes the same round of sacrilege against his physical health.

He sees that his downward course is ruining his household, that his life is a perpetual perjury against his marriage vow, that that broken-hearted woman is so unlike the roseate young wife whom he married, that her old school-mates do not recognize her; that his sons are to be taunted for a life-time by the father's drunkenness, that the daughters are to pass into life under the scarification of a disreputable ancestor. He is drinking up their happiness, their prospects for this life, and, perhaps, for the life to come. Sometimes an appreciation of what he is doing comes upon him. His nervous system is all a-tangle. From crown of head to sole of foot he is one aching, rasping, crucifying, damning torture. Where is he? In hell on earth. Does it reform him?

After awhile he has delirium tremens, with a whole jungle of hissing reptiles let out on his pillow, and his screams horrify the neighbors as he dashes out of his bed, crying: "Take these things off me!" As he sits pale and convalescent, the doctor says: "Now I want to have a plain talk with you, my dear fellow. The next attack of this kind you have, you will be beyond all medical skill, and you will die." He gets better and goes forth into the same round again. This time medicine takes no effect. Consultation of physicians agree in saying there is no hope. Death ends the scene.

That process of inebriation, warning, and dissolution is going on within stone's throw of you, going on in all the neighborhoods of Christendom. Pain does not correct. Suffering does not reform. What is true in one sense is true in all senses, and will forever be so, and yet men are expecting in the next world purgatorial rejuvenation. Take up the printed reports of the prisons of the United States, and you will find that the vast majority of the incarcerated have been there before, some of them four, five, six times. With a million illustrations all working the other way in this world, people are expecting that distress in the next state will be salvatory. You cannot imagine any worse torture in any other world than that which some men have suffered here, and without any salutary consequence.

Furthermore, the prospect of a reformation in the next world is more improbable than a reformation here. In this world the life started with innocence of infancy. In the case supposed, the other life will open with all the accumulated bad habits of many years upon him. Surely, it is easier to build a strong ship out of new timber than out of an old hulk that has been ground up in the breakers. If with innocence to start with in this life a man does not become godly, what prospect is there that in the next world, starting with sin, there would be a seraph evolved? Surely the sculptor has more prospect of making a fine statue out of a block of pure white Parian marble than out of an old black rock seamed and cracked with the storms of a half century. Surely upon a clean, white sheet of paper it is easier to write a deed or a will, than upon a sheet of paper all scribbled and blotted and torn from top to bottom. Yet men seem to think that, though the life that began here comparatively perfect turned out badly, the next life will succeed, though it starts with a dead failure.

"But," says some one, "I think we ought to have a chance in the next life, because this life is so short it allows only small opportunity. We hardly have time to turn around between cradle and tomb, the wood of the one almost touching the marble of the other." But do you know what made the ancient deluge a necessity? It was the longevity of the antediluvians. They were worse in the second century of their life-time than in the first hundred years, and still worse in the third century, and still worse all the way on to seven, eight, and nine hundred years, and the earth had to be washed, and scrubbed, and soaked, and anchored clear out of sight for more than a month before it could be made fit for decent people to live in. Longevity never cures impenitency. All the pictures of Time represent him with a scythe to cut, but I never saw any picture of Time with a case of medicines to heal. Seneca says that Nero for the first five years of his public life was set up for an example of clemency and kindness, but his path all the way descended until at sixty-eight he became a suicide. If eight hundred years did not make antediluvians any better, but only made them worse, the ages of eternity could have no effect except prolongation of depravity.

"But," says some one, "in the future state, evil surroundings will be withdrawn and elevated influences substituted, and hence expurgation, and sublimation, and glorification." But the righteous, all their sins forgiven, have passed on into a beatific state, and consequently the unsaved will be left alone. It cannot be expected that Doctor Duff, who exhausted himself in teaching Hindoos the way to heaven, and Doctor Abeel, who gave his life in the evangelization of China, and Adoniram Judson, who toiled for the redemption of Borneo, should be sent down by some celestial missionary society to educate those who wasted all their earthly existence. Evangelistic and missionary efforts are ended. The entire kingdom of the morally bankrupt by themselves, where are the salvatory influences to come from? Can one speckled and bad apple in a barrel of diseased apples turn the other apples good? Can those who are themselves down help others up? Can those who have themselves failed in the business of the soul pay the debts of their spiritual insolvents? Can a million wrongs make one right?

Poneropolis was a city where King Philip of Thracia put all the bad people of his kingdom. If any man had opened a primary school at Poneropolis, I do not think the parents from other cities would have sent their children there. Instead of amendment in the other world, all the associations, now that the good are evolved, will be degenerating and down. You would not want to send a man to a cholera or yellow fever hospital for his health; and the great lazaretto of the next world, containing the diseased and plague-struck, will be a poor place for moral recovery. If the surroundings in this world were crowded of temptation, the surroundings of the next world, after the righteous have passed up and on, will be a thousand per cent. more crowded of temptation.

The Count of Chateaubriand made his little son sleep at night at the top of a castle turret, where the winds howled and where spectres were said to haunt the place; and while the mother and sisters almost died with fright, the son tells us that the process gave him nerves that could not tremble and a courage that never faltered. But I don't think that towers of darkness and the spectral world swept by sirocco and euroclydon will ever fit one for the land of eternal sunshine. I wonder what is the curriculum of that college of Inferno, where, after proper preparation by the sins of this life, the candidate enters, passing on from freshman class of depravity to sophomore of abandonment, and from sophomore to junior, and from junior to senior, and day of graduation comes, and with diploma signed by Satan, the president, and other professorial demoniacs, attesting that the candidate has been long enough under their drill, he passes up to enter heaven! Pandemonium a preparative course for heavenly admission! Ah, my friends, Satan and his cohorts have fitted uncounted multitudes for ruin, but never fitted one soul for happiness.

Furthermore, it would not be safe for this world if men had another chance in the next. If it had been announced that, however wickedly a man might act in this world, he could fix it up all right in the next, society would be terribly demoralized, and the human race demolished in a few years. The fear that, if we are bad and unforgiven here, it will not be well for us in the next existence, is the chief influence that keeps civilization from rushing back to semi-barbarism, and semi-barbarism from rushing into midnight savagery, and midnight savagery from extinction; for it is the astringent impression of all nations, Christian and heathen, that there is no future chance for those who have wasted this.

Multitudes of men who are kept within bounds would say, "Go to, now! Let me get all out of this life there is in it. Come, gluttony, and inebriation, and uncleanness, and revenge, and all sensualities, and wait upon me! My life may be somewhat shortened in this world by dissoluteness, but that will only make heavenly indulgence on a larger scale the sooner possible. I will overtake the saints at last, and will enter the Heavenly Temple only a little later than those who behaved themselves here. I will on my way to heaven take a little wider excursion than those who were on earth pious, and I shall go to heaven via Gehenna and via Sheol." Another chance in the next world means free license and wild abandonment in this.

Suppose you were a party in an important case at law, and you knew from consultation with judges and attorneys that it would be tried twice, and the first trial would be of little importance, but that the second would decide everything; for which trial would you make the most preparation, for which retain the ablest attorneys, for which be most anxious about the attendance of witnesses? You would put all the stress upon the second trial, all the anxiety, all the expenditure, saying, "The first is nothing, the last is everything." Give the race assurance of a second and more important trial in the subsequent life, and all the preparation for eternity would be "post-mortem," post-funeral, post-sepulchral, and the world with one jerk be pitched off into impiety and godlessness.

Furthermore, let me ask why a chance should be given in the next world if we have refused innumerable chances in this? Suppose you give a banquet, and you invite a vast number of friends, but one man declines to come, or treats your invitation with indifference. You in the course of twenty years give twenty banquets, and the same man is invited to them all, and treats them all in the same obnoxious way. After awhile you remove to another house, larger and better, and you again invite your friends, but send no invitation to the man who declined or neglected the other invitations. Are you to blame? Has he a right to expect to be invited after all the indignities he has done you? God in this world has invited us all to the banquet of his grace. He invited us by his Providence and his Spirit three hundred and sixty-five days of every year since we knew our right hand from our left. If we declined it every time, or treated the invitation with indifference, and gave twenty or forty or fifty years of indignity on our part toward the Banqueter, and at last he spreads the banquet in a more luxurious and kingly place, amid the heavenly gardens, have we a right to expect him to invite us again, and have we a right to blame him if he does not invite us?

If twelve gates of salvation stood open twenty years or fifty years for our admission, and at the end of that time they are closed, can we complain of it and say: "These gates ought to be open again. Give us another chance?" It the steamer is to sail for Hamburg, and we want to get to Germany by that line, and we read in every evening and every morning newspaper that it will sail on a certain day, for two weeks we have that advertisement before our eyes, and then we go down to the docks fifteen minutes after it has shoved off into the stream and say: "Come back. Give me another chance. It is not fair to treat me in this way. Swing up to the dock again, and throw out planks, and let me come on board." Such behavior would invite arrest as a madman.

And if, after the Gospel ship has lain at anchor before our eyes for years and years, and all the benign voices of earth and heaven have urged us to get on board, as she might sail away at any moment, and after awhile she sails without us, is it common sense to expect her to come back? You might as well go out on the Highlands at Neversink and call to the "Majestic" after she has been three days out, and expect her to return, as to call back an opportunity for heaven when it once has sped away. All heaven offered us as a gratuity, and for a life-time we refuse to take it, and then rush on the bosses of Jehovah's buckler demanding another chance. There ought to be, there can be, there will be no such thing as posthumous opportunity. Thus, our common-sense agrees with my text — "If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be."

You see that this idea lifts this world up from an unimportant way-station to a platform of stupendous issues, and makes all eternity whirl around this hour. But one trial for which all the preparation must be made in this world, or never made at all. That piles up all the emphases and all the climax and all the destinies into life here. No other chance! Oh, how that augments the value and the importance of this chance!

Alexander with his army used to surround a city, and then would lift a great light in token to the people that, if they surrendered before that light went out, all would be well; but if once the light went out, then the battering-rams would swing against the wall, and demolition and disaster would follow. Well, all we need do for our present and everlasting safety is to make surrender to Christ, the King and Conqueror — surrender of our hearts, surrender of our lives, surrender of everything. And he keeps a great light burning, light of Gospel invitation, light kindled with the wood of the Cross and flaming up against the dark night of our sin and sorrow. Surrender while that great light continues to burn, for after it goes out there will be no other opportunity of making peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Talk of another chance! Why, this is a supernatural chance!

In the time of Edward the Sixth, at the battle of Musselburgh, a private soldier, seeing that the Earl of Huntley had lost his helmet, took off his own helmet and put it upon the head of the earl; and the head of the private soldier uncovered, he was soon slain, while his commander rode safely out of the battle. But in our case, instead of a private soldier offering helmet to an earl, it is a King putting his crown upon an unworthy subject, the King dying that we might live. Tell it to all points of the compass. Tell it to night and day. Tell it to all earth and heaven. Tell it to all centuries, all ages, all millenniums, that we have such a magnificent chance in this world that we need no other chance in the next.

I am in the burnished Judgment Hall of the Last Day. A great white throne is lifted, but the Judge has not yet taken it. While we are waiting for his arrival, I hear immortal spirits in conversation. "What are you waiting here for?" says a soul that went up from Madagascar to a soul that ascended from America. The latter says: "I came from America, where forty years I heard the Gospel preached, and Bible read, and from the prayer that I learned in Infancy at my mother's knee until my last hour I had Gospel advantage, but, for some reason, I did not make the Christian choice, and I am here waiting for the Judge to give me a new trial and another chance." "Strange!" says the other; "I had but one Gospel call in Madagascar, and I accepted it, and I do not need another chance."

Now the ground trembles with the approaching chariot. "Stand back!" cry the celestial ushers. "Stand back, and let the Judge of quick and dead pass through!" He takes the throne, and looking over the throng of nations, he says: "Come to judgment, the last judgment, the only judgment!" By one flash from the throne all the history of each one flames forth to the vision of himself and all others. "Divide!" says the Judge to the assembly.

And now the immortals separate, rushing this way and that, and after awhile there is a great aisle between them, and the Judge, turning to the throng on one side, says: "He that is righteous, let him be righteous still," and then, turning toward the throng on the opposite side, he says: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still, and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still." And then I hear something jar with a great sound. It is the closing of the Book of Judgment. The high court of eternity is adjourned forever.

Dr. Hall's Perils in Korea.

Maltreated, Threatened, and his Helpers Beaten and Persecuted while he Heals the Sick and Preaches the Gospel.

OMINOUS news comes from Korea, the populous peninsula of Eastern China. The king of that country has notified our Government that a rebellion has broken out, that he finds it difficult to suppress. It is directed chiefly against his policy of admitting foreigners to the empire, which, until very recent times, was so jealously guarded from their entrance as to have earned the name of "The Hermit Kingdom." The rebels are apparently more embittered against foreigners than against the government, and the king fears for their lives. He urges the Washington Government to send a United States vessel to Korea at once so that American citizens may have a refuge in case of attack. The news excites apprehension as to the safety of the missionaries, one of whom, Dr. W. J. Hall, has frequently communicated with our readers through these columns. We have just received a letter from him, written, of course, some months before the outbreak which the king reports by cable, and it shows, unhappily, that at the time it was written Dr. Hall had already been made aware of the hostility of the people. He writes:

On the 10th of January I again left Seoul for my work in the north, Pyeng Yang. Mr. McKenzie, from Nova Scotia, accompanied me. God has given him a wonderful experience. He felt that God called him to Korea, and although his mission board did not feel able to start a mission here he trusted the Lord to supply the necessary funds for his outcoming and our service, and a deep interest appeared to be manifested by a good number. Everything was moving on smoothly and all opposition had ceased. But on the morning of February 17, several of the leading men of the district came in and said they had been accustomed to receive 1500 cash ($2.50) from this house every year to sacrifice to the evil spirits, and they wanted me to give the same amount. I told them of the sin they were committing in worshipping evil spirits instead of the true and living God. Shortly afterward my helper, a young man of twenty years but an earnest Christian was sent for by a man who lived near our home. He went and returned shortly afterward with torn clothes and told me they had seized and beaten him because we would not give the money for sacrifice. They gathered the people of the neighborhood together and decided to drive us out. I went to the magistrate and told him the whole story, and asked him not to punish the men but to quiet the disturbance which he promised to do. While I was gone the same man who had beaten my helper came to the house and seized a boy of eighteen years, who had been attending our services, tore his clothes and beat him severely. I shall never forget his testimony which he gave on my return. He was cheerful and happy, and showed no spirit of resentment. I asked him if he felt like giving up serving Christ when he was so sorely persecuted. A smile lighted up his countenance as he said, "I cannot give up serving my King, even if they kill me." Oh, friends in the home-land who can serve God under your own vine and fig-tree with none daring to molest or make you afraid, pray for those who are not so favorably situated. Some like Peter have denied their Lord. Others like Paul, are braving every ing up to me, was in the act of throwing it at me, when God stayed his hand, and the other men let go of me and I walked away. They stood and shouted after me for some time and then followed me for about a mile, shouting at the top of their voices. This and even far worse treatment our Christians have to endure when they refuse to drink liquor.

Late one Saturday night two of the native Presbyterian brethren came in and said there was a great deal of talk all over the city, and that the people said they would kill the Christians and the foreigners. They seemed much alarmed, and wanted us to secure protection for them. They thought of twenty-eight years ago when 4,000 Roman Catholics were beheaded for their faith. They said they would die, but they would not give up Jesus. We told them that God was stronger than all they who could be against us, and he would suffer no harm to befall us unless it was for our good and God's glory. As we were being persecuted, we talked together of Paul's experience, and God filled our hearts with joy and peace. We were ready to die for Jesus if he required it. We received great blessing from God's Word as we turned to the passages that then applied to our case. The following Sunday morning at our regular services we baptized two men who had given good evidence of saving faith in Christ. We are laying our foundation stones in the midst of persecution, and we believe they will be solid.

We have commenced the first Christian school in the interior of Korea, with a class of thirteen bright boys. We teach them the doctrines of Christianity, Chinese and the native language. We can win the children for Christ. I want the boys and girls to help me. Pray for them. Collect all the picture cards you can of all kinds, and I will paste a text of Scripture on the back of the cards and give them to the Korean boys and girls for you. In this way you can help to lead the Korean children to Jesus. Send them postpaid by mail [the rate is one cent for two ounces] to

"SONGS IN THE NIGHT."

SONGS in the night! songs in the night! when sleep Refuses oft the boon of rest to send, Solace of song doth o'er the spirit bend, And beauties new unfold, when shadows deep Shut out the light of day, and vigils keep; Then to the weary soul shall far transcend The songs of night to those of day, and lend A calm to pain, and cool the eyes that weep. Songs in the night! songs in the night! oh come support after teaching here. God always honors the faith of his children. We had blessed seasons of communion with God on the journey. I was only one day out when I was called to see a patient who had been badly cut and stabbed by robbers. I dressed the wounds and told the story of the Great Physician. The man's comrade had been so badly stabbed that he only lived a few minutes afterward. After seven days' journey I reached Pyeng Yang, and went at once to one of the houses which had been purchased for our use, but which on account of the opposition of the Governor we were unable to occupy for several months. It had been used as a home for dancing girls, and was still being used for the same purpose. After some difficulty they consented to give up the house. The following two nights the house was vigorously stoned by a band of men who had been accustomed to spend their evenings there, but had now been defeated in their evil purposes.

And linger oft by every couch of pain; In life or death the victory impart: If here they wait or speed to heavenly home, In either case in Christ 'tis only gain, Who satisfieth every longing heart.

Every day we saw our patients and had a great many visitors who all heard the story of salvation. Every night we held storm and allowing nothing to separate them from Christ. The following week our persecutors threatened those who came to our meetings. The numbers decreased. We held our service every night, and before the regular service held a Children's Meeting, at which fifteen bright boys attended. One boy who learned the catechism, was beaten by one of our persecutors and forbidden to come to the meeting. But praise God this cannot beat out the truth from their hearts and minds. It will yet yield a rich harvest. Dr. Scranton, our superintendent, was with us for two weeks and proved a great blessing to the work.

I had considerable difficulty with some under the influence of liquor. It is distilled by the natives, and is the same curse here as in the home-land. One afternoon after I had treated my patients, I took my usual walk. As I ascended a hill, three men were sitting in the pathway with a jug of liquor. After I had passed them, they followed me and asked me to drink. I told them I never drank liquor. They then seized me and dragged me to the place where the jug was

THE BIRTH OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for July 1. Luke 2: 1-16. Golden Text, Luke 2: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HOW incomprehensible are the ways of God to the mind of finite man, who sees no further than the circumference of this one small planet, and who often sees only within the small area of his own surroundings and experiences! "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour." Men would have imagined that so stupendous an event as God coming down to earth and dwelling among men, should be heralded with everything to make it impressive, and to draw the attention of the population of the whole world to it. But "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways saith the Lord," heaven-high above the earth are God's ways and God's thoughts. God had given his Word to man as the revelation of himself. Some there were who took heed to his Word and knew through the Scriptures that the coming of the Messiah was at hand. But the majority of mankind cared nothing for the coming of a Saviour, they lived for themselves, God was not in all their thoughts. The time of the birth of Jesus was drawing near, it had been foretold; the Scriptures which spoke of it, had been duly read in the synagogues, not only in Judea, but also in all the Jewish colonies, in the many parts of the world where Jewish merchants had established themselves; yet Israel did not know; God's people did not consider the glorious thing which was about to happen.

The World was Astir

with other matters. Cæsar, the world's conqueror and emperor, instituted a census, by which he might gratify his pride by the knowledge of how many were the people he reigned over. All were to be enrolled, and in a manner very burdensome, entailing no little trouble and expense, "all went to enroll themselves, everyone to his own city." How little did the Roman Emperor know that in giving the order for this universal census, he should serve the purpose of God to prove that the mother of the Messiah was the direct descendant of David, and that Joseph, to whom she had been betrothed, (R.V.), was, by another line, also of the lineage of David. How little did he know that he was the instrument of God in the fulfilment of the Scriptures, that Christ should be born in Bethlehem! "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little amongst the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto Me that is to be Ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." But so it was, for while they were there by the order of the Emperor, Jesus was born of Mary by the order of God the Father.

Mary knew by the Word of the Lord through Gabriel, that her Babe should be the Son of the Highest; Joseph knew it, too, but in Cæsar's palace, in Rome, in the palace of the high priest in Jerusalem, in Herod's palace, in the royal courts of the kings of this world who was there that knew anything of that, which for the first time since the fall of man, drew heaven and earth near together; who was there that knew that the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us? "He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not, he came unto his own and his own received him not." Even in the very inn, Jesus was pushed into a corner, and born in a stable, "because there was no room for him in the inn." The Maker of the world was only tolerated in the world which he had made, he received no welcome, he was appreciated by scarcely any. Have we taken in that "manner of love" by which we are called children of God; and have we taken in that as he is, so are we in this world," and that therefore "the world knoweth us not," apprecieth us not, because it knew him not." Have we so understood, as never to marvel that we should be treated as he was treated, and that, we his followers should have the last place and the least? Room for every one but Jesus! Room for every one but us! Have we ceased to have within us the least movement of indignation if we are neglected, and put on one side, because we have the privilege of fellowship with his sufferings? There were in the country around Bethlehem shepherds by occupation, as David, the son of Jesse had been before them. Perhaps they, too, in their own way, had been looking for the coming of Messiah. When Jesus comes again it will be unto them that look for him," or wait for him. He forces himself on none. All Jerusalem and all Bethlehem might have known about the birth of the Saviour, had they studied the Scriptures and watched for his appearing, but the farm, the merchandise, the married wife, the buying and selling, the planting and building, the eating and drinking, the learning, the honors and the cares of this world, took first place, and filled all their thoughts, and they left to the very few the study of the Word of God. But those few "enquired and searched diligently . . . searching what and what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." Who knows but that these simple shepherds were more acquainted with the real meaning of the Scriptures, read in the synagogues, than the Levites, whose business it was to explain them? Who knows whether they had not laid to heart what was only head knowledge to their teachers?

Unexpectedly, heaven opened upon the shepherd men: the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid. But their ears as well as their eyes were opened heavenwards, and the Angel could say to ears which heard: "Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ, the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the Babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." It was enough to overwhelm the shepherds that such an announcement should be made and made to them. How should they understand it, how believe that they of all people should be made the recipients of such a communication? Surely it would be made to those who were of more importance than such as they! Would it not be presumption for them to believe that God could entrust them with such tidings? Before they had time to think even such thoughts," suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying: "Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men," or "on earth peace among men of good pleasure."

What a revelation to the shepherds! If on earth God could find so few to pay attention to the great things which had happened, that he must needs commit the knowledge of it to the poor and ignorant shepherds, it was quite another thing in heaven.

All Heaven was Moved with that which moved earth so little, and yet that on which the eternal destinies of man hung. Reason almost reels before the thought of the awful, terrible, indifference of men to the things of God and to their own destiny! Bethlehem was asleep, Jerusalem was asleep, but in a yet deeper sleep were the religionists of the day who studied the Scriptures without watching for the Messiah, only equalled by the religionists of our own day, who are, many of them, more occupied in building fine churches and training an attractive choir to please the sense of man, than in being found ready when the Lord shall come! and our God is driven to find witnesses to his coming among the few, often poor and ignorant; among the most despised of his followers, whom "the world knoweth not," but who in heart and in fact have left all to follow him. These are they to whom, money, position, self-gratification, honor, comfort, and all which earth can give, have ceased to be an object; all they want is to be ready when their Lord shall come, and to be faithful in the post where he has placed them until he come. The shepherds must have been prepared men; the message sent them was on divine lines. God first—"Glory to God in the highest," and they understood it.

"NO ROOM IN THE INN."

THE time of our Lord's birth appears to have been fully four years before the beginning of the Christian Era. The error in fixing the date of the Era was made about five centuries afterwards, when the custom of dating the years from the birth of Christ became general. There are many reasons for so fixing the date of his birth. The chief is that Herod, who slew the children, hoping to kill Jesus, died in April of 4 B. C. This fact we know from secular history. It is probable that Christ's birth took place in December, although shepherds would not be in the field at night in that month. The sheep referred to were perhaps the Passover lambs which were required to be kept out of doors for some months prior to their being killed for the feast. The men who watched them were not ordinary shepherds, but men especially appointed, whose station was on "Migdal Eder," the Tower of the Flock. Edersheim says that the Jews had a very ancient tradition that the advent of the Messiah would be first observed from Migdal Eder. The place of his birth was Bethlehem, where David was born, where Boaz lived and Ruth gleaned. It was a singular combination of circumstances that brought about this fulfilment of the prophecy of Micah 5: 2. Mary and Joseph did not live there, but at Nazareth, fifty miles away. How, then, in those days of infrequent journeys was Mary likely to be brought to Bethlehem at that time? God has ways unknown to man for bringing about his purposes. Augustus Cæsar in Rome ordered a census of the whole Roman Empire for taxing purposes. The order would be obnoxious in Judæa, as Herod very well knew. With ready tact he contrived to associate with it a mark of respect for Jewish traditions. The people were not to be enrolled in the towns where they lived, as they were in other parts of the Roman Empire, but according to the ancient families to which they belonged. For that purpose they must go to the family-seat to register. Thus Joseph, and doubtless Mary, being of the house of David, must go to Bethlehem, and there the Christ was born, as had been predicted. David's descendants being numerous, the little town was crowded, and Joseph and Mary were glad to accept the shelter of the cave at the back of the inn. Thompson says that such accommodation is still common in Palestine. It is not unusual to see two sides of the room fitted with mangers made of wood and fashioned like a kneading trough, out of which in winter the cattle eat, while in the other part of the room, the floor of which is elevated about two feet, live the farmer and his family. The mangers, when cleaned up, would do very well to lay a baby in.

No room for them in the inn. We are disposed to blame those who had secured accommodation that none of them gave up his place for a mother and babe. But are not many acting now with similar indifference? When Christ is knocking at the door of the heart, does he not often find that it is so full of business, or love of pleasure, or sin, that there is no room for him. A traveler on the Congo states that he has seen huts so full of idols, that no room is left for the family.

Unto you is born . . . a Saviour. Such tidings, the angels, who know more about the joy of being saved and the agony of being lost than we do, described as tidings of great joy. But this Saviour would win salvation for his people at great cost to himself. Even lower types of salvation are often purchased by the sacrifice of the saviour. Years ago a striking incident is said to have occurred in Paris. In a back street of that city a fire broke out at night. It was in a narrow court, and the houses were built with the upper stories overhanging, so that the top stories almost touched. In the middle of the night, a father sleeping with his small children was suddenly awakened by the smoke. In a moment he jumped out of bed, swept away the framework of his window, and the next moment was safe across through the window of the opposite house. But he had forgotten the children. When he saw their terrified faces, without a moment's hesitation he placed his foot against the sill of the house where he was, launched his body forward and grasped the window of the burning house, thus making himself a living bridge between the two. One by one his children crawled over his body to the other side, but as the last one was passing, the father cried, "Quick, quick, I can't hold much longer." No sooner did the cheers of the crowd announce that the last child was over, than the father's hold relaxed, and he fell to the pavement and was taken up dead, an illustration of the work of Him who bridged the chasm for the race at the cost of his life.

One of the early Moravian missionaries to the Esquimaux found that their language had no literal equivalent for the word, Saviour. He says, "I could not find out that they had any direct notion of such a divine Friend. But I said to them, 'Does it not happen sometimes, when you are out fishing, that a storm arises and some of you are lost and some saved?' They said, 'Oh, yes, very often.' 'But,' I asked again, 'does it ever happen that you are in the water, and owe your safety to some brother or friend who stretches out his hand to help you?' 'Very frequently.' 'Then what do call that friend?' They gave me in answer a word in their language, and I immediately wrote it against the word, Saviour, in the Bible and ever afterward the idea was clear and intelligible to all of them."

To all people. A long tubular bridge crosses the Menai Straits between Carnarvon in Wales and the island of Anglesea. Heavy trains run through this bridge and observations have been made as to the depression they cause in the structure. It has been found that the departure from the horizontal line of the bridge under the weight of a train is smaller than is the departure caused by one single hour's sunshine. The silent shining of the sun has more power over the gigantic metal girders than the weight of the heavy clattering train. So it has been with the Gospel. Whatever the character of the people to whom it has been sent, whether cultured or savage, the quiet, loving influence has exerted more power over them than a display of force.

Ye shall find the babe. There are some who in early life reject Christ, and in their later years regret what they have done, and seek him. The story is told of a man in Tahiti, when it was still a heathen land, who was away on a journey in the mountains when a child was born to him. On his return he was told that as it was only a girl baby it had been buried alive. He went at once to the place and found that a hole had been dug and half filled with leaves. The child had been laid on the leaves and covered with a board on which the earth was heaped. He lifted out the baby, and finding it still alive, conveyed it secretly to the isle of Eimeo, about seventy miles away, where it was brought up. He did not dare tell his wife and her family what he had done, but before he died he told the foster mother of the child. After the advent of Christianity the mother became a Christian, and often grieved over what had been done to her little girl babe. One day she spoke of it at a Christian meeting, and her voice, broken with tears, failed her as she lamented that the new religion did not come earlier, so that she might have kept her child. At the close of the meeting the foster mother, leading a blooming girl by the hand, went to her and gave the child to her mother.

Moody's Trumpet Call for God's People to Aid in the Greatest of all Missionary Fields—The Chicago Bible Institute and Its Urgent and Immediate Needs—An Opportunity for All to Aid this Marvelous Work for Christ.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites the co-operation of its readers and their friends in this grand Gospel crusade. In the past, they have been distinguished by their generous and sympathetic response to the cry of human suffering. The present appeal is of infinitely greater importance than any other that could be made. We confidently leave it in their hands, believing that they will be led to appreciate the full significance of such a letter from one who is recognized as the foremost living exponent of the Gospel methods employed by the apostles and evangelists themselves—a true and fearless servant of Jesus Christ!

Mr. Moody's career has been one of sacrifice. To the unalterable purpose of spreading the Gospel he long ago consecrated all his energies and activities, and upon this altar he has uncomplainingly laid down all the personal ambitions and worldly allurements that invariably tempt men of brilliant abilities. Attractive offers, holding out the promise of lucrative income and a certain fame, were unhesitatingly set aside. It was the desire of his heart to become an apostle of Christ to the unevangelized masses at home—those millions who, living in a Christian land, were yet outside the pale of the Church and debarred from entering by social conditions they could not change

Nor has Mr. Moody been unmindful of the Gospel needs of foreign lands. But, while "the field is the world," the centres of greatest activity are among those who have aptly been described as "the home heathen." Former students of the Bible Institute are to be found in a multitude of responsible positions where Christian abilities

Moody believes that the Gospel of Jesus should be sung as well as preached, and all the students are taught both vocal and instrumental music, sometimes not less than

DWIGHT L. MOODY, THE EVANGELIST.

500, representing many different denominations, but all brothers and sisters in Christ, being in a single vocal class. Mrs. S. B. Capron, who was a missionary in India for thirty years, superintends the Women Students' Department, and has a corps of assistants whose experience, ability and kindness never fail to win the love and admiration of the students. Taken as a whole, the Chicago Institute on LaSalle Avenue, is one of the grandest agencies ever organized for bringing the Gospel home to the hearts and lives of those who have no opportunities of hearing it through other channels. In Mr. Moody's own words: "It is a school where the Bible is studied under competent teachers and where training is given in all kinds of Christian work, each student being required to do daily personal service in missions, tents, homes and elsewhere, to fit him or her for wider service hereafter."

Especially does the training qualify them for effort among non-church going families. If the mother can be reached in the home, her heart touched and her spiritual nature quickened, then she in turn becomes the teacher, and so the Gospel seed is multiplied in the family.

Mr. Moody's whole work has been one of faith up to the present time, and his firm reliance upon the Divine approval and support has never been shaken. He believes that even now, with the arrival of a more serious exigency than the Institute has ever known, it will not be permitted to languish, but that the great spiritual harvest-field of our churchless millions will be reaped by faithful and skilled laborers, whom the Lord will raise up, through touching the hearts of his people. "God loves to be helped," and happy the one who is such a helper, whether by word, or deed, or gift, or prayer. There could be no better or more direct help in this work at the present time, than a contribution to the Gospel Fund for enabling the Bible Institute to go forward in the training of these young men and women. The general depression in trade threatens to greatly impair its usefulness, and unless Christian people come to the rescue, the cause will suffer materially. In this emergency, faith and works, prayers and gifts should unite in such generous measure that there can be no doubt about the issue. Even the smallest offering will help, if given in the right spirit. It is a work that appeals to the poor as well as the rich, and which cannot fail to be fruitful of blessing to all who aid it. Every contribution should be addressed to "Moody Gospel Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York," and all will be duly acknowledged in these columns.

MR. MOODY'S LETTER OF APPEAL.

*E. Northfield.
June 1, 1894.*

Dear Mr. Klopsch:

The Christian Public will ever be indebted to you for your leadership in the work which has been accomplished among the suffering of Russia and unemployed of New York. Allow me now to call your attention to a work for the 34 million people in this land, who do not come under the influence of our regular churches. As they do not come to the Church, the Church must send the Gospel to them. In order to train up a class of efficient workers, we have founded the Bible Institute at Chicago, where we now have over 300 young men and women in training to fit themselves for the field so great has been the demand, however, for our students, that we feel the necessity of enlarging the work. May I not entreat your sympathetic cooperation.

*Yours truly,

or control. To these masses, living in the poorest quarters of our great crowded cities, East and West, Mr. Moody reaches out the uplifting hand of Christian fellowship as no other has done in our day. It was his brain that conceived and his efforts that established the Bible Institute in Chicago for the training of Christian Workers, and the influence of that institution is to-day felt in a thousand different localities throughout the Union. The young men and women trained there to win souls for Christ have entered the field spiritually equipped and panoplied, and with advantages in method and previous experience that are of the utmost value in the actual work. Each and every worker is imbued with the right home missionary spirit, recognizing as the most important and urgent duty of all, that which lies nearest at hand and within our own gates. As keepers of the Lord's vineyards, it must not be said of them that their zeal has blinded them to the crying need of missionary work at home and that "their own vineyards they have not kept." That these godly men and women, educated and and activities are employed in soul-saving. Some are pastors, others Superintendents of Gospel Rescue Missions, Bethels, Children's Missions, Newsboys' Homes and Industrial Schools. Still others are principals of Colleges and Academies, managers or matrons of Technical Institutes and Homes of Industry, and many are colporteurs, and teachers. Nearly one hundred are pursuing their studies in theological and medical colleges, preparing for pastoral or evangelistic work. No attempt is made to furnish a classical education, but the curriculum embraces a thorough course of studies in exegesis, Bible readings, construction of sermons and talks, music and methods of work. Rev. R. A. Torrey, the superintendent, studied at Yale Theological Seminary and was for some time a very successful worker at Mr. Moody's meetings in the East. He was called to the superintendency in 1889 and has proved the fitness of the selection by the most excellent spiritual results. Prof. H. H. McGranahan the Director of the Music Department, is known as the composer of many beautiful Christian hymns. Mr.

Dwight L. Moody. None has probed more deeply into the hearts and consciences of the multitude, or been more instrumental, under divine leading, in turning men and women from the paths in sin into the way of life everlasting. His whole life has been an inspiration for good and a powerful spiritual stimulus to unnumbered souls. All over the world, wherever the English language is spoken, Mr. Moody's name is cherished and his noble character loved and esteemed by multitudes of men and women, who date their first experience of a new and vital Christian life from the day they heard the plain, convincing Gospel from his lips.

To-day we publish on this page a letter from the pen of this devoted servant of the Master, that must come home to the hearts of God's people everywhere like a summons to a duty which they, as loyal followers of Him who preached the Gospel among the very poorest when here on earth, cannot ignore. It is a summons that comes with special timeliness, since, on every hand, both in the churches and among thoughtful, earnest people generally, there are evidences of a mighty spiritual awakening. Young men and women in great numbers are seeking for an opening by which they may enter into Christian work, in behalf of the reclamation of the unevangelized masses in our large cities. Many have already been trained within the last few years at the Chicago Bible Institute, and are now in the field doing valiant service for Christ; but their numbers are as a few drops to the mighty ocean in contrast with the thirty millions in America who are out of Christ. "Thirty millions of people in this land who do not go to church," is what he writes in this letter, which sounds like a trumpet-peak to arouse professing Christians to spiritual activity and zeal. Thirty millions of souls at our very doors, careless of the future, and knowing nothing of the higher life. Who shall enlighten them and "how shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach except they be sent?" (Rom. 10: 14, 15.) There is no lack of sincere, consecrated men and women who are ready to volunteer for this service. Never were so many eager to enter the field of Christian work as to-day. Every mail brings to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD letters from some who are waiting to be shown the way to the vineyard, and who are ready to leave all and go in and labor. Every week, similar offers reach Mr. Moody. In Protestant churches of all denominations, the fire of Christian service has been kindled and thousands of young men and women have been stirred up to the duty of personal effort in the bringing of souls. But the work among the 30,000,000 lies outside of the reach of the churches, and is only to be accomplished by going outside of church methods. To reach them we must go out into the "highways and byways," the homes of the non-church-going mechanics and laborers; the alleys, slums, tenements and rookeries; the filthy and vicious purlieus, and the hovels of the hopelessly poor.

In his letter, Mr. Moody very frankly explains the magnitude of the work undertaken by the Bible Institute and the urgent need of practical co-operation by Christian people all over the Union, to bring the work up to the standard of spiritual success. It is an enterprise for eternity, in which every follower of Jesus has an interest that must lie very near to the heart indeed. In these days of Gospel quickening, no one can do too much for the cause—no sacrifice should be accounted too great. To work side by side with a man whose labors heretofore have been so signally blessed to many thousands, is a great privilege; to be the means, perhaps, of bringing some wandering soul into the fold, is inestimably greater.

THE MOODY GOSPEL FUND

WE take pleasure in calling attention to an autograph letter from Mr. D. L. Moody which appears on the preceding page. Its publication in this journal is very gratifying to us and we are sure that it will be so to our readers. It is a tribute of respect to them and confidence in them from the great evangelist, which is very significant. Mr. Moody is doing a great work for the Master in our land, and he finds that God is placing within his reach an opportunity for usefulness far larger, and far richer in prospective results, than he foresaw when he commenced it. His heart is gladdened by the wealth of the harvest-field, the gate of which God has opened to him. He would use it to the full and looking around for people who will hold up his hands and give him the sinews for work, which will enable him to gather in the imperishable grain, he turns to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as the people who will be in most hearty sympathy with him and invites their co-operation in the grand and glorious work. Mr. Moody writes:

E. NORTHFIELD, June 1, 1894.

DEAR MR. KLOPSCH:

The Christian public will ever be indebted to you for your leadership in the work which has been accomplished among the sufferers of Russia and the unemployed of New York. Allow me now to call your attention to a work for the thirty million people in this land, who do not come under the influences of our regular churches. As they do not come to the church, the church must send the Gospel to them. In order to train up a class of efficient workers, we have founded the Bible Institute at Chicago, where we now have over 300 young men and women in training to fit themselves for the field. So great has been the demand, however, for our students, that we feel the necessity of enlarging the work.

May I not enlist your sympathy and co-operation?

Yours truly,

D. L. MOODY.

It will be seen that, as his habit is, Mr. Moody is relying upon God for the means of extending the work and he naturally explains his position to our readers as, like the companions of the ancient king, they are "a band whose hearts God has touched." He would not expect nor would he seek the help of worldlings in a matter in which they would naturally have no interest; but to our readers he speaks as to people likeminded with himself having a burning desire that all men should be brought to the knowledge of Christ. He would make them partners with himself in this glorious undertaking and we are sure that they will appreciate the opportunity and count it a precious privilege to be engaged with him in his labor. Like one who is seeking rich treasure for his king, Mr. Moody comes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, saying, "See what I have found; come and help me to carry it into the treasury of Him who is your and my Lord."

There is a significance in Mr. Moody's appeal at this juncture which will be at once perceived by every observer of the signs of the times. The conspicuous characteristic of the present time is not so much the large numbers being added to the church—although that is matter for abounding joy and thankfulness—as the extent to which the spirit of enthusiastic service is being poured on the young people of the Church. Never before, in the nineteen centuries of the Church's history, have there been so many young people coming forward and begging to be employed in the work of winning souls. "Here am I; send me," is the cry on all hands, whether the call is from our own or heathen lands. From all classes come responses to every call for laborers, and every volunteer desires nothing better than to be employed. The Holy Spirit is pointing the way for us; it is for us to follow his leading. He knows what is most needed in any age, and he is showing us that the need of our day is the equipment of volunteers, that they may do efficient service in gathering from the world's population a people for the Lord before he comes.

To such a man as Mr. Moody they instinctively turn. They are not seeking learning or science, but the power to use "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." They want to work, as he works, with such a knowledge of the mightiest of all weapons, as to do valiant service for Christ; to win not honor, or glory, or wealth, but to win souls. Mr. Moody is ready to help them, but his means are not sufficient for a work so extensive. The large sum he receives as royalty on his books he spends to the last cent in this and the other educational work he is conducting. Mr. Moody modestly says nothing about these royalties, but we learn from another source that they have never been paid to him at all, but by his order have been paid, as they came in, to the treasurers of his institutions for the support of the work. During the last twenty years they have aggregated a million and a quarter dollars, not one dollar of which has been handled by him or applied to his personal use. This he has given cheerfully and gladly; but he looks longingly at the vast field that he has no means to enter, and grieves over the number of promising young men and women who might be preachers, missionaries, and teachers, winning souls, if he could give them the help for which they are begging him. This is the opportunity offered us. We have the privilege of following the Holy Spirit's leading, of giving effect to his almighty influence, of aiding in sending out, throughout the length and breadth of this land, an army of Christ's soldiers, equipped and trained by a master mind, to carry the banner of the Cross to its remotest corner. The privilege of helping in this glorious effort is for those who will have it, and in the day when all our property is left behind, and we stand face to face with God, who is beckoning us to this field, it will be the most blissful of all experiences to hear that loving voice say, in glory, as it said in humiliation, "They have done what they could."

OUR ACCOUNTABILITY.

WE ought to realize that we shall be called upon to give an account for the employment of this physical organism. Shoulder, brain, hand, foot, we must answer for the use we have made of them. Have they been used for the elevation of society, or for its depression? In proportion as our arm is strong, and our step elastic, will our account at last be intensified. Thousands of counsels are given to invalids. I address these words to stout men and healthful women. We must give to God an account for the right use of this physical organism. These invalids have comparatively little to account for, perhaps.

They could not lift twenty pounds; they could not walk half a mile without sitting down to rest.

I am compelled to ask myself, how shall I account to God for the use of a body which never knew one moment of real sickness! Rising up in judgment, standing beside the men and women who had only little physical energy and yet who consumed that energy in a conflagration of useful enthusiasm, how will we feel abashed? Oh, men of the strong arm and stout heart, what use are you making of your physical forces? Will you be able to stand the test of that day when we must answer for the use of every talent whether it were a physical energy or a mental acumen or a spiritual power?

The day approaches and I see one who in this world was an invalid, and as she stands before the throne of God to answer, she says: "I was sick all my days, I had but very little strength, but I did as well as I could, being kind to those that were more sick and more suffering than I," and Christ will say: "Well done, faithful servant."

And then a little, simple child will stand before the throne, and she will say: "On earth I had a curvature of the spine and was very weak, and I was very sick, but I used to gather flowers out of the wild wood and bring them to my sick mother and she was comforted when she saw the sweet flowers out of the wild wood. I didn't do much, but I did something." And Christ shall say as he takes her up in his arms and kisses her: "Well done, faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of thy Lord."

HONESTY IN BUSINESS.

INEXORABLE statistics show that for the last half century, out of one hundred business men, ninety-eight failed. Out of these ninety-eight I am not willing to admit that more than ten failed discreditably to their moral character. When I hear that a man has been obliged to compromise with his creditors, or that the sheriff has shut up his store, it excites in me no more suspicions about his character than if I had been told that he was down with typhoid or apoplexy. It is high time in this country that we made a distinction between the man who fails honestly and the man who fails dishonestly.

Crime in this country is apt to be excused in proportion as it is great. The poor waif of the street steals a smoked beef from the corner grocery and the police turn out in full force, and the cry is loud as when a pack of hounds come down the wind on a fox hunt, "Stop thief!" But if a man steal enough we are disposed to let him off. Men are not incarcerated for stealing so much as for the fact that they do not steal enough. If it is a large amount, then it is not theft—it is "watering stock," it is "rehypothecating" securities.

As a matter of general congratulation I mention the fact that the lidgets and financial hysterics of Wall street are having less effect than formerly upon the business prosperity of the country. Three or five or ten years ago the scenes of recent months would have produced a universal panic, and our whole commerce would have been swept down as by a cyclone. Let us rejoice that the day seems gone by when a few Jay Goulds and Jim Fisks can hold this nation at their mercy. Happy that day, and may God hasten it, when straightforward dealing between brokers and bankers and merchants shall become the inviolable rule, and the chimes of Trinity Church at the head of Wall street shall ring in the Christmas jubilee of practical and universal brotherhood. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good-will to men."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

The replies came from California to Maine and from Alabama to New York. I thank these Christians sincerely for their sympathy and prayers, and Sister Waidman for her kind interest in my behalf. Enclosed please find the hymn. Some of your readers will expect to see the hymn in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as an evidence of its having been received.

I am convalescing, which I believe is due to the prayers of these good Christians.

The hymn is published in another part of this issue.

J. A. C. Keagy, New York City. I have a very dear friend who professes to be a Christian, but who does not attend any church or Gospel meeting. She holds to the idea that a person can be a Christian without attending or contributing to the good work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I have been working with her, trying to get her into the church, to let her light shine and minister to others, that they may reach the feet of our dear Lord.

It is part of the duty of every one who professes to be a Christian to employ the ordinances and means of grace afforded by the Christian Church, and to confess the Saviour publicly by such action (see Matt. 10: 32, Luke 12: 8). Except where the person lives remote from a place of worship, or is prevented by sickness or bodily disability from attending, there can be no justification for such neglect. We are distinctly told that we must not despise the means (Ezek. 22: 8; Heb. 10: 25). These are helps, not essentials, it is true; but in a great majority of cases they are helps of inestimable value to those who really desire to follow Christ.

A. W. B., Emporia, Kan. Several Gospel Union workers have been doing great good in this county and many souls have been saved. But toward the end of this meeting, they refused any money from anybody but Christians, and many took offence, both saints and sinners, and several who were under strong conviction got so angry that it does seem as if all hope in them was lost. Gen. 14: 23; Rom. 8: 8; John 1: 7, and several other passages were referred to. Give us your opinion of their action.

It would be difficult and in some cases unjust to discriminate too sharply in accepting such gifts. In many cases the very fact of offering such a gift may be an indication of sincere repentance on the part of the sinner. (See Rom. 14, the whole chapter.) Yet where the offer is made by one living in open and flagrant sin, it may well be refused. When the Jews were rebuilding the Temple, a number of tribes who had apostatized, offered to help, but their proffer was refused, as they were then living in idolatry, and not in the worship of the true God. (See Ezra 4: 3; Nehemiah 2: 20.)

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

FINDING THE PHARAOHS.

RECENT discoveries of antiquarian interest are reported from Egypt. When it was noticed how ruthless were the depredations of the modern Egyptians on the ancient structures of the country, a society was formed in England and America to find and preserve at least some of the treasures of antiquity. The modern Arab has no respect for anything in the tombs and ruins except such jewels and ornaments as he can turn into ready cash, and he has no compunction about crushing stones and bricks bearing inscriptions of priceless value, to make mortar for building his hut or fertilizer for his garden. Yet the ancient Egyptians were such extensive builders, that the traveler stands amazed at the number and splendor of the ruins that remain after all the ravages of the centuries. The Egypt Exploration Fund is used for the exploration of these ruins, and every year hundreds of laborers are digging at three or four places under the command of learned Egyptologists. A new point of interest was selected two years ago, but was afterwards abandoned. This year work has been resumed there under the direction of M. J. de Morgan, the French explorer, and has been rewarded with important discoveries. The mounds explored, were those which the Arabs call the Black Pyramids, at Dahchoor. They stand in the desert not far from the site of ancient Memphis, and there was little doubt that they were the tombs of Pharaohs of the more ancient dynasties. The Pyramids are built of bricks, but were once covered with stone to preserve the bricks from decay. The stone covering has long since been stripped off, but the bricks are still firm and strong. The skill with which they were made of exact mathematical proportions and laid with precision in their courses, is the admiration of modern builders. M. de Morgan in excavating concentrated his efforts on finding from the outside the entrance to these cities of the royal dead. These paths were kept a jealously guarded secret and their discovery has taxed the patience and perseverance of the explorers. The picture on this page depicts the group at the moment of success. The entrance to the vaulted passage, leading to the heart of one of the brick pyramids, has just been found, and the explorer is about to walk along a path that has not been trodden by the foot of man for more than three thousand years. Within four hours after entering, he had found the great burial chamber where were deposited the bodies of Osirtasen II, Osirtasen III and Amenemha III, the principal monarchs of the Twelfth Dynasty. So much care was taken by the ancient Egyptians in embalming and hiding the bodies of their distinguished dead, because of their theory that the prize of immortality would be conferred only on those whose corpses were preserved for a thousand years. The contrast between their conduct and that of some among us to-day is remarkable. They were so intensely desirous of acquiring eternal life that they went to huge expense and labor to secure it, while in our day preachers and Christian workers have to entreat men to accept it as a gift. (1 John 5: 11.)

A Dangerous Patient.

A perilous operation on an elephant is described by a dentist in the "Globe-Democrat" of St. Louis. He was summoned by the keeper of a travelling circus to examine the teeth of one of the elephants in the show. The keeper told him that the animal had been one of the most docile and affectionate he had in his possession, but for several weeks past he had been gloomy and irritable. His trunk and tail hung limp and lifeless, and he would lie for hours rubbing his jaw against the ground. It occurred to the keeper that he might be suffering from toothache, and on looking at his jaw he noticed a tooth that had suspicious appearance. The dentist was accordingly summoned, and having examined the tooth advised that it be filled. The elephant was furious when the tooth was touched, and if the dentist had not taken refuge behind a beam he would have been killed. The keepers chained the animal's feet and secured his trunk firmly to a beam overhead and then the dentist went quickly to work. But there was an evil look in the elephant's eye, and his frequent trumpetings and his struggles to free himself indicated how he would deal with the dentist if he could have his liberty. But before the operation was half over, the big beast seemed to realize that the pain was for his good. The angry look went out of his eyes, and he ceased to struggle. When the work was done the elephant recovered his former appetite and spirits, but the most remarkable change was noticed when the dentist entered the elephant house the next day to inquire after his patient. The animal saw him and knew him. He extended his trunk, flourished his tail and tried to express by his actions his regard and gratitered antidotes and worked over the boys all night. But their efforts to save their lives were futile. Before morning all five died in great agony. Other boys who had eaten a little of the root also suffered much pain, but they recovered. Possibly, there might have been no deaths at all if the five boys had been generous and the roots had been distributed among their companions. But their own selfishness and greediness proved fatal to them. The same disposition has been known to lead to the far worse catastrophe of eternal death. Of all the contestants in the mad race for wealth those stand in the greatest danger of losing their souls in the struggle who hoard their riches for themselves and refuse the privilege of distributing to their needy brethren. (Ec. 5:13.)

A Name that Lost a Fortune.

A San Francisco journal says that there is in one of the public schools of that city a nephew of a noted multi-millionaire who died a few months ago. The boy has lost both his parents, and, though not destitute, is in very humble circumstances. It appears he might have been a millionaire if his father had called him by a different name. The father at the child's birth, wrote to his millionaire brother informing him of the new arrival, and the brother replied in congratulatory phrase, saying that if the boy was named after himself he would tude to the man whom the day before he had tried to kill. The animal had discovered what some men fail to discover with all their superior faculties, that pain is sometimes inflicted in love, not in anger, and results in the benefit of the afflicted one. (Heb. 12: 11.)

Fatal Greediness.

The accidental poisoning of five boys is reported from Tarrytown, N. Y. The boys were inmates of an institution there and were members of a party which was permitted to have a day's outing in the fields and woods. In all, there were about thirty boys. During the day they stopped to watch some men who were digging a trench. One of the boys, who was about twelve years old, noticed some roots projecting from the side of the trench and thinking they were sweet flag roots, he pulled them up and ate some. He told four other boys about it and they too ate the white roots. There were not many and when other boys came and wanted to share, the first five contended with them for the prize and secured most of it for themselves. It had a sharp, sweet taste and the boys enjoyed it hugely. On their return to the institution, however, the poisonous nature of the root was proved. The five boys who had eaten most of it were seized with violent pains in the region of the heart and there was general alarm. Physicians were summoned, who adminis-leave him something handsome. The child's father complied, but to the name of the brother he added the name of Frederick, so that the boy might not have to write "junior" to his name so long as his uncle lived. The boy was called Fred in the home and by his companions, and when his millionaire uncle called at the house during one of his Western trips, he observed that though the boy did bear his name as stipulated, it was ignored. He made no complaint, but when he died recently, and his millions were distributed by his will, it was found that the document contained no reference to his namesake. He was evidently piqued that his wish as to the name had been observed in the letter, but ignored in the spirit. Is it possible that someone who bears the name "Christian," and hope to receive the eternal inheritance promised to the followers of Christ, may miss it because they so live that no one knows them by that name? (II Timothy 2: 19.)

Converting a Quicksand.

In the current number of a scientific magazine is a description of a process designed by an eminent engineer for turning quicksand into solid concrete. His plan is to thoroughly impregnate the quicksand, by atmospheric pressure, with powdered dry hydraulic cement. He uses for the purpose a long pipe with perforated walls. At the upper end a rubber-tube connects it with an injector which forces compressed air into it. The air easily makes a passage for the pipe into the sand and it penetrates by its own weight without pressure. In some instances a depth of nineteen feet has been reached. The cement is then fed to it and the compressed air drives it through the perforated sides of the pipe, permeating the quicksand all around it as the pipe is gradually withdrawn. The surface is divided into sections of one square foot each and the pipe is successively sunk in each section. The cement thus applied, turns the quicksand into concrete which in a few weeks becomes hard enough for a foundation. In earlier times the man who could turn quicksand into concrete would have been called a miracle-worker, so impossible seemed the achievement. Science has accomplished the transmutation by infusion. It is so, by God's grace, that the infinitely greater transmutation of human nature is effected, when the divine nature is implanted and sanctification is carried on and the stony heart becomes flesh. And that is really a miracle. (Ezek. 36: 26, 27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Northfield Seminary Buildings have been secured for the conference of the young women interested in church work, which will be held June 22 to 28.

Rev. Charles A. Oakes, D.D., Assistant Pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, has accepted a call to Kingston, N. Y., and commenced his ministry there on June 10.

The Fourth Annual Session of the Summer Bible and Training School for young women will be held on the grounds of the Western Secretarial Institute, Lake Geneva, Wis., July 4 to 17.

The American Presbyterian Synod of China has decided upon the formation of a missionary society for sending out Chinese as missionaries to new and unoccupied fields in that country.

The Religious Tract Society of London at its recent annual meeting reported total receipts of $908,000. There had been 583 publications sent out during the year. The society now publishes in 209 languages, dialects and characters.

A Tablet to the Memory of E. P. Roe, Author of Barriers Burned Away, etc., was unveiled last week in the Roe Memorial Park, Cornwall-on-the-Hudson. The Grand Army Post and the benevolent and other societies took part in the exercises. Dr. Lyman Abbott officiated.

At the General Convention of the Christian Church, South, at Norfolk, Va., Rev. W. W. Staley, D.D., was elected president. The report on Elon College showed that $30,000 had been collected for the building fund, and that the entire assets amounted to $67,000. This is the centennial year of the church.

At the Anniversary of the Baptist Missionary Union at Saratoga, the Secretary reported a large decrease of income. The appropriations had been cut down to $524,657, but even so the year would close with an indebtedness of $203,595. The year started with a balance in hand of $25,113.

The Congregational Home Missionary Society has been holding its sixty-eighth annual meeting at Omaha, Neb., in the First Congregational Church, of which the Rev. Dr. S. T. Duryea, formerly of Brooklyn and Boston, is pastor. The financial statement shows receipts in the year of $521,608 56. It spent for missionary labor and expenses $701,441.16.

Rev. Dr. W. M. Taylor, the Honored Pastor emeritus of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, has suffered a relapse. He had so far recovered from the affliction which caused his resignation of the active pastorate as to give hope of a renewal of his work. Unfavorable symptoms have now, however, developed, and he has been in an enfeebled state since his seizure.

Mr. Fred W. Clarke, Whose Schools and Orphanages at Spezia, Italy, have long been doing Evangelical work in that land, writes: "A great part of the Italian people have no real religion; while we are trying to reach them, they are relying on their children to be the future Protestant evangelists and teachers of Italy. We have seven hundred in our day schools. To these we give a thorough training."

The Organization of a League of the Liberal party in the Presbyterian Church is announced by the New York Times. It states that the Conservatives are already well organized, but heretofore the Liberals have had no union. The managers of the new League are an Executive Committee of fifteen clergymen and laymen, with the Rev. Anson P. Atterbury, D.D., of the Park Presbyterian Church at the head.

The General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church, at Albany, Ore., was well attended. The reports of the different boards showed excellent advance. John A. Wilson, D.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Theological Seminary at Alleghany, was elected moderator. The opening sermon by the retiring moderator, Dr. James Bruce of Andes, N. Y., was an earnest plea for setting forth the strength of the Church by prayer, faith, spirituality, truth and unity.

The Moral Cleansing of Boston, Mass., seems to be a matter demanding the attention of the Churches. Rev. Isaac S. Lansing, pastor of the Park Street Church, who has been staying for a week or two in New York, saw something of the work Dr. Parkhurst is doing. On his return to Boston, he made inquiries which resulted in the discovery that there are grounds for suspecting the existence of a similar collusion between the police and the lawbreakers, to that which Dr. Parkhurst declares exists in New York.

Advices from Corea Report the Rapid Spread of the rebellion. The insurgents number nearly 50,000; they have killed the governor of one of the Provinces and thirty-four prominent persons, including several high officials, and were at last reports marching on Seoul. They have issued a manifesto demanding the expulsion of all foreigners. Our Government has ordered the "Baltimore," which was on the Japanese station, to proceed to Corea to protect American citizens. Great Britain has a fleet there already and will give refuge to any foreigners who may desire to come on board.

SERMONS WORTH READING

Helpful Discourses for the People.

THE ARMY OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

Sermon Preached in the First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga., by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D. Text: Act 7: 26, "Why do ye wrong one to another?"

THIS is the protest which Moses uttered when he saw two Hebrews quarrelling and smiting each other. In these words he expressed the substance of the law which was afterwards delivered to him on Sinai—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"—and which Christ so beautifully expounded in his sermon on the Mount.

Christianity is not a perfected science of human conduct. It simply teaches us the comprehensive duty of love to all men. It forbids us to render evil unto any man, and enjoins us to do good as we have opportunity to all men. But to avoid doing evil to our fellows we must know what is hurtful to them, and to be helpful to them we must know what is for their good. This knowledge we get largely by observation and experience. What men have learned through the ages upon this subject is found in the maxims of sociology and the principles of international law. But there is nothing true and good in the science of sociology that is not based on the great law of love revealed in the sacred Scriptures. Any social law or custom that is contrary to the golden rule of the Gospel—"As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them"—is false, and fruitful only of evil to mankind. Social science can never get beyond and above the ideal life of that Man of men—the Man Christ Jesus. What he taught, and what he was, can never be improved or outgrown. There can be no law better than his law of love, and there is no conceivable exercise of human nature higher than the life he lived.

The highest duty of every man is to study the social conditions of the country and age in which he lives, to see wherein men are being Wronged by their Fellow-men, and to use all the means within his reach to shield the oppressed, and to bring the oppressor into subjection to the law of Christ. I would lay this duty especially upon the consciences of young men who are about to leave the halls of learning, and go forth to take their places among the forces which are to control the conduct and shape the character of the social life of their country. Intellectual culture can have no higher and holier mission than the vindication of human rights, the redress of human wrongs, and the uplifting and strengthening of the great principles of human brotherhood.

A distinguished writer has said, that the Columbian Exposition emphasized the great doctrine of human brotherhood. He calls attention to the fact, that within the bounds of the Exposition and among all the workers and visitors from the various nations of the globe, there was not a single slave. He reminds us, too, that of all the fabrics put on exhibition, excepting a few relics of the dead past, there was not one that had been wrought by the hands of a slave. What a change! That Exposition was named for a man who did not flink it a crime to enslave men, and to sell them as chattels in the markets of the world. Having planted the Cross on the shores of this Western world, he captured the natives and sent them back to be sold in the cities of his own country. Fifty years ago there could have been no International Exposition unmarked by the presence of human bondage. In this last decade of the nineteenth century the world rings with the shout of freedom. But let us not forget that all this philanthropic exultation is over the abolition of only one form of human bondage, and that in the very shadow of the stately edifices in which men gathered to celebrate the triumphs of freedom, there exists a bondage in comparison with which African slavery in this country was an institution of mercy.

When Prince Albert instituted the first World's Fair, forty-three years ago, he said that one of the great ends to which it would contribute, was the realization of the unity of mankind. His prophetic words have been abundantly verified. The last World's Fair showed that great progress has been made in bringing the sundered races of mankind into closer sympathy and fellowship.

But while all this is true—while it is undeniable that the world is making progress in the direction of universal brotherhood—it is also true, that, even in great Christian countries like our own, "man's inhumanity to man makes millions mourn." In the midst of all the splendid achievements of philosophy and science and art, under the eaves of temples reared to the glory of him who taught us to love all men as we love ourselves, surrounded by all the visibilities of a civilization that we call Christian, there are wrongs wicked and cruel.

We are confronted to-day with what is called "The Army of the Unemployed." More than a half million of men and women, dependent upon their daily labor for food, clothing and shelter, are without work. Something less than a hundred thousand of these are tramping over the country in every direction

Looking for Employment, and begging bread. Without pausing to consider who is responsible for the condition of these unfortunate beings, let us look at the treatment which they receive from American society, as represented by the State. In the face of all the facts, as they have appeared in the public press, I am prepared to say that the conduct of society towards these thousands of homeless, penniless, wretched people, is not only un-Christian and un-brotherly, but inhuman. It will not be denied that at least nine-tenths of this vast army of the employed are accustomed to work, and to provide for themselves and those dependent upon them, and that there is nothing they covet so much as honest and remunerative employment. Many of them have as much self-respect and virtuous pride as any of us. Their idleness is unsought, and they deplore it with a bitterness of soul that no human speech can express. Their begging is a dire necessity. Without it would come all the pangs and horrors of starvation.

Such people deserve our respect. They have a right to our profoundest sympathy. The requirements of Christianity, and the common instincts of humanity, demand that we commiserate their condition, and help them according to the measure of our ability. To despise them or ignore them—to brand them as tramps and vagabonds—or to let them pass unhelped and unpitied, is to prove ourselves a thousand times more degraded than they, and to invite the scorn and reprobation of every virtuous being in God's universe.

The doctrine of American society is that every idle man without visible means of subsistence is a pariah, a loafer, a liar, a reprobate, and therefore unworthy of human respect or sympathy. Even if it were true that every idler and beggar is a reprobate, while I believe in the fatherhood of God and

The Brotherhood of Man.

I dare not divorce him from my sympathy and respect. If Jesus Christ pitied and blessed publicans and harlots, what are you and I that we should despise a penniless and sore-footed tramp begging bread? We cannot despise him without despising the spirit and teaching of the Gospel, and defying the authority power and wrath of that Divine Being, who so identified himself with humanity that to wrong any human being is to wrong him.

We should have no sympathy with voluntary idleness. It is despicable in the last degree. To encourage it is a crime. But let us distinguish between the idler and his idleness. Let the degradation into which he has fallen excite our sympathy, and move us to adopt some method of treatment that will quicken his dormant faculties, bring back self-respect, and place him in a condition to recover his lost manhood. Nothing less than this will meet the requirements of religion and humanity.

The distinguished journalist, William T. Stead, in a recent book entitled, "If Christ Came to Chicago," presents an array of facts which shows the injustice and cruelty of the verdict of American society against "the army of the unemployed." He tells us that during last winter, it was not uncommon to find after night-fall at least two thousand of these helpless people crowded into the corridors and on the stairways of the City Hall building in Chicago. "The air was nipping keen, and when the sleeping room was filled, men preferred to stand in the warm, close, fetid atmosphere of the crowded building rather than shiver in the frost and snow outside." He tells us that, considering their hunger, the hard cold stone floor on which they slept, and the many other discomforts to which they were subjected, they were singularly quiet. He declares that most of them were "hard-working men, honestly anxious to find work." He says, "It was impossible to do more than sample this mass of but Prof. Hourwich, with a band of students from the University, subjected a hundred of this crowd of two thousand to a searching analysis. Only ten of the one hundred selected at random belonged to labor unions. Only two had worked for less than a dollar a day. Sixty-four had earned from one to two dollars a day, and twenty from two to four dollars. Fifty-nine were native-born Americans; forty-one were foreigners. The most of the men were in the prime of life. Only one was below twenty, and four were above fifty. They represented the following occupations: Common laborers, teamsters, painters, waiters, molders, bakers, machinists, miners, cooks, sailors, cigar-makers, shoe-makers, carpenters, wood-finishers, brick-makers, clerks, plumbers, steam-fitters and salesmen. Several of the men were well educated. One was a graduate of the University of Nebraska. Most of them had come to Chicago seeking work, and none of them found it. Of all the disheartening occupations, that of seeking work and finding none, is one of the worst. The curse that in the Bible is said to have followed the "fall," is often in the modern world an unattainable boom. It was a quaint but true conceit of Mrs. Brown-ing's, that "God in cursing gives us better gifts than man in blessing." But whether malediction or benediction, work was what these men wanted, and work was the one thing they could not get.

Do you say that such men—men honestly seeking labor and finding none—men sinking into untimely graves from hunger, exposure and heart-ache—are unworthy of your sympathy and respect? Do you brand them as loafers, liars, reprobates, and vultures? If you do, your level of life is a thousand fathoms lower than theirs, and there is not a vermin-covered wretch among them who is not an angel of purity and beauty in comparison with you.

Mr. Stead, in the same work from which I have quoted, says, "Harrison Street Police Station is one of

of Chicago. It is a central cess-pool whence drain the poisonous drippings of the city. The floor is of stone. In each cell there is one bench on which the first comers can sit, while the others stand. The place is lit with gas, and warmed, but the atmosphere is heavy and fetid and the cages and corridors reek with the associations of vice and crime.

This, my friends, is one of the places in which the great rich city of Chicago lodges a large share of the homeless "army of the unemployed." Into this criminal stock-pot, where toughs and felons stew, these honest and unfortunate sons of toil are nightly plunged by the officials of city government. What do you think of it? What does God think of it? Is this under-ground Inferno a suitable resting-place for human beings, for American citizens, whose only crime is that they are poor and out of work?

"Why do ye wrong one to another?" is the question that should be upon the lips of every Christian patriot and every lover of humanity, who has a habitation and a name on the soil of this great country which claims to be, but is not, a refuge for the oppressed of all nations. The inhumanity of Chicago society is not exceptional. It is more visible and somewhat more brazen and remorseless there, perhaps, than in other places, but the spirit of it is manifest in all the cities, and is growing in every community of our broad land.

Here, my friends, is the problem of the age. The great task which lies immediately before the Christianity, the philanthropy, the patriotism, and the statesmanship of this country, is how to stop this butchery of men, and how to build up a public sentiment that shall render the repetition of it an impossibility. It will not be denied that there is a deep dark yawning chasm between capital and labor—a chasm which threatens government and institutions with remediless destruction. What made this chasm? Wrongs—wrongs on the part of capital in multiplying the burdens and hardships of labor, and wrongs on the part of labor in its manifold unlawful methods of retaliation. Look at

with which capital is chargeable. In almost every state in the Union the effort has been made to get a statutory limitation of child-labor. Seeing the thousands of children that were put into factories and work-shops before nature had given them the strength requisite for such labor, and before they had acquired even the rudiments of an education, philanthropic men and women have petitioned State legislatures to fix the period of life at which it shall be lawful to employ children in such institutions, and the number of hours that they shall be permitted to labor each day. In every instance they have met with the most persistent and determined opposition—not from labor, but from capital. To the mind of the laboring man these facts indicate the most criminal selfishness on the part of the manufacturer. They prove to him that the manufacturer's devotion to Mammon has deprived him of his humane instincts, and that he has only a commercial interest in the lives and destinies of the toiling poor of our country. If there were no other, this one wrong would make a chasm between capital and labor.

Another wrong that has helped to alienate the laboring poor from the wealthier classes, is the unrighteous interference of capital with the freedom of the ballot. "Vox Populi, Vox Dei," is oftener true than false. But how seldom in these degenerate times, do we hear at the ballot box the voice of the people. We hear something which the political newspapers call the voice of the people, but in reality it is only the voice of the monopolists and their hired henchmen. Mr. Lincoln's "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," is, in this country, an ideal and not a reality. Is that a government of the people where thousands of them are restrained, by fear of losing their business situations and their means of subsistence, from voting according to their own convictions of truth and right? Is that where a combination of capitalists, by an iniquitous use of their money, secure the passage of laws which are meant to be golden girdles to one class and galling shackles to another? Is that a people's government where there is neither a free ballot nor a fair count? No! The man who says it is, is either an idiot or a knave. A chasm yawns between capital and labor because labor knows that its voice is not heard and that its will is not expressed in the government of the country.

Another thing which makes the breach between capital and labor, is the unjust distribution of the burden of taxation. The man who has a hundred thousand dollars worth of property to be protected, should pay to the government ten times as much revenue as the man who owns only ten thousand dollars worth of property. Any departure from this principle of taxation is unmitigated robbery. But who will deny that the capitalists of this country have practically repudiated the wise and righteous principle of political economy? A man, who is known to be worth thirty millions of dollars, has his personal property assessed at only twenty thousand dollars, when the tax assessors know that the paintings in his house alone cost more than a hundred thousand dollars. Another man, who is known to be worth twenty millions, has his personal property assessed at only five thousand dollars, when the assessors know that his carriages and horses cost twice that amount. The result of this unblushing dishonesty, is that the hard-working and honest mechanic has to pay for the protection of his own meagre possessions five times as much as is his just proportion. In the light of these facts how can you wonder at the dissatisfaction and unrest of the laboring classes?

No intelligent and honest man will contend that the laboring elements themselves are not responsible in a great degree for the calamitous strife that now exists between capital and labor. Thousands of them have committed themselves to the false and revolutionary principle that "wealth is a crime." The assertion of a doctrine so unjust and satanic, is enough to engender suspicion and bitterness. It is the right of any organization of laborers to strike for higher wages, if they believe that they are not justly remunerated for their toil. But they have no right, legal or moral, to say to other laborers, "Unless you join us in this strike, you shall not work at all." No despotism could be worse than that. No unfriendliness of capital towards labor will justify any such retaliation as the blowing up of a mine, the burning of a factory, the destruction of a railroad, or the taking of human life. In resorting to such diabolical measures, labor has not only enlarged the barrier between it and capital, but it has forfeited much sympathy which virtuous people once felt for it in its unequal conflict. But without looking further into the causes of this bitter and let us be deeply impressed with the solemn fact that it exists, and let us with earnest hearts and a firm reliance upon the guidance of Divine wisdom and the support of Divine power, devote ourselves to the patriotic and benevolent task of removing the trouble. Let us, if possible, calm these tempests of unbrotherly and unholy passion in the breasts of these contending factions. Let us bring these disaffected classes face to face for a righteous adjustment of their differences; let us knit them together into a homogeneous whole, in which the strong shall bear the burdens of the weak, and the rich and poor shall dwell together in all the blessedness of fraternal sympathy, love and peace. Young man, of strength and culture, here is a task worthy of your loftiest ambition. Here you may build for yourself a higher and more enduring monument than the noblest of the stony pyramids that rise colossal over the sands of Egypt. Here you may stand and write your name "where stars are lit, on fame's imperial seat." Christian statesman, here is an opportunity for the display of a political wisdom above any that has ever illumined the councils of our Nation. He who is foremost in the grand work of closing the chasm which threatens to engulf this country, will project his life into distant future, and shall stand in the ages to come as one of the most colossal figures in human history.

An Opportunity.

People of the living God, representatives of him over whose cradle the angels sang, "Peace, and on earth good will towards men," you, above all others, are called to this high and holy task. With united hearts and hands, America's army of twenty million Christians could quiet these warring elements, blot this era of oppression out, and lead a blessed freedom in. If this work of love and mercy were accomplished, with angelic gladness we could lift up our heads and sing:

Bright sunbeams deck the sky; hosannas fill the air, All heaven is shouting victory, and hell is in despair.

To perform this mission we must not be partisans, but mediators. We must be brave, but kind, wise as serpents, but harmless as doves. We must get into closer contact with these multitudes of dissatisfied, discouraged and suffering sons and daughters of toil, and preach Christ's Gospel to them, not only by our lips, but also by deeds of sympathy and love. Each of us should be to them, as far as our limited natures and opportunities will allow, another Christ. Let the Christ-life in us go out of us day by day to unite itself to their lives. Let us discipline our hearts into the completest sensibility to their unhappy condition. Let us suffer and sacrifice for them in the spirit in which our Redeemer, suffered and sacrificed for us. Let us make their cause, in so far as it is just and right in the sight of God, our cause. Let us plant ourselves firmly between them and their oppressors, and by all the means at our command strive to shield them from wrong. Let us do these things and we shall conquer both them and their enemies.

Oh who would not a hero be,
In this the noblest chivalry?
For there be those who ache to see
The day-dawn of our victory.

Work, brothers, work; work hand and brain!
To win the better day again.
We will, we will true heroes be,
In this the grandest chivalry.

THE TWO WAYS.

I LOOKED at her jeweled fingers,
I looked at her sable furs,
Her silk, and lace,
With their dainty grace,
Oh, the wages of sin were hers!
I looked at my hands, all work-worn,
And barren of jewels fine,
And then looked down,
At my faded gown,
Oh, the wages of toil were mine!
"Why do this?" something whispered,
As I dragged along the street,
"Royal ease awaits,
Lo! the gilded gates,
Stand open at your feet!"

Just then, from a shaded corner,
Amid all the noise and din,
Wild and weird, yet sweet,
From the crowded street,
Rose the notes of a violin.

Then the strain came clearer, louder,
'Twas "Nearer My God to Thee;"

Oh it filled my soul
With a peace untold;
It was oil on a troubled sea.
Ah, poor, blind wandering minstrel,
Thy tender, quavering lay,
Made my footsteps shrink
From temptation's brink,
Back into the narrow way.
A year since then has vanished,
And she I envied so,
I saw to-day,
On her lonely way
To a grave on the hillside go.
Not a friend to mourn her parting,
Or watch close the failing breath,
Or flowers to strew,
Ah, I thought 'tis true,
"The wages of sin is death."

And though my way was toilsome,
And I wearied of the strife,
It has since grown bright,
With love and light,
And it leads to eternal life.

IN THE PENUMBRA.

The Coming Dispensation Indicated
Like the Shadow of an Eclipse.

BY REV. BURLINGTON B. WALE.

DISPENSATIONS do not, like the day at midnight, strike the hour of their own decease, and expire with the final stroke, but glide insensibly into, and for a time overlap each other. That this has been the case with the dispensations of the past is susceptible of easy proof. And reasoning from analogy, (if we were left to that alone, which we are not), we might fairly conclude that it will be so in the future. The judgment which closed the Antediluvian dispensation, and which culminated in the Deluge, was announced 120 years before—and for that period the Antediluvian world was passing farther and farther from day to day, and hour to hour, into the ever-deepening, ever-advancing shadow of that awful judgment—passing so to speak into the penumbra of that terrible eclipse, slowly but surely stealing upon them, till light was swallowed up of darkness, and life was swallowed up of death. Yet through all this lengthening period, the inhabitants of the Antediluvian world disregarded the note of warning, and passed on thoughtlessly and laughingly to their doom. They disregarded indeed not only the note of warning which announced the coming judgment, but the building of the Ark, which spoke of salvation in the hour of judgment, a judgment through which Noah and his family passed safely while the world around them was destroyed.

"As it was in the days of Noah, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be! for as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the Ark and the flood came and took them all away, so also shall the coming of the Son of Man be."

In the person of Noah and in his family the Antediluvian and Patriarchal dispensations met and overlapped each other. His last recorded act before the deluge was to complete and build the Ark. His first act after the deluge to offer sacrifice as the head of the household, the patriarchal ruler, and thus to inaugurate the Patriarchal dispensation. The distinctive characteristic of this dispensation was that to the father of the family, the ruler and the representative of the household, pertained the right and the privilege of offering sacrifice.

Imperceptibly and noiselessly does the patriarchal dispensation, after lasting 500 years, glide into the Mosaic. The knell of the patriarchal dispensation had virtually sounded when Moses stood before Pharaoh, commissioned to deliver Israel; but the hour did not strike until Moses was called up into the mountain to receive from God the specified details of the tabernacle, and instructions for the establishment of a divinely ordained priesthood. Yet how vast the ecclesiastical difference between the two dispensations, for that which had been acceptable to God in the patriarchal sacrifice offered by the individual—would have been and was—the greatest criminality in the Mosaic.

In a similar, and yet in a more remarkable way and manner, was the Mosaic supplanted by the Christian dispensation. Virtually the handwriting was upon the wall—begun though not finished—when John the Baptist commenced his ministry.

Hence, as an initial step, "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" was as the herald of doom to the temple worship, and the Mosaic ritual; the second step towards the "vanishing away" of that dispensation may be recognized in the scene on the Mount of Transfiguration; there stands Moses the legislator of the peishing dispensation—he who said fifteen centuries before—"a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you like unto me, and to him shall ye hearken." That prophet now stood before Moses on the mountain top. Moses was there to lay down his credentials at the feet of Jesus, and when on the cross the Saviour said, "it is finished," and gave up the ghost, and the veil of the temple was rent in twain, the handwriting was finished, and the temple had no longer a standing before God.

THE CHRISTIAN NATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning July 1.
P. 35: 8-22.

THE question appointed for discussion is, "What has Christianity done for our country?" Perhaps, the most honest answer would be that it has done all that we would allow it to do. It has done so much that it is a marvel that it has not done more. It is capable of effecting transformations so blessed and so beneficent, of working such changes in business, in society and in government, that did we let it exert its power, heaven might be begun here below. The problems that perplex us, the social anomalies that gail us and the anxieties that make our lives a burden, would disappear if Christianity were the rule of private, social and public life. We already owe to it the refining, civilizing, moral influences which have raised the nation to its present high plane. Our hospitals, our charities and our various institutions for the alleviation of suffering and the relief of poverty, had their origin in the love that Jesus manifested and kindled in the hearts of his people. The Sunday rest, the sanctity of home and family ties, the merciful treatment of unfortunates and wrongdoers are all fruits of Christianity's influence. They do not exist where Christianity in some form does not operate on the public conscience. So far have we progressed from the old system of autocratic rule and disregard of the welfare of the people. The last century has seen the greatest advances, because Christ and his principles have been better understood than ever before. By no previous generation since his earthly life closed have he and his mission been so clearly seen and appreciated as by this. And the light is growing. We see now the meaning and value of much that he said, which our fathers did not see, and as we see more, society will approximate more and more nearly to his ideal. Yet Christ had nothing to say about government or social institutions. He repudiated all authority on the matter and even refused to interfere in a case of disputed inheritance. His reliance for the reform of society was on the reform of the individual. The broad principles of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man which he labored to instill in the hearts of his followers, are sufficient for the regeneration of our social relations. It is these principles on which is built all of good there is in our land and to the growing influence of these principles we look for the brightness of the future. It is these principles that the missionary carries to heathen lands and he sees that there they produce the same fruit of love and kindness and helpfulness. So shall the seed be sown broadcast and bear its fruit in every land until all the nations become the kingdom of Christ.

THE TENEMENT CHAPTER.

Few even among the King's Daughters have any idea of the extent of the work being quietly done by the Tenement House Chapter of this royal order. A contributor to the "Silver Cross," who is evidently acquainted with its details, gives a sketch of it which deserves careful perusal. The work is genuine charity of the most Christly kind. It is not the charity which contents itself with a money gift, but one that seeks wisely and intelligently to fulfill the command, "Bear ye one another's burdens." The Superintendent's room gives the key to the character of the work. Here is the general resort of all the people in the neighborhood who are in any kind of acute trouble. The woman who wants some one to intercede with her landlord for time with the rent; the woman who must go out to work, but wants her children taken care of while she is away; the woman who wants some one to give her growing daughter a word of advice about her behavior; the woman who has an old blind father and wants some influence to get him into a home; the woman whose husband is out of work and would like him to get a place in the street-cleaning department—all these and others with almost infinite variety of needs come to the Superintendent as to a personal friend, and are sure that all she can do, she will do for them. Then there is another room which never lacks visitors. Little shoes and stockings, the gifts of King's Daughters in near and far away cities, and little garments made with their own hands, are neatly stored in this room. Mothers come they can dig to their hearts' delight, anywhere except the border where the potted plants are. These the bigger children water and tend and make pets of. Every Circle in New York and Brooklyn should send a deputation to see the work in this delightful home of the Chapter and should see that it wants for nothing.

THE COLUMBUS, Y. M. C. A.

On this page is a picture of the handsome home of the Young Men's Christian Association of Columbus, O. It is a substantially built edifice of five stories, covering a site of sixty feet by a hundred and eighty-seven. The cost of the land and building was $125,000. The association which has the gratification of possessing the commodious quarters was organized in 1875, and has made an uninterrupted advance from the beginning. It has now a membership of nearly four hundred, of which the active list comprises fully one third. The association has an active boys' auxiliary of 160 members, with rooms assigned for its use in the new building. The work is thorough in all its branches. A small but well-selected library of three hundred volumes, and a spacious reading-room renders the rooms a favorite place of resort, and the well with their ragged barefooted little ones, explaining that they are out all day working and all their earnings are spent in food, and they have no money to buy materials, nor time to make them up. Cannot the little one have some particular garment? The Visitor will see if this story is true, and if so, the mother will get what she needs. The Visitor looks after the sick and can dispose of any quantity of arrowroot and other sick-room viands. Tea and sugar, and almost anything eatable or drinkable she can place where it will be appreciated. She can even do a business, and does it, in sewing machines, for there are women who must temporarily, at any rate, stay at home and if they can have the use of a sewing machine for a few days or weeks they can turn the time to advantage for themselves or in working for the stores. Besides this branch of the work, there are organizations in the headquarters at 77 Madison street, which are doing valuable service. There is a kindergarten for the children, a club and sewing class for the big girls, a mothers' sewing circle and a paradise for children in the back yard, which is dignified with the name of the King's Garden where equipped gymnasium, baths, etc., are attractions which are appreciated by the young men of the city.

THE SOUTHERN BAPTISTS.

There appears to have been a drawn battle in the South on the subject of the Baptist Young People's Union. There was no question raised at the Dallas Convention as to the recognition of the Union. It had to be recognized, seeing that it was in existence. Indeed, more than one of the ministers pointed out that the denomination would suffer loss if its young people were not trained to Christian activity. It was also apprehended that the denomination might suffer loss if the young people desiring training and finding no opportunity provided under Baptist auspices, should seek it in other organizations. The pastors realizing this fact, recognized and approved the Union and decided to take hold of it and control it. The divergence arose as to the extent to which it should be controlled. A committee was appointed to consider this question. Its report recommended large individuality. It advised leaving the control to the individual churches, making each Union practically autonomous. Dr. Eaton was anxious to legislate on this point. He wished to make it prohibitory for a union to unite with any outside body or even to affiliate with the International Union. It was evident that a resolution to affiliate could not be carried, but, on the other hand, the resolution prohibiting affiliation was rejected. The debate was vigorous, but it ended with the prudent compromise of leaving the Unions absolutely free to affiliate or not as each might be disposed. It was understood, however, that there would be no objection to city or State organization and it is probable that the Unions will perceive the advantage to be gained by such combination.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The meeting of the Nebraska State Epworth League, which will be held at Grand Island June 21-24, is expected to be the greatest convention of Methodist workers ever assembled in the state.

Over three hundred delegates attended the semi-annual convention of the Epworth Leagues of the New York East Conference at Rye, N. Y., on June 7th. In addition to routine business and papers by various members, an address was given by Rev. John O. Wilson, D.D., of Brooklyn.

The State convention, held at Topeka, Kan., May 24-27, was attended by nearly 1,800 delegates. Dr. F. E. Clark and Mr. J. W. Baer made addresses. The daily sunrise prayer meetings were crowded, and on the closing evening there were eight mass meetings in different parts of the city.

The members of the Epworth League represented at the recent conference at Lamont, Iowa, numbered 2,500. The reports read and the papers prepared show that the Leagues in that district are imbued with an earnest, aggressive spirit, and are doing the right kind of work.

The Epworth League Convention of the Nebraska Conference was held at Beatrice. It was the most enthusiastic yet held in the State. More than 400 delegates, besides the Beatrice contingent, attended the convention. Dr. Crook, chancellor of the Nebraska Wesleyan University, presided at the first sessions.

The Maryland Council of King's Daughters held its annual meeting recently in Washington, D. C. The sessions were held in the Church of the Ascension. The officers elected for the year were: President, Mary C. Davenport, of Anacostia; Vice-President, Miss Griffith, of Baltimore; Secretary and Treasurer, Mrs. Roome, of Mount Pleasant.

Through the efforts made in behalf of the sailors by the societies of San Francisco, Oakland, San Diego and Eureka, Cal., 300 signers of the Endeavor pledge have been gained among the men employed on British vessels. One vessel had not a Christian in the crew on its arrival at San Francisco carried with it when it sailed an Endeavor Society numbering thirteen.

The "Baptist Young People's Union" says that the attendance at the approaching National Convention at Toronto, July 19-22, will be so large as to require a double set of meetings, at least at the evening services, to accommodate the people. The Metropolitan M. E. Church, which has a capacity for 2,500, has been very kindly placed at the disposal of the Convention. The church is only a few feet from Massey Music Hall, in which the principal meetings are to be held.

The New Jersey Epworth League Convention at Camden continued two days. The reports of the officers showed progress all along the line. That of the corresponding secretary, showed 243 Senior Leagues with 28,772 members; 146 Junior, with 7,942 members; total, 389 chapters, 36,714 members; an increase during the year of 88 chapters, 13,007 members. Two hundred and seventy-eight chapters reported having raised $21,904.90. There are five city unions: Newark, Camden, Elizabeth, Jersey City and Paterson. S. H. Thompson, superintendent of Junior work, reported an increase of seventy-five chapters and 4,500 members since the last convention.

Our Children's Happy Day.

Arrival of the first Contingent at "The Christian Herald Children's Home" at Nyack—A Delightful and Surprising Experience for the Little Ones.

OPENING-DAY in "The Children's Home," established at Nyack-on-the-Hudson by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has come and gone, and the beautiful charity is now in full and successful operation. It was a bright, sunny afternoon when the first battalions of eager youngsters were gathered from their homes in the tenements and taken to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, where they were marshalled in line before a physician for medical examination. Such an array of anxious faces as they stood up to undergo the ordeal of "passing the doctor!" One by one, they were looked over, and apprehension gave way to open smiles of gladness as the words were pronounced that qualified them for ten days of such enjoyment as hardly any of them had ever known in their lives. Only two out of the entire band of twenty-five bright eyed little lasses were rejected, as they were suffering from some temporary ailment which might have proved infectious; but they were greatly consoled by a trifling gift and the promise that they could report again and, in all probability, they might be taken to the Home a few weeks hence.

After the examination, our children were taken in charge by a missionary, each little girl being supplied with a canvas bag, in which she was told to put the parcel of belongings she had brought with her for the ten days' outing. These bags served a double purpose, being more convenient to carry than parcels, which are liable to come loose or get lost, and serving also to identify the children, in the event of any of them straying from the main party—each bag being clearly marked on the outside with the address: "Christian Herald Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y." Then, after a short ride on the street cars to the wharf at the foot of West Tenth street, our young excursionists were safely embarked on the steamer "Chrystenah." The sail up the Hudson was like a journey heavenward to the little ones, who made the deck resound with their gleeful shouts and merry prattle. The steamer made her dock at Nyack shortly before 6 P. M. There the party was met by the large and handsome wagonette which Dr. Louis Klopsch has placed at the service of our Children's Home for the season. There was much merriment among the young folks in securing seats. At last all were comfortably settled in the wagonette and with a crack of the whip, the drive to Mont Lawn was begun, through a most beautiful country. On the way they pointed out to each other in admiring surprise the grassy fields, the hedges and the wild flowers. They could hardly be restrained. It was a new wonderland into which they had come; for many had never seen the country before, their little lives having been passed amid the tall tenements and river trip and mountain drive. Miss Faulhaber, the Superintendent, asked a blessing, and then plates of cold roast beef, dishes of sugared cherries, strawberries with "real cream" (as one chit slyly observed), dainty cakes and piles of bread and butter disappeared almost magically. There were some amusing incidents of awkwardness at the table, but on the whole our children behaved very creditably.

Supper ended, the children were led to the dormitory they were to occupy, and their pleasure on seeing the trim iron cots, with their snowy spreads and nice surroundings, was shown in many expressions of delight. It was all beyond their comprehension that anybody should take so much thought for them and bring them to such an enchanted realm. And as they emptied their satchels and stowed away their few belongings in the neat little lockers, they rubbed their eyes and wondered still more. It was all so strange! Some were pinching themselves to see if they were really awake. Yes, there were the lockers, each like a little chest, and every girl had a whole one for her own self. While they stood there, an attendant fastened on each locker a label bearing the name of the child who was to use it.

Next, a short visit was made to the chapel, where a brief evening service was held. After an opening hymn, in which the piping trebles joined shrilly, they listened to a little talk by the Superintendent. She told them among other things what their duties would be, and how they could serve the Lord by obeying the rules of the Home. Then all HERALD Food Fund. Similar accessions were made daily until the complement was full and the Home comfortably crowded. After a ten days' stay, they will be returned to their homes in the city and new relays will take their places. Thus far, our Children's Home experiment has been a complete success, and there is no happier household between the Atlantic and the Rockies than the family at Mont Lawn.

The Eye that Sees Beauty.

If one were compelled to choose between foregoing the seeing of splendid art galleries of great cities, or the sight of country fields and lanes spangled in the early spring with the golden dandelions and later with white and red clover and wild phlox and tiger lilies and all the common wild flowers that grow spontaneously wherever they can, who would prefer the art galleries? Yet the lanes and the fields yield these delights to the poorest as well as the richest, says a writer in "The Interior." All that is needed for any one to enter into and possess this rich inheritance of beauty and delight, an inheritance that brings no care and whose enjoyment leaves no sting, is the seeing eye and the hearing ear.

REBUKING CHILDREN.

PROBABLY most parents, even kindly ones, writes Helen Hunt Jackson, would be a little startled at the assertion that a child ought never to be reproved in the presence of others. This is so constant an occurrence that nobody thinks of noticing it; nobody thinks of considering whether it be right and best or not. But it is a great rudeness to a child. I know a mother who had the insight to see this, and the patience to make it a rule; for it takes far more patience, far more time, than the common method.

Once I saw her little boy behave so boisterously and rudely at the dinner table, in the presence of guests, that I said to myself, "Surely, this time she will have to break her rule, and reprove him publicly." I saw several telegraphic signals of rebuke, entreaty and warning flash from her gentle eyes to his; but nothing did any good. Nature was too much for him; he could not at that time force himself to be quiet. Presently she said, in a perfectly easy and natural tone, "O Charley, come here a minute! I want to tell you something!" No one at the table supposed that it had anything to do with his behavior. As she whispered to him, I alone saw his cheek flush, and that he looked quickly and imploringly into her face; I alone saw that tears were almost in her eyes. But she shook her head, and he went back to his seat with a manful but very red little face. In a few moments he laid down his knife and fork and said: "Mamma, will you please to excuse me?" "Certainly, my dear," she said. Nobody but me understood it, or observed that the little fellow had to run very fast to get out of the room without crying. Afterward she told me that she never sent a child away from the table in any other way.

OPENING OUR CHILDREN'S HOME AT NYACK—ARRIVAL OF THE FIRST PARTY AT MONT LAWN.

streets innocent of a particle of verdure. A few pleaded with the driver to stop that they might descend from the wagonette and pick some birch. When they clambered into their seats again, their arms were full of daisies and buttercups, over which they lavished ecstasies of praise. The singing of the birds in the trees overhead awoke the music in their own hearts and soon the wagonette, like a happy chariot, was a burst of childish song!

In about twenty minutes after leaving the dock, the children reached the Home at Mont Lawn, and the wagonette drew up in front of the chapel where a photograph was taken, which is reproduced on this page. This operation caused much amusement among the youngsters. They were then ushered into the private dining room in the main building, and after a few minutes devoted to washing their hands, were seated at the table, where they ate heartily of a nice supper. It was intended to make this first meal for our new-comers a more than usually tempting one, and they did it ample justice, their appetites sharpened by the repeated a brief prayer, which was followed by the "Lord's Prayer" and the evening hymn:

Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me,
Bless thy little lamb to-night;
Thro' the darkness be thou near me,
Watch my sleep till morning light.

It was now 7:15 P. M., and our children were let loose for a frolic on the smooth lawn. They enjoyed their romp thoroughly for an hour, being rather constrained at first, however, and bewildered by all about them; but the freedom of childhood soon made them familiar with their surroundings. At 8 P. M. the retiring bell sounded, and the children entered the dormitory tired but very happy, and soon the attendants had them snugly covered up in bed and fast asleep.

On the following day, twenty-five boys came up to Mont Lawn from the city, the second detachment. On the two days following fifty came—boys and girls—the first hundred being composed exclusively of little ones whose parents had been helped during the past winter by THE CHRISTIAN

"It is Sunday—is it not?" came from Mrs. Williams' companion.

"Yes, and a beautiful Sabbath, sir. I'm always grateful for a lovely Lord's Day."

"You were praying, just now. Did you pray for me?"

"Yes, I have been praying constantly for you all the morning—and yesterday—and night before."

"Thank you!"

The weak voice, she could have fancied it was weaker every time she listened to it, spoke again after a long pause.

"Are you not in the habit of reading your Bible on Sundays when you do not go to church?"

"Always." She arose with alacrity, and took the well-worn Book from its cushioned stand. "If you don't mind I should like to look over a Psalm, or a bit of the Gospels. They hearten a body up amazingly."

He waited until she settled her eyeglasses, and opened her Bible.

"Would it weary you to read a few verses aloud?"

"Not at all." She would not display too much eagerness lest he should shrink back into the shell of polite reserve. "Have you any choice, sir?"

The answer was not prompt, and was enunciated lingeringly, indescribable pathos in the last inflections:

"If you please—the story of the thief on the Cross!"

He lay perfectly still while the pleasant voice, solemn with the weight of pious awe, rendered the tale:

"And when they came unto the place which is called 'The Skull,' there they crucified him—and the malefactors—one on the right hand, and one on the left.

"And Jesus said, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!' And, parting his garments among them, they cast lots.

"And the people stood beholding. And the rulers also scoffed at him, saying, 'He saved others; let him save himself; if this is the Christ of God, his chosen.'

"And the soldiers also mocked him, coming to him, offering him vinegar, and saying, 'If thou art the King of the Jews, save thyself!'

"And there was also a superscription over him—

"This is the King of the Jews."

"And one of the malefactors that were hanged, railed on him, saying, 'Art thou not the Christ? Save thyself and us?'

"But the other answered, and rebuking him, said, 'Dost thou not even fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we, indeed, justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss.'

"And he said, 'Jesus! Lord, remember me, when thou comest into thy kingdom.'

"And he said unto him, 'Verily I say unto thee, to-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise!'

The reverent accents ceased, and there was a stillness that might be felt. The sunken eyes appeared to gaze upon a pencil of sunshine slipping stealthily along the wall; the lips murmured no thanks; Mrs. Williams crossed the room with her soundless step to lay the Bible upon its pillow.

"I remember," she said, softly, to herself as much as to the possible auditor, "hearing an old preacher say once that 'we had one such story given to us in God's Word, that none might despair, and only one that none might presume.' You may have heard, too, sir, of John Wesley's answer to the lady who told him that there was no hope of her salvation; she felt herself to be a lost sinner. 'I am glad of that, madam,' says Mr. Wesley. 'Very glad of it.' 'How can you say so?' says she, quite horrified. 'Because I read in my Bible that Christ came to seek and to save that which is lost.' That anecdote has been a comfort to many a poor soul, I don't doubt. It has helped me more than once, I know, when I got down in my mind."

He shifted his position to bring her within eye-range.

"Do you believe them—When did you get that picture?"

A fine cabinet photograph of Mrs. Paull stood upon a miniature easel on the low mantel-shelf; a second and broader sun-ray lying athwart it.

As the nurse afterward related the incident, a light as bright broke in upon her mind; her heart beat suffocatingly—odd zigzags of flame hindered her vision. Professional caution and tact did not fail her, however.

"There, now!" in her creamiest legato—

"I don't wonder it catches your eye. That's a lovely lady I nursed through brain-fever a little over two years ago. She's had lots of trouble and sorrow—enough to kill most women, but she has been wonderfully supported through it all. I set a deal of store by her, and she knows that so well, she gave me her picture last Christmas. Maybe you'd like to look at it nearer, sir?"

He snatched—rather than accepted it from her—grasped it with both shaking hands, his eyes kindling hungrily. Eyes and fingers seemed as if they would never let it go.

"Excuse me for a minute, please!" said Mrs. Williams, the "etc.," in entire command of speech and action. "I must see how that beef-tea is getting on in the kitchen."

When out of his sight she fell upon her knees:

"Dear Lord! give me light enough for the next step! Thou, who canst save to the uttermost, have mercy upon this wandering soul!"

A strange, choking cry—a horrid rattling sound—made her fly into the outer room. Ernest Paull had raised himself upon his elbow; his right hand plucked convulsively at his breast, his eyes, wild and imploring, besought help which mortal skill could not render.

The struggle was fearfully brief. Even as she raised him in her arms that air might enter the closing lungs, his frame relaxed; with one last effort he lifted his wife's picture to his lips, and the life fluttered forth.

CHAPTER XX.

What could I do, O blessed Guide and Master!
Other than this?
Still to go on as now, not slower, faster,
Nor fear to miss
The road, although so very long it be,
While led by thee.
Step after step, feeling thee close beside me,
Although unseen:
Through thorns, through flowers, whether the tempest
Or heavenly serene— I hide thee,
Assured thy faithfulness cannot betray
Nor love decay. —Susan Coolidge.

Eighteen months after Ernest Paull's death, his widow and eldest son drove one moonlight evening, down to the village post-office, for the late mail. There were two mails a day in Pequot now, and a railroad in building on the other side of the lake from Pinehurst. The old Dutch neighborhood was waking up to the appreciation of the consequence, real and prospective, of a mountain-retreat within an hour by rail of the metropolis. "The store" had arisen a story in the world, and had a bran-new coat of paint that glistened under the full moon. There was a smarter look about the knot of village loafers gathered upon the porch and steps, some smoking, some whittling.

While Mrs. Paull waited in the buggy for her son's return from the interior of the building, she heard them talk of factory work, crops and general rural news. They were neither worse nor better than the average of men and lads who frequent the country-store, but as the idle chit-chat went on, the lady was disagreeably impressed by the bovine drawl, the slovenly dialect and low range of ideas of men who had passed their lives in a community where church-going was respectable, and schooling was, by law, obligatory. She had striven, unostentatiously, to do missionary work among these people, recognizing, at the outset, what many as earnest never perceive, and thereby tail in their ministry to those they would lift to higher levels; to-wit, that the native-born American, no matter what his birth, station or means, is never a peasant, and ignores resentfully the existence of such a class on this side of the Atlantic. She had discovered other things that pained and surprised her far more than the suspicious spirit of independence that, it rightly directed, leads to the right sort of self-respect. The tone of every-day morality among the "village people" was not a whit higher than in the slummiest quarters of the so-considered wicked city. The men and boys, with lamentably few exceptions, drank bad liquor, smoked and chewed vile tobacco and that incessantly, gamed and swore freely. The women were coarse and bold in their demeanor and notoriously lax in principle. It was not uncommon for girls of thirteen to marry boys but a few years older; wife-beating was a frequent occurrence, and a more common sight was husband and wife drinking together, while their children, ragged, barefoot and dirty, learned profanity and vice in the public roads. There were three churches in sight of the "Cross-road store," and pastors and Sunday School teachers who sought to draw in learners and co-workers. The common people stood aloof and on the defensive.

Aided by Marie and Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Paull had established a sewing and cooking class which met twice a week in a house in the village. Not a woman or girl would have walked the half-mile to Pinehurst to be taught anything. The attitude—conscious and habitual—of the "native born" ignoramus is patronage of those who would help him to rise. Women washed and scrubbed for their better-to-do neighbors with the air of conferring a favor, receiving payments for the same with supercilious toleration, irresistibly funny to those who had too much sense to let it irritate them. If it pleased Mrs. Paull to teach the children to sew, and to give them the aprons and frocks they made; to invite the wives of the operatives to help her play cook two afternoons in the week, and to tell them to carry home the food they prepared,—they let her have her way, some good-humoredly, some contemptuously—none gratefully. The same state of feeling prevailed with respect to the Bible-class held on Wednesday night in the new "hall" over the store. When they felt like it, they came, when they did not feel like it, they stayed away.

The field was not encouraging. She had confessed this to Lanier on the drive down: "I do not lose heart, simply because I know that I owe a duty to my neighbor, and that I am trying to fulfil it to the best of my light and knowledge. It is the duty that lies nearest my hand." Hence, it is God's will that I should do it. As Mr. Stevens says, what comes of it is none of my business. Each of us as a soldier in the ranks. When the Commander says, 'Come,' or 'Go,' 'Do this,' or 'Do that,' we have no choice but to obey. Human nature in Pequot is Water street human nature. The rural district is not Arcadia, but it is good for me to find here what Byron coveted when he began the study of German—something craggy to break his mind upon." I have learned, long ago, that merely sentimental Christianity cannot labor effectively in a severely practical world, where dirt and poverty go hand-in-hand, and those who are in the direst need of moral and spiritual help, are the most averse to receiving such help.

"A clear case of 'I will be drowned! No body shall help me!'"

"Exactly that! Fortunately there is One who sees the end from the beginning, and appoints to each day its 'tender tasking.'"

She had bowed pleasantly to the group of loungers when the buggy drew up at the store, and Lanier had lifted his hat. The men nodded, not a hand moving to the brim of hat, or cap. Then, they had gone on talking, rather more loudly than before to prove how uncowed they were by a refined presence.

Mrs. Paull comprehended the drift of all this by this time, and did not feel indignant or wounded by behavior that would have offended her sense of fitness had the boorishness manifested itself in men of a different stamp. She noted, instead, with silent gratification, that not an oath was uttered in her hearing, or an unclean word. The mind at leisure from carking preoccupation in the morrow, discerns and gets all the sweetness out of such grains of comfort.

The end of the upper story inhabited by the store-keeper's family was lighted, and a window was open in one room, the evening being bland. Presently somebody—the wife or daughter of the proprietor—began to play upon a melodeon.

She did not play even mechanically well, tripping once in awhile over a key, and hurrying or retarding the time according to a system of her own; the instrument wheezed asthmatically when certain keys were pressed, and twice in one tune which was unfamiliar to the performer, the wind gave out through her forgetfulness of the duty her foot owed to the pedal.

But when a woman's and a man's voice arose in a hymn-tune, the hum of talk upon the porch ceased. Not a man moved while the sacred song went on. It was taken, of course, from a Moody and Sankey collection. No's. 1, 2 and 3, of "Gospel Hymns" are to be found in every farm or village-house, as surely as churn and sewing-machine.

In the windless night, they heard every word. The heart of one listener was a harp, with each chord tense and a thrill in response to the remembered strain:

I need thee every hour,
Most gracious Lord!
No tender voice like thine
Can peace afford.

Several voices among the lower group joined in the refrain, very softly, not to disturb the musicians above-stairs:

I need thee, oh, I need thee!
Every hour I need thee,
O, bless me now, my Saviour!
I come to thee!

It was the "cry of the human" of every degree.

Lanier was in his seat by his mother while the first verse was in singing. He did not touch the reins until the last repetition of the chorus died away, and neither of the two spoke before the top of the first hill was reached. The road skirted the edge of the lake, which was tull from the autumnal rains. The head of water pouring over the dam raised a deep-toned shout, which was taken up by the listening hills. Clouds of spray were rising from the rocks, glittering like diamond-dust, and beading with pearls the outermost boughs of the hemlock wood on the other side of the rocky way. Just where the lake gathered itself into a smooth sheet for the plunge, a thicket of witch-hazel was studded with numberless stars. The hills dreamed upon the horizon; the stars pale, but constant, held to their courses in the gray-blue canopy of a world at rest.

"It will be four years next month!" Mrs. Paull mused aloud. "That hymn brought it all back so vividly that for a moment I thought I could not bear it. I held still, and the pain passed, as all pains must pass by His grace."

"My boy! never distrust him! Paul meant much when he told his neophytes that he 'would have them without carefulness.' It was the echo of the Master's will."

A NEW AND CHARMING SERIAL

ENTITLED:

"ZEROLA OF NAZARETH,"

A Story of Palestine in the Days of Paul the Apostle;

Expressly written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

By a Brilliant young American Author, W. J. THOROLD,

WILL BEGIN IN OUR ISSUE OF JULY 4th.

This remarkably interesting narrative is based on Scriptural events and deals with some of the most dramatic incidents in the early Christian Church.

It is a Story that Should be Read in Every Christian Home in America. DON'T FAIL TO READ IT, AND TELL YOUR FRIENDS ABOUT IT.

ALL THINGS WELL.*

NOW in a song of grateful praise,
To thee, O, Lord, my voice I'll raise;
With all thy saints I'll join to tell,
My Jesus hath done all things well.
My soul, with joy his power confess;
His wisdom all his works express;
But, oh, his love, what tongue can tell?
My Jesus hath done all things well.
How great and how divinely free,
Has been the love that found out me!
Which plucked me from the jaws of hell;
My Jesus hath done all things well.
And since my soul hath known his love,
What mercies hath he made me prove!
Mercies which do all praise excel;
My Jesus hath done all things well.
Soon shall I pass the vale of death,
And in his arms shall lose my breath;
Yet then my happy soul shall tell,
My Jesus hath done all things well.
And when to that bright world I rise
To join the anthems in the skies,
Above the rest this note shall swell,
My Jesus hath done all things well.

A Card Fiend's Story.

His Vice Ruins Him and Drives a Brother to Suicide—A Vow Over a Corpse.

FEW days ago a bright intelligent man was walking the streets of New York seeking employment. He was only one of thousands who had left home that morning on the same weary quest. But he ought not to have been idle, for he was well educated, could speak English, French and German, and had been well trained in a German University. Besides, in spite of his worn clothes, he had the bearing of a gentleman, and his manner was refined and courteous. But he had no money, and was anxious to earn some if he could do so honestly. His search for work, like that of ninety-nine in every hundred in these days, was futile. No one needed his help. Had he been a horse or a mule there were many who would gladly have given him shelter and food, and he needed no more; but being a man, he was at a disadvantage.

He was feeling very despairing, when a man whom he had known in former years accosted him, and finding that he was looking for work, offered him a position at five dollars a day in his "place." "I know what you can do, Henry Meyer," he said, "I know you are trustworthy and I'll be glad to have you."

The man addressed as Henry Meyer shook his head. "No," he said, "I know your place, but I have sworn never to touch a card again, and I will not come. I had rather starve to death."

He spoke so resolutely that the other forbore to press him and left him to his fate. It did not disturb him. He did not hesitate about his answer and he did not regret having given it. Yet, a short time ago no employment would have been so congenial to him as that in a gambling place. Plenty of people still remember him as "the card-fiend," and tell of his skill and wonderful luck. Why then did he refuse the position? What reason was there for his horror at the idea of gambling? A very sufficient reason, as will be seen from his story, which he told to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A year ago last March he was sitting in a private room in Homburg, Europe's notorious gambling resort. Opposite to him was a man slightly younger than himself, whose black mustache was in strange contrast to his closely-cropped light hair. Neither troubled himself about the other's appearance, for each was intent on the cards. The game was to continue till one or the other was "broke." The young man had introduced himself to Meyer that morning with the frank remark that Meyer had been pointed out to him the previous day as the card fiend of phenomenal luck, and he had felt a desire to test his power for himself. Meyer accepted the challenge and an appointment was made.

Meyer's luck was that to which he was accustomed. He always won, although he never kept his winnings long. Racing and betting, and the lavish generosity to friends, which so often characterizes the inveterate gambler, soon denuded him of his booty. On this day in March, 1893 the stakes all went his way. The other man was piqued, and when all his money was gone, he went out and borrowed more. That, too, was lost, and Meyer's winnings that afternoon amounted to sixty thousand marks (about $14,000). When his last mark was gone, the younger man rose from the table without a word and went into the garden. Meyer waited to see if he would return. As he still sat at the table, he heard a pistol shot. Instinctively he realized what had happened. He ran into the garden, and there on the turf lay the man with whom he had been playing, shot by his own hand. Horror-stricken that the man should have committed suicide, he loosened his clothing in the hope that it might not be death, but only a swoon from which he might recover. As he threw back the man's coat and vest, some papers fell from an inner pocket, among which was the photograph of a lady. Meyer looked at it, and, to his amazement, recognized it as the portrait of his own mother. Turning to the letters that were with the portrait, he found that they were addressed to his younger brother, whom he had not seen since they were boys together. One searching look at the face, now placid in death, was sufficient. In spite of the marks of years and the dyed mustache, he knew that the dead face was the face of his brother.

Realizing to the full as he looked at that dead body the awful nature of the business in which he was engaged, he raised his hand toward heaven and vowed that, God helping him, he would never touch a card again as long as he lived. He returned to the room where his winnings still lay, and took from them enough to repay what his brother had borrowed and to pay his own fare back to America, and left the remainder there. It seemed to him to be the price of his brother's blood, and he recoiled from the touch of it. His vow he has been enabled to keep to this day. Although unable to find employment, and although tempted on all hands to return to a gambler's life, he has preferred to suffer, if necessary to die, rather than break his vow.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE:—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me, whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation.

Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

THE ABOVE LETTER from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures Consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza, and all Chest Afflictions.

FOR YEARS I HAVE BEEN ENTREATED to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however,

I HAVE BEEN ABLE TO EXTEND MY ORGANIZATION

so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American Depot which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

IT ACTS LIKE A CHARM in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, etc., and should be kept in every home.

EVERY PERSON SUFFERING from Chest Disease and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the lungs or decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cents, or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75 or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

Recalling the "Food Fund."

Count Andre Bobrinskoy's Article in a Leading Russian Magazine.

WHEN Rev. Dr. Talmage and Dr. Klopsch, the editor and proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, visited Russia two years ago to superintend the distribution of the cargo of food sent over on the steamship "Leo," they found many warm-hearted Russians awaiting them with a most cordial reception. One of those who evinced the greatest friendship for the Americans was Count Andre Bobrinskoy, a Russian noble of high rank and great influence at the Imperial Court. It was through Count Bobrinskoy, as chairman of the Central Committee having supreme charge of the relief work throughout Russia during the famine year, that extraordinary facilities were afforded for the distribution of the "Leo's" cargo in the sixteen smitten interior provinces.

In a recent issue of the leading Russian monthly magazine, "Russki Vestnik," there appears an able article from the pen of Count Bobrinskoy, on the subject of the aid extended by America to Russia during the famine. He mentions the several cargoes of breadstuffs that were sent out on the steamers "Missouri," "Indiana" and "Conemaugh," and then proceeds, substantially as follows: "Then came the religious paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which sent $9,300 pounds* of flour by the steamship 'Leo.' All this naturally excited a warm, reciprocal feeling of friendship on the part of Russia toward America, and has created a great debt of love which Russia is unable to pay." In another part of the same article, he says:

"The fifth and last of the American ships—the 'Leo'—came to Russia on July 14th, being chartered by the religious journal, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is published in New York. At the same time, came Dr. Klopsch, the proprietor, and Pastor Talmage, the editor. This noted pastor has a great reputation in the United States and in England both as preacher and writer. The cargo of the 'Leo' was given in charge of a separate committee in St. Petersburg, and the two delegates were received with the greatest cordiality by the General-Lieutenant Von Wahl, and entertained at a banquet in the Dohina (City Hall). There they were welcomed in an address by Mayor Prokoviev. He recalled the fact that in the summer of 1866—at an eventful period in American history—an official expression of the international friendship and affection existing between the two countries had taken place. Russian sympathy for America was then made strongly manifest and now, the citizens of America had come to extend their sympathy and condolences to Russia and to help her in her 'hunger-time.' A number of years ago some one had sent to the Emperor, Nicholas, a root from an American tree and that root, planted in the Tsarsitsen Island, near the capital, had grown to be a great tree. Now the Americans have sent to Russia another and greater root—the root of brother-love and friendship and humanity, as typified in the food-laden

For Nervous Prostration

Use Horford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. A. TRAU, Philadelphia Pa. says: "I have extensively used it in nervous prostration and kindred affections, and invariably obtained very good results."

An Asthma Cure at Last

Europe, an physician and medical journals report a powerful cure for Asthma, in the Kola plant, found on the Congo River, West Africa. The Kola Importing Co., 1154 Broadway, New York, are sending free trial cases of the Kola Compound by mail to all sufferers from Asthma, who send name and address on a postal card. A trial costs you nothing.

ships. They might be sure it had not been sent in vain; that the Russian people can be thankful. True friendship can only be revealed in the time of distress. The speaker therefore expressed the thanks of the citizens of St. Petersburg and of all Russia to the people of America. When he had concluded, a special delegate from the Imperial Court came forward and tendered thanks to Drs. Talmage and Klopsch in the name of the Czar."

Count Bobrinskoy comprehensively reviews the entire efforts of the year in America for the relief of Russia. His article is a valuable official contribution to the history of one of the most magnificent sympathetic demonstrations of the century—an experience in which thousands of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had a prominent part, since it was their crowning gift that evoked from Russia the burning words of gratitude and friendship already quoted.

FATAL POLLY.

The following instance of the almost incredible superstition, ignorance, and credulity of the Eastern people is related by "The Observer," Bangkok, Siam: A Buddhist priest at Bau-Hua-Kra-boi, near Sapa-tome, pretended that he had it in his power to make people invulnerable by tattooing them. Great numbers came to profit by his art, and he amassed considerable wealth from his deluded patients. Among these was a man named Dang, who invited a number of his acquaintance to witness a test of the charm, and in their presence placed a loaded gun to his mouth, pulling the trigger with his toe. The result was fatal.

FREE! 11 YEARS WITHOUT HEARING.

The following is worthy of careful perusal:

I suffered intensely from Catarrh for 11 years; nose stopped up, continually dripping down in the throat, especially in the morning, accompanied by a dry hacking cough; I took cold on the least exposure, and had a continuous dull headache, a roaring, buzzing, cracking and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail and for eleven years I was almost entirely deaf—which was continually becoming worse. Every remedy I tried failed. Without much hope I commenced the use of the Home Etherizing Medication, the first application was simply wonderful. My hearing rapidly returned, and now I can hear a conversation without the least difficulty, and I suffer no inconvenience in any way from the disease. A few months' treatment has entirely cured my catarrh.

A WICKED EASTERN CAPITAL.*

FROM Singapore it is but a short distance, with direct communication by steamer, to the great kingdom of Anam, with its twenty millions of people, without a single missionary. Singapore is the natural centre for this, at present at least. . . . The need of English work is very great in Singapore. Our friends took us one night down Malay street, and we would not dare to describe too vividly the scenes we saw, and yet it is good for us to know something of this world's dark side. Every house in the long street on both sides was crowded in the open fronts with abandoned women of every nation under heaven, and they not only stood and sat on the open verandahs, but swarmed in the middle of the street taking hold of every passerby and literally almost dragging them to their dens. They were in all the costumes of all the races, and they shouted and shrieked in nearly all the languages under heaven, their calls to the passerby. And up and down and in and out were passing by hundreds of European men—sailors and soldiers, officers, low and even high, without a shame or effort of concealment.

On this street our brother holds a Gospel meeting every week, and with his voice of thunder he proclaims the Word of God to these wicked men and points his finger at them in sight of all the people as the men that are making the name of Christianity to be despised among the heathen. He tells us that the street is usually cleared a few minutes after he begins and these soundrels are glad to get away from the sound of his voice.

But we saw a sadder sight at Singapore than even Malay street. Our good missionary friends took us to see the Chinese opium dens. Our friend preached the Gospel to the Chinamen and they listened with earnest, kind faces that made our very hearts bleed, and when we got through, they just went on smoking again and seemed to sink back into despair. We asked him how many of the Chinese of Singapore indulge in this habit and he said at least eighty out of every hundred. We were appalled. And we felt that the devil was an awful master and that the power of Omnipotence alone could break the chain. We looked at their emaciated bodies and gaunt faces, and thought of how it would all end, and we asked them how it was going to end. They said they believed they would go to heaven for they always paid for the opium they used. Poor, lost human souls! Oh, let us pray for the heathen!

RING MONEY OF THE BIBLE.*

The ancient Egyptians are represented in contemporary paintings as weighing rings of metal, gold and white gold (i.e. silver), and keeping by them vessels containing piles of such weighed rings, each having, in all probability, its own distinctive value.

The money used by the children of Israel when they went to purchase corn in Egypt may have been of this ring shape, resembling the bronzed rings for arms and ankies still occasionally found in the bogs of Ireland and those used by uncivilized tribes in the South Seas. The Israelitish money is spoken of as bundles of money (Gen. 42: 35), and a similar phrase occurs in the Book of Deuteronomy (Deut. 14: 24-26), where the payment of tithes is permitted in money instead of kind, when distance prevents the journeying of flocks. The passage states, "then shalt thou turn it into money, and bind up the money in thine hand;" and this implies the use of ring money, or at all events of money in pieces that could be tied or fastened together.

This use of ring money, and its kindred one of ornament for the person, representing material and available cash, is spread through many Oriental nations, and in places still holds its own.

Nubia is one of the countries in which ornamental ring money is still used, and in the cabinets of the Numismatic Society may be seen some interesting specimens of Nubian ring money presented to the Society by the late Joseph Bonomi.

Amongst nomadic tribes especially, importance has always been attached to the visibility and portability of wealth, and ornaments for the use of their women offered a convenient form for the gratification of this idea. From the ornament being attached to the woman, it acquired a sort of taboo character, and interference with it was considered as an insult to the owner of the female slave. There was the convenience also for making that grand display of material property so dear to an Oriental mind, and the further advantage of an easy removal and negotiation in case of an urgent need.

Egyptian gold rings are to be seen in the University Museum at Leyden, and the same character of ornamental currency may be noted even in European countries.

A TRULY HAPPY HUNDRED!

How Our Children Passed Their First Sunday at Mont Lawn—The Home and its Surroundings a Well-Spring of Delight to the City Waifs.

LOOK! See what I've found—a lot o' them nice things what ladies wears in their hats." And the little girl of ten held up a lapful of something to the admiring gaze of a dozen or more tots of her own age. They were playing on the grassy slope in front of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont Lawn. There was a sudden rush, and three other girls those children, the happy hours they spent there. After the first contingent of twenty-five bright-eyed little misses, there came three other bands of equal numbers, so by the end of the week there was a merry hundred boys and girls in the Home. Every nook and corner of the place was explored; every cherry and apple tree viewed by the boys as to its possibilities for fruit, and every pretty wild-flower and blossoming shrub was a shrine of girlish admiration. They romped together on the lawns and grassy slopes, crowded the swings, played croquet, tag, leap-frog, hide-and-seek, bean-bag, jack-white-draped cots in the dormitories were instantly vacated, and the little folks began to dress for a breakfast of eggs, cocoa, bread-and-milk and berries, which was ready at eight, after a brief service in the chapel. At nine, they were summoned to morning prayers, after which seven of Superintendent Faulhaber's assistants, Misses Carter, Rodman, Johnson, Breen, Thompson and Collins and Mrs. Lemberg—instructed them in the Sunday School lesson to which they listened most attentively. Dinner was served at noon, consisting of roast beef, potatoes, sweet-corn, pie and bread-and-milk. Then our little ones were divided into groups and sat around the piazzas or on the cool, shady lawn, chatting with each other or listening wonderingly to the drowsy, mingled hum of bird, bee and insect life that filled the summer air. In the afternoon, at and sung in clear, ringing tones that echoed sweetly over the hillside, the visitors helping to swell the chorus.

One of the most captivating sights at Mont Lawn is the "hour of song" in the afternoon, when our children gather around "Old Glory" and wake the echoes with "Columbia" and "The Star-Spangled Banner." Our artist, in the picture on this page, has shown the little folks as they are assembling and just before the singing. Their fresh young voices, can be heard nearly as far down as the river, and passersby stop and look at the pretty tableau they form there, beneath the flag, the boys on one side, the girls on the other, and their teacher and leader between.

During the past week, still further improvements have been made at Mont Lawn, which is now conceded, by all who have each grabbed a fistful out of the extended lap, while one exclaimed:

"Its daisies! Oh, just to think! real daisies, and lots of 'em, too."

And with a chorus of "O-ohs!" and "Ahs!" half a hundred or more crowded about the first group, eager to see the latest wonder of this new realm into which they had come and which had already revealed to them so many wonderful things.

What a week that was at Mont Lawn! Never will be effaced from the memory of straws, puss-in-corner, and every conceivable game. The fun, the exercise, the free mountain air and the aromatic odors of the pines and maples, summoned the roses to the cheeks of the children, brought a healthy sparkle to the eyes, and gave each, withal, a most famous appetite that did ample justice to the nourishing fare set before them during their sojourn at Mont Lawn.

The first Sunday was another new experience for our children. Almost with the earliest tinkle of the rising-bell at seven, the four o'clock, Dr. Louis Klopsch arrived, accompanied by several ladies and gentlemen interested in the Home, and a pleasant and profitable hour was passed, the children listening with evident enjoyment to the kindly words that were then spoken. In the evening, after supper, an hour was spent in sacred song, and from the way in which all the young folks joined in the familiar hymns, it was evident that their hearts as well as their voices were in this pleasant exercise. Hymn after hymn was called for, visited it, to be a veritable children's paradise. A large tent for kitchen purposes has been erected, to which an abundant supply of pure water is conveyed by pipes. Additional swings have been put up for the children, and grounds staked out for croquet and other games. Time passes quickly and merrily at Mont Lawn, and our children think the days all too short, and their only regret is that they cannot be prolonged so that their ten days of trollic and freedom might last the whole summer through.

SAVE THE SABBATH.

Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Ex. 31: 13, "Varily, my Sabbaths ye shall keep."

THE wisdom of cessation from hard labor one day out of the seven is almost universally acknowledged. The world has found out that it can do less work in seven days than in six, and that the fifty-two days of the year devoted to rest are an addition rather than a subtraction. Experiments have been made in all departments. The great Lord Castlereagh thought he could work his brain three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, but after awhile broke down and committed suicide; and Wilberforce said of him, "Poor Castlereagh! This is the result of the non-observance of the Sabbath!"

A celebrated merchant declared: "I should have been a maniac long ago but for the Sabbath." The nerves, the brain, the muscles, the bones, the entire physical, intellectual and moral nature cry out for the Sabbatic rest. What is true of man is, for the most part, true of the brute. Travellers have found out that they come to their places of destination sooner when they let their horses rest by the way on the Sabbath. What is the matter with those forlorn creatures harnessed to some of the city cars? Why do they stumble and stagger and fall? It is for the lack of the Sabbatic rest.

In other days, when the herdsmen drove their sheep and cattle from the tar West down to the seaboard, it was found out by experiment that those herdsmen and drovers who halted over the seventh day got down sooner to the seaboard than those who passed on without the observance of the holy Sabbath. The fishermen off the coast of Newfoundland declare that those men during the year catch the most fish who stop during the Lord's Day.

When I asked the Rocky Mountain locomotive engineer why he changed locomotives when it seemed to be a straight route, he said: "We have to let the locomotive stop and cool off or the machinery would soon break down." Men who made large quantities of salt were told that if they allowed their kettles to cool over Sunday they would submit themselves to a great deal of damage. The experiment was made, some observing the Sabbath and some not observing the Sabbath. Those who allowed the fires to go down and the kettles to cool once a week were compelled to spend only a few pennies in the way of repairs; while in the cases where no Sabbath was observed, many dollars were demanded for repairs.

In other words, intelligent man, dumb beast, and dead machinery cry out for the Lord's Day. But while the attempt to kill the Sabbath by the stroke of axe and flail and yardstick has beautifully failed, it is proposed in our day to drown the Sabbath by flooding it with secular amusements. They would bury it very decently under the wreath of the target company and to the music of all brazen instruments.

There are to-day, in the different cities, ten thousand hands and ten thousand pens busy in attempting to cut out the heart of our Christian Sabbath, and leave it a bleeding skeleton of what it once was. The effort is organized and tremendous, and unless the friends of Christ and the lovers of good order shall rouse up right speedily, their sermons and protests will be uttered after the castle is taken. There are cities in the land where the Sabbath has almost perished, and it is becoming a practical question whether we who received a pure Sabbath from the hands of our fathers shall have piety and pluck enough to give to our children the same blessed inheritance. The eternal God helping us, we will!

I protest against this invasion of the holy Sabbath, in the first place, because it is a war on Divine enactment. God says, in Isaiah: "It thou turn away thy foot from doing thy pleasure on My holy day, thou shalt walk upon the high places." What did he mean by "doing thy pleasure?" He referred to secular and worldly amusements. A man told me he was never so much frightened as in the midst of an earthquake, when the beasts of the field bellowed in fear, and even the barn-yard fowls screamed in terror. Well, it was when the earth was shaking and the sky was all full of fire that God made the great announcement: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Go through the streets where the theatres are open on a Sabbath night; go up on the steps; enter the boxes of those places of entertainment, and tell me if that is keeping the Sabbath holy. "O," says some one, "God won't be displeased with a grand sacred concert." A gentleman who was present at a "grand sacred concert" one Sabbath night in one of the theatres of our great cities, said that during the exercises there were comic and sentimental songs, interspersed with coarse jokes; and there were dances, and a farce, and tight rope walking, and a trapeze performance. I suppose it was a holy dance and a consecrated tight rope. This is what they call a "grand sacred concert."

We hear a great deal of talk about "the rights of the people" to have just such amusements on Sunday as they want to have. I wonder if the Lord has any rights. You rule your family, the Governor rules the State, the President rules the whole land; I wonder if the Lord has a right to rule the nations and make the enactment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," and if there is any appeal to a high court from that decision, and if the men who are warring against that enactment are not guilty of high treason against the Maker of heaven and earth. They have in our cities put God on trial. It has been the theatres and the opera-houses, plaintiffs, versus the Lord Almighty, defendant: the suit has been begun, and who shall come out ahead, you know. Whether it be popular or unpopular, I now announce it as my opinion that the people have no rights save those which the great Jehovah gives them. He has never given the right to man to break his holy Sabbath, and as long as his throne stands, he never will give that right.

The prophet asks a question which I can easily answer, "Will a man rob God?" Yes. They robbed him last Sunday night at the theatres and the opera-houses, and I charge upon them the infamous and high-handed larceny. I hold the same opinion as a sailor I have heard of. The crew had been discharged from the vessel because they would not work while they were in port on the Lord's day. The captain went out to get sailors. He found one man and he said to him, "Will you serve me on the Sabbath?" "No." "Why not?" "Well," replied the old sailor, "a man who will rob God Almighty of his Sabbath would rob me of my wages if he got a chance."

Suppose you were poor, and you came to a dry-goods merchant and asked for some cloth for garments, and he should say, "I'll give you six yards;" and while he was off from the counter binding up the six yards you should go behind the counter and steal one additional yard. That is what every man does when he breaks the Lord's Sabbath. God gives us six days out of seven, reserving one for himself, and if you will not let him have it, it is mean beyond all computation.

Again: I am opposed to this desecration of the Sabbath by secular entertainments because it is a war on the statutes of most of the states. The law in New York State says:

It shall not be lawful to exhibit, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to the public, in any building, garden, grounds, concert room or other room or place within the city and county of New York, any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, ballet, play, farce, negro minstrelsy, negro or other dancing, or any other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein, or any equestrian, circus, or dramatic performance, or any performance of jugglers, acrobats, or rope-dancing."

Was there ever a plainer enactment than that? Who made the law? You, who at the ballot boxes decided who should go to Albany and sit in the Legislature. You who in any region exercise the right of suffrage. They made the law for you and for your families, and now I say that any man who at tempts to over-ride that law insults you and me and every man who has the right of suffrage.

Still further: I protest against the invasion of the Sabbath, because it is a foreign war. Now, if you heard at this moment the booming of a gun in the harbor, or if a shell from some foreign frigate should drop into your street, would you keep your seats in church? You would want to face the foe, and every gun that could be managed would be brought into use, and every ship that could be brought out of the Navy Yard would swing from her anchorage, and the question would be decided. You do not want a foreign war, and yet I have to tell you that this invasion of God's holy day is a foreign war.

As among our own native-born population there are two classes—the good and the bad; so it is with the people who come from other shores—there are the law-abiding and the lawless. The former are welcome here. The more of them the better we like it. But let not the lawless come from other shores expecting to break down our Sabbath, and institute in the place of it a foreign Sabbath.

How do you feel, ye who have been brought up amid the hills of New England, about giving up the American Sabbath? Ye who spent your childhood under the shadow of the Adirondacks or the Catskills; ye who were born on the banks of the Savannah, or Ohio, or Oregon, how do you feel about giving up the American Sabbath? You say: "We shall not give it up. We mean to defend it as long as there is left any strength in our arm, or blood in our heart! Do not bring your Spanish Sabbath here. Do not bring your Italian Sabbath here. Do not bring your French Sabbath here. Do not bring your foreign Sabbath here. It shall be for us and our children forever a pure, consecrated, Christian, American Sabbath."

I will make a comparison between the American Sabbath, as some of you have known it, and the Parisian Sabbath. I speak from observation. On a Sabbath morning I was aroused in Paris by a great sound in the street. I said: "What is this?" "O," they said, "this is Sunday." An unusual rattle of vehicles of all sorts. The voices seemed more boisterous than on other days. People running to and fro, with baskets or bundles, to get to the rail trains or gardens. It seemed as if all the vehicles in Paris, of whatever sort, had turned out for the holiday. The "Champs Elysees" one great mob of pleasure-seeking people. Balloons flying. Parrots chattering. Footballs rolling. Peddlers hawking their knick-knacks through the streets. Punch and Judy shows in a score of places, each one with a shouting audience. Hand organs, cymbals, and every kind of racket, musical and unmusical. When the evening came down, all the theaters were in full blaze of music, and full blaze of light. The wine-stores and saloons were thronged with an unusual number of customers. At even-tide I stood and watched the excursionists coming home, tagged out men, women and children, a gulf-stream of fatigue, irritability, and wretchedness; for I should think it would take three or four days to get over that miserable way of Sundaying. It seemed more like an American Fourth of July than a Christian Sabbath.

Now, in contrast, I present one of the Sabbaths in one of our best American cities. Holy silence coming down with the day-dawn. Business men more deliberately looking into the faces of their children, and talking to them about their present and future welfare. Men sit longer at the table in the morning, because the stores are not to be opened, and the mechanical tools are not to be taken up. A hymn is sung. There are congratulations and good cheer all through the house. The street silent until ten o'clock, when there is a regular, orderly tramp churchward. Houses of God, vocal with thanksgiving for mercies received, with prayers for comfort, with charities for the poor. Rest for the body. Rest for the soul. The nerves quieted, the temples cooled, the mind cleared, the soul strengthened, and our entire population turned out on Monday morning ten years younger, better prepared for the duties of this life, better prepared for the life that is to come.

Which do you like best, the American Sabbath or the Parisian Sabbath? Do you know in what boat the Sabbath came across the seas and landed on our shores? It was in the "Mayflower." Do you know in what boat the Sabbath will leave us, if it ever goes? It will be in the ark that floats over a deluge of national destruction.

Still further: I protest against the invasion of the Lord's day, because it wrongs a vast multitude of employees of their rest. The play actors and actresses can have their rest between their engagements; but how about the scene-shifters, the ballet-dancers, the call-boys, the innumerable attendants and supernumeraries of the American theatre? Where is their Sunday to come from? They are paid small salaries at the best. Alas for them! They appear on the stage in tinsel and tassel with halberds, or in gauze whirling in toe tortures, and they might be mistaken for tairies or queens; but after twelve o'clock at night you may see them trudging through the streets in tattered dresses, shivering and tired, a bundle under their arms, seeking their homes in the garrets and cellars of the city. Now, you propose to take from thousands of these employees throughout this country, not only all opportunity of moral culture, but all opportunity of physical rest. For heaven's sake let the crushing Juggernaut stop at least one day in seven.

Again: I oppose this modern invasion of the Christian Sabbath because it is a war on the spiritual welfare of the people. You have a body? Yes. You have a mind? Yes. You have a soul? Yes. Which of the secular halls on the Sabbath day will give that soul any culture? Now, admitting that a man has a spiritual and immortal nature, which one of the places of amusement will culture it? Which one of the Sabbath performances will remind men of the fact that unless they are born again, they cannot see the kingdom of God? Will the music of the "Grand Duchesse" help people at last to sing the song of the one hundred and forty and four thousand? Besides, if you gentlemen of the secular entertainment have six days in the week in which to exercise your alleged beneficial influence, ought you not to allow Christian institutions to have twenty-four hours? Is it unreasonable to demand that if you have six days for the body and intellect, we should have one day at least for our immortal soul? Or, to put it in another shape, do you not really think that our imperishable soul is worth at least one-seventh as much as our perishable body?

An artist has three gems—a cornelian, an amethyst and a diamond. He has to cut them and to set them. Which one is he most particular about? Now the cornelian is the body, the amethyst is the intellect, the diamond is the soul. For the two former you propose six days of opportunity, while you offer no opportunity at all for the last, which is in value as compared with the others like one hundred thousand million dollars to one farthing. Besides, you must not forget that nine-tenths, aye, ninety-nine one hundredths of all the Christian efforts of this country are put forth on the Lord's day. Sunday is the day on which the asylums and hospitals and the prisons are visited by Christian men. That is the day when the youth of our country get their chief religious information in Sunday Schools. That is the day when the most of the charities are collected. That is the day when, under the blast of sixty thousand American pulpits, the sin of the land is assaulted and men are summoned to repent. When you make war upon any part of God's day, you make war upon the asylums, and the penitentiaries, and the hospitals, and the reform associations, and the homes of the destitute, and the Church of the living God, which is the pillar and the ground of the truth.

I am opposed to the invasion of the Sabbath, because it is a war on our political institutions. When the Sabbath goes down, the Republic goes down. Men who are not willing to obey God's law in regard to Sabbath observance are not fit to govern themselves. Sabbath breaking means dissoluteness, and dissoluteness is incompatible with self-government. They wanted a Republic in France. After awhile they got a Republic; but one day Napoleon III., with his cavalry, rode through the streets, and down went the Republic under the clattering hoofs. They have a Republic there again; but France never will have a permanent Republic until she quits her roving Sabbath, and devotes one day in every week to the recognition of God and sacred institutions. Abolish the Sabbath and you abolish your religious privileges. Let the bad work go on, and you have "the Commune" and you have "the Revolution," and you have the sun of national prosperity going down in darkness and blood. From that reign of terror may the God of peace deliver us.

Still further: I am opposed to this invasion of the Sabbath because it is unfair, and it is partial. While secular amusements in different cities are allowed to be open on the Sabbath day, dry-goods establishments must be closed, and plumbing establishments, and the butcher's and the baker's, and the shoemaker's and the hardware stores. Now, tell me by what law of justice you compel a man to shut the door of his store while you keep open the door of your worldly establishment. May it please your honors, Judges of the Supreme Court, if you give to secular places the right to be open on the Sabbath day, you have to give, at the same time, the right to all commercial establishments to be open, and to all mechanical establishments to be open. If it is right in the one case it is right in all the cases.

But we are told that they must get money on Sabbath nights in order to pay the deficits of the other nights of the week. Now, in answer to that I say, that if men cannot manage their amusements without breaking the Lord's day, they had better all go into bankruptcy together. We will never surrender our Christian Sabbath for the purpose of helping these violators to pay their expenses. Above all, my confidence is in the good hand of God that has been over our cities since their foundation. But I call this day upon all those who befriend Christian principle, and those who love our political freedom, to stand in solid phalanx in this Thermopylae of our American history; for I believe as certainly as I stand here that the triumph or overthrow of American institutions depends upon this contest.

THE MOODY GOSPEL FUND.

Enthusiastic Responses to the Great Evangelist's Appeal to Readers of "The Christian Herald"—Value of the Opportunity Realized—What America owes to Mr. Moody.

THE appeal of Mr. D. L. Moody which was published in these columns last week has already awakened a deep interest among our readers. From far and near letters have been received expressing satisfaction at the effort to provide the great evangelist with the funds he needs, and ardent hopes for its success. "I know something," writes one correspondent, "of the kind of men and women turned out of the Moody Institute and I should like to see their number multiplied a thousandfold. They are the kind of preachers and teachers the world needs. They are mighty in the Scriptures, eager to win souls and not afraid of work. For any hard field where there are discouragements give me an Institute man before all others. I hope you will not rest until Mr. Moody is able to have five thousand students under his care. I am making a collection among my friends to send with my own contribution." Another says: "This movement is the best and brightest I have ever heard of. It means the winning of thousands of souls. Every man trained under Moody is a soul-winner. I know several and every one is a treasure. While I pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' I feel it my duty to be in this thing for there is no way so sure to bring an answer to the prayer than to help Moody, to train the workers." Another writes: "Count on me for all I can give and get for this work. It is a glorious opportunity. I want to see at the end of ten years, if I live so long, one of Mr. Moody's men in every town and village of the United States. That is the way to reach the people."

We believe that these letters voice the feelings of all our readers. The opportunity placed within their reach is pre-eminently the greatest ever presented to the Christian people of our land. There are, as Mr. Moody says, thirty million Christless people within our borders. There are hundreds of consecrated young men and women eager to go to them with the Gospel message. The only obstacle in their way is the lack of funds to give them the training they need. Who is he who values the Gospel so lightly, who loves his brother man so little, that he will not deny himself some luxury or some pleasure to contribute a dollar to help in removing this obstacle? So economically is the Bible Institute managed, that the entire expenses of one student are covered by a payment of two dollars a week. Think of it! In years to come, when these evangelists are preaching the Gospel and winning souls, that sum will seem very small compared with the result. The Holy Spirit has stirred up large numbers and is saying, "go work in the vineyard." Of late the number of responses has been enormous. It is a phenomenon that astonishes all who have witnessed it. There has never been anything like it before. If all who volunteer and are fit for service could be sent out fully equipped, there would not be one among our thirty million Christless fellow-citizens who would not have the Gospel personally presented to him. It would seem that we are on the eve of the great day which Christ described (Luke 14: 23), when the servants were bidden to go into the highways and compel all whom they found to come in that the supper might be furnished with guests. Shame upon us will there be if we withhold the funds necessary to send out these servants. And those who are offering themselves are of the right kind. They do not want what is called "a liberal education." They ask to be taught how to divide the Word of Life, how to study the Bible and how to present the Gospel message with power. It is precisely this kind of training that Mr. Moody is giving.

Everyone knows who and what Dwight L. Moody is. For more than twenty years the names of Moody and Sankey have been household words on both sides the Atlantic. In all our cities and in the cities and towns of England, Scotland and Ireland, a visit from these two soul-winners has been counted a privilege to be anticipated, prepared for with much supplication to God, to be enjoyed and to be thankful for afterward. The critics have wondered at their success and have never been able to explain it. There has never been any mystery as to Mr. Sankey's power; the singular sweetness and force of his melodious voice explains all that. But as to Mr. Moody there has always been some surprise. He never attempts eloquence. Those who go to hear him expecting to be delighted with oratorical display are disappointed. Yet a more convincing speaker never addressed an audience. He has the manner of a plain, honest, good-humored man, who is having a general talk with a few friends. When addressing audiences of eight or ten thousand persons, his manner is as familiar and as personal as if he were surrounded by only a dozen. His sermons are mere talks; witty, humorous and terribly pointed. The hearer feels that he is listening to a plain, common-sense man, who has him by the arm and is explaining to him something of momentous interest. He is being told that he is foolish to neglect his soul. Does he wish to be saved? Of course he does. Every sensible man wants that. Then this is the way. And by incident and illustration and simile and parable the way of salvation is put so clearly, so simply and forcibly in the language of every-day life, that the hearer is amazed, charmed and convinced. So Mr. Moody has gone from place to place with his message for nearly a quarter of a century, and God has so blessed his labors that when one reads of the lustre with which those will some day shine who have turned many to righteousness, one thinks of him as conspicuous among that resplendent throng.

Mr. Moody is now fifty-seven years of age. He was born at Northfield, Mass., in 1837. Early bereaved of his father, his first business was to help his widowed mother who was in poverty. The sturdy lad of six years was so intent on the performance of this duty, that at that precocious age he hired himself out to a neighboring farmer to drive the cows. Until he was seventeen his work was on the farm, but then he made a plunge into city life by going to Boston and becoming a clerk in his uncle's store. During the two years he spent in that city, he was brought under converting grace and made a member of Mount Vernon Church. In September, 1856, Mr. Moody removed to Chicago, and found a position as clerk in a store. But his soul was on fire for service for Christ. He offered himself as teacher in a Sunday School, but there was no class that could be given to him. As that was the only difficulty, Mr. Moody set himself to cope with that, and the next Sunday he appeared with eighteen ragged, bare-headed and barefooted boys whom he had found in the streets. They were not much in the way of ornament to the school, but, as he said, each one had a soul to be saved, and that was what he was after. That was the beginning of Mr. Moody's work for the masses.

Mr. Moody was looking out for opportunities for service, and seemed indefatigable in using them. He opened a mission in a deserted saloon on the North Side Market, and started various ingenious means for reaching non-churchgoers. Finally, the work so engrossed his thoughts and energies that he decided "to give God all his time," and resigned his position that he might do so. In connection with the Y.M.C.A. and other organizations, he threw himself with all his restless energy into Christian effort and soon became one of the best known and most successful Christian workers in the city.

After taking an active part in the Christian Commission during the war, Mr. Moody resumed his labors in Chicago in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association which was now splendidly housed in Farwell Hall. He also collected funds with which a church was built near the Market Hall. There he preached to crowded congregations, organized a church of three hundred members, and conducted a Sunday School of a thousand children. This church, swept away in the great fire, was rebuilt and the work continued. But the world was beckoning the great worker. Occasional visits to other cities led to an avalanche of urgent petitions for help in revival work, and finally Mr. Moody was compelled to resign the pastorate and go from place to place as God appointed him. New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, San Francisco and many other large cities called the Lord's worker and saw such results from God's blessing on his labors as filled all Christian hearts with joy. Again and again Great Britain has claimed its share of the blessing, and Mr. Moody has labored there for one or two years at a time with results as great as in our own land. So for nearly a quarter of a century the work has gone on increasing in volume and depth. The world has seen what God can do with a man, plain, simple and content to preach the Gospel as Paul preached it, not with excellence of wisdom, but with power. There is great need of such men, and in recognition of the fact that the time has come for finding them and sending them out, Mr. Moody issues the letter in our columns this week.

That Mr. Moody is not mistaken in appealing to our readers for help in this Christ-like work, we are sure. They know its need and will appreciate the privilege in engaging in it. All contributions should be sent to this office. They will be acknowledged weekly in our columns, and will be forwarded to Mr. Moody. The following is the list to date:

PRESENTATION IN THE TEMPLE.

S.S. Lesson for July 8, Luke 2:25-38, Golden Text, Luke 2:32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

BESIDES the shepherds of Bethlehem, God had his hidden ones in Jerusalem who knew from the Scriptures that the coming of the Messiah was at hand. Few they were, and unknown on earth; their very existence ignored by the great ones of this world and the ecclesiastically great ones among the Jews. They were God's choicest ones, well known in heaven, but the world passed them by as of no account. That which the scribes and Pharisees studied as a mere theological doctrine, these few took to heart as an expectation or hope which gave form and color to their lives. Just as, at the present time, there are scholars of various schools of interpretation; the historical and the futurist, etc., who dispute and contend about the times of Antichrist, the coming of our Lord, and the circumstances attending it; and many are the systems which they have made regarding it, and there are some, a few here and a few there, who are looking for and living for his coming. There are some whose citizenship is practically in heaven, who forbear to assert; or claim their rights on earth who are willing to be pilgrims and strangers here, just because they really do look for, and wait for, and live for a Saviour from Heaven—"the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself." (Phil. 3:20, 21, R.V.) "Behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon (the hearing one) and the same man was just and devout Waiting for the Consolation of Israel."

Simeon's expectation was not selfish and personal, he lived, prayed and waited for the one who should be not only his consolation, but the consolation of Israel. He saw in the words of Isaiah 40:1, that which answered to his own heart: "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem." He must have been acquainted with the miraculous birth of John the Baptist, who was to prepare the way of the Lord, as the angel Gabriel had declared to Zacharias his father, and this old man knew that if Mal. 3:1, 2; 4:5, 6, was fulfilled in John, then also Isa. 40:1-11, must also be fulfilled, and the time was approaching when Jerusalem that bringeth good tidings should say unto the cities of Judah, "Behold, your God." (Isa. 40:1-11.) Probably Simeon's idea of how this Scripture should be fulfilled, was very different from the actual fact, but he knew that, some way or other, the coming of Messiah was at hand.

Simeon was just and devout, we do not hear whether he was learned, or of what family he was, or of what set among the Jews; all these considerations are only temporal and corruptible; they pass away. But "just and devout" bears the stamp of God and of eternity upon it; this is what will not pass away, it is of Divine workmanship, and not of human manufacture; and "whatsoever God doeth it shall be forever." And the Holy Ghost was upon him. Yet this did not make Simeon a popular man. The Holy Ghost does not glorify man, but Jesus, he takes of Christ and shows unto us, and thus it was that this man, upon whom the Holy Ghost was, knew more about the new-born Christ, so unknown in the world, than any of the chief priests and scribes, who were the authorized and recognized teachers of the Word of God. O how clearly we see that only those really and practically understand the Scriptures who live out all they do know!

And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ, and he knew that neither sickness nor accident could take away his life until the Messiah should be born, and his eyes had seen him; his God could not deceive him. When he had heard of the birth of John the Baptist, how his heart must have throbbed to know that the Messiah also must be at hand, and how his watchfulness must have been quickened! Thus when the Spirit, which was upon him, led him to come into the temple, he knew the voice and was not mistaken; it was not a doing of his own will, and calling it the leading of God, but it was a quiet, steady, following of him who had never yet failed to lead him aright. It was the moment God had chosen, when the child Jesus was brought into the temple to be presented to the Lord, and the aged servant of God took the Holy Babe in his arms, and blessed God, and said: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." To the eyes of man it was an ordinary peasant babe, brought by humble parents, so poor that Mary's offering for her purification was the least costly of those permitted by the law (Lev. 12:5); but to the Holy Ghost-opened eyes of the aged Simeon, it was the salvation of God, and the consolation of Israel! Which thou hast prepared a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." On God's side, the sending of his Son was before the face of all people. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son," and yet the world knew him not and cared not for the salvation prepared in their very face! It is almost inconceivable that God should make the salvation so wide, open to every soul of man, and yet that the majority of mankind should be totally indifferent about it! Eternal life and death hanging in the balance, corruption and incorruption, dishonor and glory, and yet man is so blinded and so perverse that he will not so much as give attention to God's great salvation, and he lets it slip forever! God said to his Son: "It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel. I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Isa. 49:6); and yet how few even of the Gentiles have accepted and walk in his light! How few of the Jews count Jesus as the glory of his people Israel! How few of either Jews or Gentiles are looking for his second coming! In how few hearts is the Daystar really arisen, and how incomprehensible must it be to those who look at things in a worldly light, that God could have committed the knowledge of the advent of his Son to such a mere handful of people, and they so poor and so unknown! His chosen ones are the weak, the foolish, the base, the despised, the nothings; out of these he has a people whose weakness, foolishness, baseness, despised condition and nothingness he can fill full with his own character, and his own glory, because in them no flesh glories in his presence, if Christ is not manifest in them, there is nothing. There is not enough of themselves in them to hide him dwelling in them.

Joseph and his mother marvelled at the words of Simeon, but Mary had already pondered much in her heart what concerned her Son. And Simeon blessed them and said unto Mary his mother: Behold this Child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel, and for a sign which shall be spoken against. Simeon had learned deeply in the school of God. Standing on the verge of a new dispensation, this prophet of the Old Covenant saw the central truth of the New; death and resurrection, falling and rising again, the way of the Cross. And he saw the offence of the Cross; the stumbling block it would be; the sign that shall be spoken against. That which the Apostles never did see until after the crucifixion, old Simeon understood beforehand. "Yea," he said to Mary, "a sword shall pierce through thine own soul also, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed." The angel Gabriel had revealed to Mary that God should give unto her Son the throne of his father, David, but the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God had not yet pierced her soul with the truth that he should be crucified, and bear the sins of many. This knowledge had yet to come to her, and Mary had yet much to suffer.

"NOW LETTEST THOU THY SERVANT—"

law on every mother and secondly, to offer her son to God and redeem him. The legal regulations on the subject are contained in Leviticus 12. Thirteen chests shaped like trumpets were set in the Temple and the mother having inquired of the attendant the price of the offering she wished to make, did not herself buy the offering but deposited the price of it in one of the trumpets. The third trumpet was the one to which the poor went. The rich mother in a case like that of Mary was expected to give a turtle-dove or a young pigeon for a sin offering and a lamb for a burnt offering; a poor mother was allowed to give a second turtle-dove instead of a lamb for the burnt offering. At evening the chests were emptied and the money apportioned. The contents of the third chest were reckoned differently from the others, as representing the legal allowance. The price varied from two to three dollars according to our money and the amount which would not ordinarily provide a burnt offering was allowed to do so in this case. Having made her offering, Mary would pass on through the Temple. There Simeon met her. We are not directly told that he was an old man, but his words imply that he was. In some way he had been promised that he should see the Messiah before he died. He naturally went to the Temple as the place where he was most likely to see him. It would be interesting to know what were his expectations. Possibly he may have expected to see a glorious celestial being, or perhaps a stalwart warrior. We are not told. But when the infant Jesus was brought in, he recognized him at once, and took him in his arms. He uttered a few sympathetic, pitying words to Mary and spoke longingly of his own departure. Anna also recognized the infant, and gave thanks.

The parents brought in the child Jesus. They brought him to present him to God as the firstborn and to make the offering appointed for the redemption of him. The meaning of that presentation or how it would be accepted, they little realized. In the days when Italy was broken up into a number of small states and there was fearful oppression and the poor were cruelly treated, there lived an intelligent peasant and his wife who were moved by strong patriotism. They longed for the unity and the freedom of Italy. Both had suffered the loss of relatives and friends under the tyrannical governments. When their first-born boy was given to them they pledged themselves to train him up to love his country and devote him to the cause they loved. When Garibaldi raised the standard of insurrection the time came for the fulfilment of the vow. But he had grown a fine, handsome young man. His father was dead and he was the sole support of his widowed mother. How could she part with him? But the memory of the promise was upon her. With many tears, she bade him go and he was slain in the first battle. When Italy was free and all the land was full of rejoicing, the poor mother wept. The dream of her early widowhood had been fulfilled, but at what a cost to her!

The same man was just and devout. It is very important that these two go together. It is bad for the man and for those who are influenced by his example if while he makes prayers long and loud, and is unctuous in talk, his life is unclean or dishonest. Those who know him are apt to think, not that the man is a hypocrite, which would be a logical conclusion, but that the religion he professes is false, and so that religion is dishonored by his profession. There is a legend of Abou Hassan that he had a talismanic ring which would make its owner wise, truthful, generous and pure. From the time he began to wear it, those were his characteristics. As he was approaching death, he found it difficult to decide which of his three sons should have the ring. Finally, he had two rings made exactly like the talismanic ring in appearance, and gave one to each of his sons. After his death the sons disputed among themselves which of them possessed the true talisman. After several quarrels they agreed to submit the question to a man renowned for his wisdom. "Quarrel no more," he said, "the world will soon discover by your conduct. When it sees one of you wise, truthful, generous and pure, it will know that he is the brother who has the true talisman." So it is with religion; the world does not discriminate very closely between creeds, but is apt to think he has the true creed who is living the best life.

The sword shall pierce thy soul. The glory of being the mother of Christ has clung about Mary for eighteen centuries, but as Simeon foresaw, it was a glory which cost her acute suffering. Many times, she was pained during her son's life, and at the last, she saw him suffering agony on the cross and could not help or comfort him. There is no emotion known to mankind which brings greater joy and greater grief than love. It was a joy and pride to Arria to be the honored wife of Pætus, the Roman patrician, but the same emotion led her to a tragic death. When the Emperor Claudius condemned Pætus to die by his own hand, Arria went with him to the place of execution that by her presence she might nerve him to die as the Roman gloried in dying, strong and without a tremor. But Arria saw that when her husband took the sword to slay himself his hand trembled. She snatched the weapon from his grasp and plunged it into her own breast. Then, as she fell mortally wounded, she handed him the sword, saying sweetly, "It is not painful, my Pætus." There have been many wives and mothers since Mary whose souls have been wrung by torture harder to bear than the thrust of a sword when they have seen husband or son laying down his life in the cause of duty. The death of Jesus brings eternal life to the world, but it caused a sword to pierce his mother's soul.

A light to lighten the Gentiles. Simeon's words have been amply fulfilled. The light that really illumines Christendom and guides it on its way upward, is the light that comes from him, who, as a little babe, lay in Simeon's arms. It is a light for the individual soul as well as for the nations. But the light is for present use. A young student in college was disposed to make a profession of faith in Christ. One of the professors with whom he conversed on the subject, urged him to do so. But the young man knew his own weakness, and hesitated. "How can I know," he said, "that I can continue faithful? When I go into business and temptations come I may fall and never reach heaven at last." The professor encouraged him and they sat talking late into the night. When the student rose to go to his boarding house on the other side of the village, the professor, observing how dark the night was, said, "Wait, George, I'll get you a lantern." Handing it to him, he added, "Its light does not show you the whole road to your home at once, but it will throw light all the way on your next step, and that is what you need in other matters beside to-night's walk." As the student plodded along the country road, he learned the lesson of the value of the daily help and guidance.

A JEW TEACHING OF CHRIST.

Dr. Herman P. Faust, and his Successful Work Among the East side Hebrews in New York—Many Converts and Inquirers at his Mission—A Proposed Training-School for Young Hebrew-Christian Evangelists.

SO great has been the influx from the older civilizations to these shores during recent years, that the population of our sea-board cities is constantly changing. At the present moment, New York is one of the largest Jewish cities in the world. There are fully 250,000 Hebrews on Manhattan Island. Most of these foreigners know little of our language and less of our institutions. They are generally poor, ignorant, over-worked and under-fed. They have been accustomed, many of them, to regard Christianity as the symbol of oppression for their race during long centuries, and often for themselves personally. They cling to their traditions, and are suspicious of any attempt to separate them from their faith or alienate them from their own people. They are industrious, untiring, shrewd, pinching and determined to make a place for themselves. Yet they easily become the prey of designing leaders and are made to swell the ranks of socialists and anarchists; or, if their religious zeal is relaxed, to drift surely into infidelity. The only course left is to endeavor to bring them under the power of the Gospel, and it is an extraordinary Providence that such vast multitudes of them have now been brought to the very doors of Christian churches and homes. They are eager inquirers and readers. Many of them, more than ever before, are ready to listen to proofs that Christ has indeed come. Ever since they began to come to New York in considerable numbers, the Hebrews have drifted, as if by common consent, to the East-side. There they have founded colonies in the densely-packed tenement districts, opened synagogues, markets, and club-rooms. Of late, they have been the particular object of attention on the part of a certain class of agitators who have influenced them often to their own serious detriment. Encompassed by surroundings such as they never before encountered, thousands of them have drifted away from their old religious moorings. To these, as well as to other thousands, who seem to have suffered so much through poverty and misfortune that their belief in a Divine providence has been severely tested, the coming of Christian Missions to the East-side was like the discovery of an oasis in a desert. Among the first to establish a Mission of this character was Dr. Herman Paul Faust, like themselves a Jew by birth and training, but a Christian by grace. He is a native of Russian Poland. He was educated in the public schools and a local seminary, and afterward at the Berlin University. In Nov. 25, 1888, he came to this country and was engaged as a rabbi, preaching to a good-sized Jewish congregation called "the Brethren of Israel" in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. In 1891, while still performing the services of a rabbi, he received from Rev. Charles Nedeker, of the Washington M.E. Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., a copy of the New Testament in Hebrew, which he read, and was so impressed with its truths that he decided to embrace Christianity. Some time before discarding Judaism, he announced to the trustees of his congregation his change of faith, and at the same time he handed to one of the trustees the copy of the New Testament already referred to, with the inevitable result that when that trustee with others, examined it, a strong persecution was at once begun against Dr. Faust. In September of that year he bade adieu to the Jewish pulpit and entered on the career of a servant of Christ. His conversion was the means of leading his entire family, wife and nine children, to Christianity.

REV. H. P. FAUST,

Founder of the Forsyth Street Hebrew Mission.

After leaving Poughkeepsie, Dr. Faust came to New York and, being convinced of the necessity of Christian work among the Hebrews of the densely-populated East side, quickly resolved on opening a Hebrew Mission. He established the Forsyth Street Hebrew Christian Mission on October 27, 1892. It was aided by the Presbyterian Board. Large congregations of Jews have recently been gathered every week to listen to Dr. Faust's evangelical preaching. He has shown himself sincere, devoted, and encouragingly attractive in drawing and influencing his own people. In an official report concerning his work the committee of the Presbyterian Board, consisting of Rev. Howard Duffield, D.D., Chairman, Rev. George Alexander, D.D., Rev. D. Stuart Dodge, Rev. W. D. Buchanan, Rev. H. T. McEwen, James Kydd, John McWilliam and Oscar E. Boyd, declare that "they believe him to be worthy of all confidence."

In the first year of his work in New York his aim was to stir up the Jews to the love of Christianity and Christian principles by living among them and doing them all the kindness possible. He established his Mission and Reading Room in the basement of the Allen Memorial Presbyterian Church and held meetings every day, the principal viewed in its spiritual aspect the work is satisfactory in every regard. The meetings on Saturday are largely attended. Not less than 42,000 Jewish hearers have listened to the word of God in the Mission Hall since the work opened eighteen months ago. At first they interrupted Dr. Faust frequently by opposing his statements about Jesus Christ; now, they listen most attentively. The reading-room twice a week is also well attended. Bible study is conducted specially on Thursday evenings. Tuesday evening is devoted to services which are fairly attended by the Jews, who now behave exceedingly well. Testimonies are given spontaneously by some of the audience. The school for children is attended by from sixty to one hundred little ones who are taught the Christian religion, German and singing. Through the efforts of the Presbyterian Board $2,500 was raised to help the work begun by Dr. Faust, whose facilities and resources are wholly unequal to the necessities of the Mission, which is steadily growing in numbers and influence. Quite recently, four converts from Judaism were publicly baptized in the University Church in the presence of a large audience, by Rev. Dr. Alexander. Among them are two young men of good abilities who are to be consecrated as ministers of the Gospel.

ALLEN MEMORIAL CHURCH, WHERE THE MISSION IS HELD.

The seeds of Christian love and kindness then planted, now seem to be bearing an abundant harvest. The Hebrew-Christian Mission is more largely attended than ever before, and the work is opening to an extent that calls for the active assistance of all who are interested in the conversion of the Jews. Dr. Faust has been making earnest efforts for the establishment of an Industrial Home, where manual training in the different trades will be taught, and also where a corps of young, active and consecrated missionaries can be trained to evangelical work among the New York Hebrews, and thus to carry forward with increasing numbers, the work already so well begun. Two young students are now under training. They are: Samuel Paul Feingold, born in Odessa, and Albert John Meisels, native of Warsaw, Poland. Both have already received a fairly good education in Europe. The students are to be selected from different walks in life, some tradesmen, others men of education, but all Hebrews and all imbued with zeal and devotion for the new faith. They have been baptized and accepted for the work, and two of them are now housed in Dr. Faust's home and supported at his personal expense. Others are awaiting an opportunity to join the evangelistic corps and all will be trained for passing regular examinations at a theological seminary, Dr. Faust himself directing their studies in Christian literature, philosophy, history and Biblical knowledge.

It is his hope that a way may be opened to assist him in securing the necessary means for establishing a Permanent Training Home, at which twenty-five or more such students may be placed in training. Although the burden, meanwhile, lies very heavily on his shoulders, he has borne it thus far unflinchingly, trusting to the same Divine Power that established the work to furnish the means for extending it.

Dr. Faust may be addressed to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City, and any contributions forwarded to the building up of this most desirable Mission, will be duly acknowledged in these columns.

During the past winter, Dr. Faust has been besieged by multitudes of poverty-stricken Hebrews, very many of whom he has been instrumental in helping to rescue from starvation. His kindness and generosity, during these trying months, have won for him a very large popularity among the mixed nationalities of the East-side, especially among the Hebrews, both reformed and orthodox. For several months, he was aided in this work by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund, which supplied him with food for one hundred families weekly, but although one hundred were thus fed, there were five hundred others hungry.

IN the next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will appear the opening chapters of a new and remarkably interesting serial: "Zerola, of Nazareth," from the pen of a talented young author, W. J. Thorold, who has written it expressly for the readers of this journal. It is a dramatic and realistic picture of life in Palestine in the days of Paul the Apostle, and it will possess a special interest for a multitude of readers, being based on Scriptural events and dealing with some of the most important passages in the history of the early Christian Church.

BRIBERY.

THERE is no sentiment more untrue or more dangerous than the oft-repeated one, "Every man has his price." I do not believe it. Even heathenism and the dark ages have furnished specimens of incorruptibility. A cadi of Smyrna had a case brought before him on trial. A man gave him five hundred ducats in bribery. The case came on. The briber had many witnesses. The poor man, on the other side, had no witnesses. At the close of the case the cadi said: "This poor man has no witnesses, he thinks. I shall produce in his behalf five hundred witnesses against the other side." And then, pulling out the bag of ducats from under the ottoman, he dashed it down at the feet of the briber, saying: "I give my decision against you." Epaminondas when offered a bribe, said: "I will do this thing if it be right, and if it be wrong all your goods cannot persuade me." Fabricius, of the Roman Senate, was offered a bribe by Pyrrhus, of Macedon. Fabricius answered: "What an example this would be to the Roman people! You keep your riches and I will keep my poverty and reputation." The President of the American Congress during the American Revolution, John Reed, was offered ten thousand guineas by foreign commissioners if he would betray his country. He replied: "Gentlemen, I am a very poor man, but tell your king he is not rich enough to buy me."

But why go so far when you and I, if we move in honorable society, know men and women who by all the concentrated forces of earth and hell could not be bribed. They would no more be bribed than you would think of tempting an angel of light to exchange heaven for the pit. To offer a bribe is villainy, but it is a very poor compliment to the man to whom it is offered. I have not much faith in those people who go about bragging how much they could get if they only would sell out. Those women who complain that they are often insulted need to understand that there is something in their carriage to invite insult. There are men in Washington, Albany and New York who would no more be approached by bribers than a pirate boat with a few cutlasses would dare to approach an American man-of-war with two banks of guns on each side loaded to the touch-hole. They are incorruptible men, and they are to save the cities and save the land. So that I scout the sentiment I often hear uttered, that "every man has his price." Much is said about "old-fashioned honesty," as though the past had a monopoly of righteousness and in our day everything were on the down grade. But my reading of history makes me think that old-fashioned honesty among public men was not much to boast of. This crime of bribery which, in one shape or another, is now being charged upon capitalists and officials, had its mightiest reign in the past. Sir Francis Bacon, Lord Chancellor of England, founder of our modern philosophy, and author of "Novum Organum" and a whole library of books, the leading thinker of his century, so precocious that when a little child he was asked by Queen Elizabeth: "How old are you?" he responded: "I am two years younger than your Majesty's happy reign," of whose oratory Ben Johnson wrote: "The fear of every man who heard him was lest that he should make an end"—having an income which you would suppose would have put him beyond the temptation of bribery—$36,000 a year—and Twickenham Court as a gift, and princely estates of Hertfordshire and Gorbury, yet under this temptation of bribery falling into ruin and, on his confession of taking bribes, giving as an excuse that all his predecessors took them; he was fined $200,000 and imprisoned in London Tower. So also Lord Chancellor Macclesfield fell. So also Lord Chancellor Waterbury perished. The first chapters in English, Irish, French, German and American politics were chapters of bribery. Instead of longing for the days of old-fashioned honesty, which were dishonest, let us long for a new and more consummate honesty than the world has ever yet seen. It is high time that the world have a court house, or a city hall, or a jail, or a post-office, or a hospital, or a railroad, that in its building has not involved a political job. The machinery of bad American politics is made up of five hundred wheels, and the cogs of these wheels play into a greater wheel, and this great center wheel has a tire of railroad iron, and also a crank on which is the hand of Satan, and he turns the great wheel and that turns all the other five hundred smaller wheels in the political machinery, while as a consequence of partial legislation and favoritism, the great masses of people find it harder and harder work to make a living.

In all departments of life steer clear of bribery. Every man or woman at some time will be tempted to do wrong for compensation. The bribe may not be offered in money; it may be offered in position. Let us remember that there is a day coming when the most secret transactions of private life and of public life will come up for public prehension. The bribe is an everlasting possession. You take it for time. You take it for eternity.

FAITH AND PRAYER.

IT ought to be a matter of congratulation that though the sanitary improvement in all our cities and the vigilance and energy of health officers, the probability of a sickly summer has been turned back into an improbability. One who visits the cities of Italy and southern France is surprised that they do not have perpetual pestilence, because of the concentrated filth year after year and century after century. Standing invitations are these cities for dreadful sicknesses to come and do their worst. I expect the present summer to be one of unusual health. People who argue about the inevitable track of cholera, argued without the usual premise of decayed garbage. Let us do all we can for the purification of our cities and obey all hygienic regulations, and then expect national health. Would to God that we were as anxious about the moral health of our cities as the physical health. There are plagues that have already landed that will kill ten times as many of our people as cholera. Great cities that care for no laws of quarantine are sweeping across the land to-day like destroying angels. The alcoholic scourge will this coming summer destroy more lives than all the epidemics put together. What are the distempers that slay the body compared with those that slay both body and soul? Let all churches and reformatory organizations and all philanthropists and all Christians band together against the further progress of these moral evils with which our cities are afflicted. Encourage all the thousand agencies for the moral and spiritual cure of these cities now sick with sin, but remember that the mightiest agency is prayer. God always has honored it and will honor it. These omnipotent levers are all around us, but we have not faith enough to lay hold of them. Prayer for the sick that they may be restored. Prayer for the inebriates that they may be reclaimed. Prayer for the cities that they may be evangelized. Prayer for the world that its disenfranchisement may be hastened. People smile when they talk about answers to prayer and it is often the smile of incredulity. Why not let some people try pure, unadulterated faith in God? To God be all the glory. After the Church has stumbled along in Christian work for a little while longer, it will discover the full power of prayer and the discovery will make as much change in the spiritual world, as the discovery of printing made in the literary world, as the application of steam and electricity to locomotion and telegraphy.

Wake up to the power of prayer. Put it into your business, put it into your work, put it into all your enterprises. Fill your life with it. Pray, pray, pray!

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. A. D., Des Moines, Ia. How many Sunday School scholars are there in the United States?

The total enrollment in Protestant Sunday Schools last year was over 11,000,000, including teachers and adult scholars. There are nearly 3,000,000 Catholic pupils, making a grand total of over 14,000,000.

Chas. R. Duke, Stamping Ground, Ky. I noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 30, a suggestion from J. G. Randall in regard to all Christians wearing a badge, so as to know each other. I heartily approve of it, and think all Christians should do so. What THE CHRISTIAN HERALD suggest some way to start the movement? Let us wear a badge, and no two wearing such a badge shall pass each other without a salutation or recognition, such as a bow or some short sentence taken from Scripture to be spoken while passing.

1. Dr. J. Haglanman, Reading, Pa. What would be your opinion of a young man who professed to be a Christian, consulting a "witch doctor," and following his advice to rid himself of a supposed "spell" cast on his live stock by his enemy? 2. Do not such works belong to the devil? 3. Who answers the questions in "Our Mail-Bag"?

1. Such a course would be superstitious, ignorant and un-Christian. (See Lev. 20: 6; Gal. 5: 20.) 2. They are so classed in Scripture; see reference last quoted. 3. The editors.

C. E. Plasterer, Shippensburg, Pa. Does the statement in John 1: 17, that grace and truth come by Jesus Christ, imply that there was neither before he came?

The "Evangelist" is contrasting the message of Christ with that of Moses. Christ came emphatically to reveal both grace and truth. So fully did he do so, and so much further advanced and more complete was his revelation that the "Evangelist" speaks of it as eclipsing all that went before. The previous revelations were in sign and shadow and symbol, but since Christ came, men have known what grace and truth really mean.

T. D. F., Elmira, Kan. Does the Bible say it is a sin for a son or daughter to disobey their father or mother, after they are twenty-one years of age?

The injunction to filial obedience is not affected by age. (See Eph. 6: 1.) After a child has reached manhood or womanhood, however, the paternal authority should be relaxed to suit the changed condition and responsibilities. Any command by the parents, which conflicts with the conscience of the young man or woman, may be set aside. (Matt. 10: 35; Eph. 6: 1-4; Col. 3: 21.) This makes it clear that obedience "in the Lord" only is commanded, and that when the child has reached the age of discretion, it is not under moral compulsion to obey an unrighteous command, even by a parent.

D. W. Beaver, Hewins, Kans. 1. Did Christ speak the same language to his disciples that he used on the Cross? 2. Where does alcohol exist before distillation? 3. Is it in the fruit? 4. We read in Gen. 1: 27 that God created man, male and female. In Gen. 2: 5 we read that there was not yet man "to till the earth." How do you harmonize the two verses? 5. How old do geologists reckon the earth to be?

1. Presumably he did. The language employed by the Saviour and his disciples is believed to have been Aramaic. 2. Alcohol does not exist until fermentation has taken place. It is the result of the fermentation of a material that contains either sugar or starch—either fruits or cereals—and is secured by distillation. 3. The opening verses of the second chapter relate at greater length than is done in the first chapter some of the circumstances connected with the creation of man. These chapters are not to be regarded as a chronological sequence, but rather as being to some extent explanatory of each other. 4. There are many scientific speculations as to the duration of the five great geological periods, but as each period is supposed to have lasted for a long succession of centuries, there can be no accurate basis for an agreement even as to the approximate age of the globe. At the same time, scientists do not hesitate to declare their belief that hundreds of thousands of years may have elapsed since the Eozoic period, which saw the dawn of animal life in the geological world.

Reader, Ohio. If a person has any reason to believe that there is money coming to him in the Old Country, what had he better do?

We have many inquiries similar to the foregoing. The best plan, under all circumstances, is to avoid so-called claim agencies and employ a reputable lawyer in your own neighborhood. He will know just what steps to take, will charge no more than a claim agent and will very likely prevent you from being swindled.

W. H. Johnson, Red Bank, N. J. In reading the Bible, I find, here and there, words in italics. The meaning of that in general reading, I know, denotes emphasis or importance; but is there not a different meaning for the italicized words we find in Holy Writ?

Yes; italicized words and passages in the Bible indicate that they are not in the original but have been supplied by the translators to complete the sense, which was evidently intended to be conveyed by the sacred writers. In the Revised Version, all non-essentials are omitted, and thus some italicized passages which appear in the older version are absent in the new.

John D. Ferguson, Bladenboro, N. C. What is the meaning of the reference to the "angels of the little ones" in Matt. 8: 10?

The reference has caused discussion among divines in all periods of the Christian church, and is by no means satisfactorily explained. Jesus seems to have lifted for a moment the veil over the unseen state, and to have spoken of a matter familiar to him, but incomprehensible to us. The apparent meaning is that even the humblest followers of Christ are ministered to by angels, who have access to the presence of God himself.

Subscriber, Portsmouth, Va. According to the Old Testament, what did the required tenth or tithe offering amount to?

If you mean the aggregate amount they produced, we cannot answer. The amount was probably different one year from another. The tithe was a tenth of the produce of the land and the flock. Some Biblical authorities think that it was given three times a year, but the general opinion is that it was given only twice. The tithe of the produce of the land might be redeemed if the owner added one-fifth of its value. (See Lev. 27: 30-33.) It was not a tenth of a man's property, but of the increment.

J. W. Black, Aurora, Mo. Please explain the meaning of the emblems of the Papal insignia: The Cross, the Crook, the Keys and the three Crowns.

The crucifix is carried before the Pope and turned toward him to remind him of Christ crucified. The Crook is the Bishop's, not the Pope's, emblem; it signifies the pastor or shepherd of the flock. The Keys indicate the Pope's claim to be the successor of Peter. The three Crowns on his mitre are the emblem of his temporal sovereignty, now happily extinct. The original papal crown consisted simply of a cap of gold cloth. Boniface VIII., in 1295, surrounded it with an ornamented gold circlet, to which in 1335 Benedict XII. added a second, typifying spiritual as well as temporal sovereignty, and in 1362 Urban V. added a third symbolizing the Trinity.

Subscriber, Bonsack, Va. What are the best books for information in Sunday Schools and for conducting prayer meetings? I wish more information or more light in explaining to others. Would like to have analysis of the New Testament.

The best of all is "The Helps to the Study of the Bible," which you will find bound in with the International Teachers' Bible. There are also bound in with it, a Concordance, Analysis, Summaries of the Sacred Books, Tables of Scripture History, Subject-Index, Bible Dictionary, a series of Maps of Bible Lands, Ancient and Modern, and a number of other compilations, the whole constituting a compact and accurate Bible Library in condensed form, invaluable to all Sunday School Teachers, Class Leaders and Christian Workers. The International Teachers' Bible can be secured at a premium by sending $2 for a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

MOROCCO'S SULTAN DEAD.

NEWS was received on June 12, of the death four days before, of Muley Hassan, the Sultan of Morocco and the succession to the throne of Abdul Aziz, his younger son. An elder brother and an uncle of the new king are, it appears, claimants for the throne, but Abdul Aziz whom the late Sultan designated his successor, was duly proclaimed, and inaugurated his reign with a series of executions. He is only sixteen years of age, but is a young man of some intelligence and energy. The Cabinets of Europe were profoundly agitated by the news of the old Sultan's death. Of late years, several European powers have been intriguing and working to gain a foothold in the country, but have been foiled by the late Sultan's astute policy. France has an interest in it owing to the nearness of her Algerian possessions. Spain also claims rights there and England is concerned because her position at Gibraltar, as keeper of the keys of the Mediterranean, would be menaced if any strong power acquired possession of Ceuta and Tangier, the points of vantage across the straits. The promptitude with which France sent her fleet to Tangier on hearing of the Sultan's death, was regarded as a sign that she had designs on the country, which would have inevitably involved war with England. No occasion for foreign interference occurred, however, when the young Sultan was proclaimed and it may be hoped that the danger of international collision has passed for the time. That the death of an uncivilized king in Africa should have brought civilized nations to a condition of mutual jealousy in which war seemed a possibility is an indication how far we are from that period of universal peace and good-will described by the prophet and which Christ came to bring about. (Isa. 11: 12, 13.)

An Heiress in a Factory.

A press despatch from Bridgeport, Conn., describes a strange meeting which occurred there a few days ago. It appears that one of the employees in a cartridge factory is a girl who was brought over from Ireland when an infant. She believed that both her mother and father were dead, but she now finds that the latter is alive and is very wealthy. She had heard from her mother that when she was only a few days old, her father suddenly disappeared from their home in Ireland. His wife believed that he had been killed, but no trace of him was found. After the lapse of a few months she heard that he had crossed to America and she sold her furniture and came over to seek him. She was unable to obtain any tidings of him, so she went to work for her living and finally settled at Bridgeport, where she died about a year later, leaving her daughter to the care of friends. The missing man was really in America and had settled in New Mexico. He did not communicate with his family, but after working for twenty years and accumulating a fortune, he wrote to his brother, who he supposed was still in Ireland. But the brother had come to America and the letter followed him here. The two brothers corresponded and at last, on the suggestion of the New Mexico man, decided to make a trip to Ireland and bring over his wife and daughter. A preparatory letter was sent which elicited the facts, and the man instead of going to Ireland went to Bridgeport, where he found his daughter working in the cartridge factory. She will inherit his wealth, but she is little likely to feel a daughter's affection for the man whose desertion embittered her mother's life and caused her long years of poverty and hardship. It may be hoped that she has learned by experience that it is not so that the Heavenly Father acts toward his children. It is his glory that he watches over them and cares for them all through life and does not wait until the end to reveal himself to them. (Ps. 73: 23, 24.)

Kissing a Lion.

A circus performer at Coney Island suffered severe injuries from a lion a few days ago. The last performance of the day was being given when the trouble occurred. A young woman who is the daughter of a lion-tamer and who has been familiar with lions in menageries from a child, went into the cage of a lion to go through the usual tricks. He had never manifested any vicious propensities and the young woman had made a pet of him. On this evening, however, while she was performing with him, the man who feeds the animals entered the menagerie with a box of raw meat. The performer was in the act of kissing the lion, which was one of her customary exhibitions, when the brute smelled the meat and broke away. She called him back to finish his part and tried to make him obey. But the lion was hungry and would do no more. He turned savagely on the performer and to the horror of the spectators bore her to the ground and buried his teeth in her face. The men employed in the menagerie rushed to the cage and succeeded in rescuing her, but not until her face had been terribly mangled. Her wounds were promptly dressed, but she is said to have only a slight prospect of recovery and will surely be disfigured to the end of her life. She must have been aware that there was risk in such a performance, but, as she had often embraced the lion before, she may have concluded that she could continue to do so to a liqueur dealer who used it in the manufacture of bitters and curacoa. The refinement of the man's manner and his evident culture suggested to the judge questions as to the prisoner's history and he finally admitted that he was a marquis and had held a high position in the court of the Emperor Napoleon III. His private fortune had been large, but it had been squandered and he was then so poor that the gutter furnished him with the only means of support that he had. The contrast between his present degradation and his former condition appeared to cause him acute anguish. It might lead to blessed results if he would turn his face in the opposite direction and were led to compare his present condition with what he might be. Even one who has sunk so low, might, if he would quit the moral evils that have worked his fall and go to Jesus for salvation, rise to a rank superior to any title of nobility becoming a son of God himself. (John 1: 12.)

To Tattoo Wedding Rings.

A project to prevent evasions of the marriage laws is aired by a correspondent of a daily journal. It is suggested by the large number of cases in which persons who are married and whose partners are living, contract other marriages for purposes of fraud. The proposition, in brief, is to make the presence of a person skilled in tattooing a necessity at a marriage ceremony. This person is to be required to tattoo a ring on one of the fingers of the bride and of the bridegroom. This distinguishing mark could never be erased and would remain to show that the person so marked had been already married. In the event of the death of husband or wife, the registrar of deaths should have the power to add a star to the ring and in case of divorce, the officer of the divorce court should indicate the fact by tattooing two cross bars upon the ring. The correspondent suggests that severe penalties should be fixed for any tampering with the tattoo marks by the wearer, or by any person not duly authorized. Such a system, to a deep hole. Happily for him, he instinctively extended his arms, and a passer-by caught him and helped him out. It was a narrow escape, for as it proved, the hole was of enormous depth. A rope thirty feet long was lowered into it without touching the bottom and when a stone was thrown in, no noise of its striking the bottom could be heard. The hole on the surface was about four feet in diameter and on looking down it could be seen that four feet down, a wooden timber projected, which was probably the remains of a board that had covered the hole and supported the soil and paving stones above. Below this, the sides were walled with neatly laid stones, indicating that it was an old-time well. Antiquarians are much interested in the discovery, for the histories of the city show that the Bowery was a busy street in 1767 and no well was used there then. The well must have been dug when the Bowery was farm land and that could not have been less than a century and a quarter ago. The timber that covered the well must have been slowly rotting for years until the moment came when it could no longer support the soil and stones above it. Then without warning it collapsed. Thousands have walked over the spot daily in all those years unconscious that beneath their feet was that deep well with its slowly rotting covering. So it is with every life that has not been given to God. At any moment collapse may come with irretrievable disaster. Few realize the solemn fact uttered by the Psalmist, "There is but a step between me and death." (1. Samuel 20: 3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Major Geo. A. Hilton is now settled at the Gosford, Ocean Grove, N. J., for the summer. His exhausting campaign during the winter and spring made some rest necessary, and Major Hilton expected to obtain it at Ocean Grove, but we understand he has already made several engagements for meetings.

Dr. L. W. Munhall held a Grand Jubilee all-day service at Carthage, Mo., on Tuesday, June 5, for the reception of converts and thanksgiving to God. The meeting began with a sunrise praise and prayer meeting, followed by a preaching service in the Armory; in the afternoon another large meeting was held, and at night services in the Armory and several churches. The majority of the stores and factories were closed all day.

Baptist Journals are Criticizing Dr. Eaton's speech at the meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention. He is reported to have said: "There's nothing right in religion that is not eighteen hundred years old." On this, the Examiner remarks, sententiously, "There is no Sunday School in Dr. Eaton's church, we take it?"

A Cable Message from the King of Corea was received from Seoul on June 14, announcing the complete suppression of the rebellion and thanking the Washington Government for sending Admiral Skerrett and the Baltimore. The King says that the Admiral "protected both sides," whatever that may mean.

Rev. J. McNeill, before concluding his Mission in Johannesburg, in South Africa, preached at the jail to about two hundred prisoners—white, black and yellow. He visits Durban, East London, King Williamstown, Grahamstown, Port Elizabeth and Cradock. After that he goes to India, Japan and Australia.

Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey have Declined the pressing invitation from London to carry on an evangelistic campaign there next fall. For many reasons they would like to go abroad again, but while the work is opening so widely in this country they feel that they should remain here, and they have therefore sent their declination to their friends in England.

TANGIER, THE CHIEF SEAPORT OF MOROCCO.

with impunity. She had not calculated on the possibility of a time coming when the brute might be under stronger influence than the training he had received. A similar mistake has often led to irreparable moral calamities. He who indulges in sinful pleasure without discovery or apparent injury, is apt to think that he may safely continue in sin; but in the end the awful nature of sin is disclosed and God's warnings against it are fulfilled. (Prov. 29: 1.)

From the Court to the Gutter.

The judge of a police court in Paris was astonished recently by the discovery of the identity of a prisoner. The charge against him was the theft of a bracelet. He had tried to pawn the ornament, and the pawnbroker, surprised that a man dressed in rags should have so valuable an article in his possession, had him arrested on suspicion of stealing it. The prisoner protested his innocence and declared that he had found the bracelet in the gutter. He said in reply to questions that his sole support was the pickings he could get from the gutter. Any food he found there he was glad to eat and when he found orange peel he could sell it he contends, would be an impassable barrier to fraudulent marriages and would prevent deceptions which often involve ruin to innocent persons. There is little probability of the suggestion being adopted, although possibly it might be useful in preventing the practise of deceit. It could not do more. The real source of the trouble is farther back. It is with the marriage vow as with the vow of fidelity to God; unfaithfulness begins in the heart before it is manifest in the life and no brand or badge or mark can secure faithfulness there. It is only they who have committed their hearts to God's keeping who can be sure of being preserved from unfaithfulness. (Jude 24.)

A Well in the Bowery.

One of the most unlikely places to find a well, it would seem, would be the busy thoroughfare in New York City known as the Bowery. Yet the discovery of one under the sidewalk of that street was made in a rather disconcerting way by a citizen a few days ago. He was walking unconcerned along the street when, as he approached Houston Street, the pavement fell away from under his feet and he stepped in-

SEPARATION AND SERVICE.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Pastor

A. J. Gordon, D.D. Text: Gal. 1: 4, "He gave himself for our sins that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God our Father."

HERE Christ's vicarious sacrifice touches its lowest depths of humiliation. Once we read that he "loved the Church and gave himself for it"—wondrous grace, the Bridegroom for the Bride! Once we read, "Who loved me and gave himself for me"—wondrous love, the Son of God for a son of men! Here we read that he "gave himself for our sins"—the deepest condescension, wherein he "who knew no sin was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Consider now what was the end of this condescension.

I. The divine separation: "That he might deliver us from the present evil world. Attachment to Christ is the only secret of detachment from the world. Therefore I do not say, 'break your fetters of evil habit that you may lay hold of the Saviour,' but, 'lay hold of the Saviour in order that you may break your fetters of evil habit.' I have never known a man to stop sinning until he had begun believing. I do not deny that unconverted men may carry on a tremendous warfare with their evil passions; but I do say that so long as it is only self against sin, it will be a drawn battle. In the seventh of Romans we have a picture of this warfare vividly portrayed, 'For the good that I would, I do not, but the evil that I would not, that I do.' Here is the battle. 'For I delight in the law of God after the inward man.' Here is our better nature, one of

The Combatants.

"But I see a law in my members warring against the law of my mind and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." Here is our evil nature, the other combatant. And these two keep up the battle. It grows hotter and hotter. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary, the one to the other." And this conflict will go on, sorrowful defeat following sorrowful defeat, till Christ comes into the soul. Then and only then will the shout be heard, "Jesus is victor!" This has happened repeatedly. I have seen and bear record to the fact: The drunkard victorious over his appetite; the worldling victorious over his pleasures; the self-seeker victorious over his avarice; the sinner victorious over his sins.

But how has the victory come? The Apostle answers: "The law of the spirit of life hath made me free from the law of sin and death." "But," it is asked, "is the battle won once and for all at conversion?" No, it has to be fought again and again. I believe that with most Christians the temptation is to the misuse of good things; in other words, that Satan turns our very peace into war in order to get the victory over us. Therefore look out for the flag of truce that proposes a compromise with the world. Beware lest you be beguiled through your harmless pleasures. A traveller in Barbary mentions seeing a beautiful clear spring of water over which was inscribed this motto: "Drink and be gone." Robbers infested the region, and were constantly on the track of the traveller, ready to pounce upon and destroy him. Therefore he must snuff the cooling draught and hasten on. Shall we refuse ourselves all pleasure in this world? Shall we write, "Touch not, taste not," on every innocent gratification? No; but as soon as we have tasted the pleasant draught we must hurry forward lest we be overtaken by the destroyer of our souls. Drink and be gone! Hasten on from pleasure to life's serious business; from rest to life's serious toil; from peace to life's serious conflict. This is just what Peter meant when he wrote, "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the soul." The citizen may tarry, build, plant, and reap; but the pilgrim must make haste lest he take root in this world, when his calling is to be rooted in heaven.

This deliverance from a present evil world means election, you see, not assimilation. As a sunbeam falls upon a muddy pool and draws up from it a clear crystal drop, leaving behind all the filth and sediment with which it was mixed, so Christ takes souls out of the world into his kingdom. Much of the religion of our day is —a mixture of earth and heaven in the same compound. Those who want to popularize Christianity go in for this mixture. They think a religion of mingled secularity and spirituality will be more palatable and will win more disciples. But it is not so. Garibaldi recruited the army with which he liberated Italy by calling for such as were ready to accept cold, hunger, nakedness and death. And Christ gets the soldiers who are really valuable to him by proclaiming: "If any man will be my disciple, let him take up his cross and follow me." Real strength for the church has always come and always must come through unworldly conditions and claims. By repentance, faith, and self-denial Christ separates men from the world in order to join them to himself.

An Adulteration

Here is the test of evangelical faith by which we ask to have it tried; it can take a sinner out of his sin. To keep a serious-minded man serious; to keep a moral man moral; to keep a respectable man respectable—this is not a very difficult matter, especially when your moral or respectable man has a good heredity behind him. But to change the immoral and the outcast into the sober and respectable, is quite another matter. That is the work of the supernatural spirit operating through a supernatural Gospel. Nothing but an evangelical Christianity can do this. Go into the liberal churches where they boast so loudly of their ethical preaching, and their high morality, and their strict integrity; and ask them how many drunkards they picked from the gutter last year, changing them into sober men who can pray and sing praises to God. They cannot show you one, I find they are condemned by this test. The tall cedars can be easily sawed and planed, and polished, and fitted into their places in the temple of God; but the great problem in my boyhood was how to pull the stumps, whose strong, deep, gnarly roots have struck down into the earth and grasped it with giant fingers. Only by a tremendous convulsion can these be uprooted. And the world is full of such all beauty and grace gone; and they only a mass of deep-rooted and inveterate evil habits. "To deliver men from the present evil world"—this is the problem of humanity which the Gospel solves.

II. The divine standard. "According to the will of God." That is to say, God has his own sovereign method by which he works, and to this we are to conform. Often have I heard it affirmed by earnest reformers, that the great problem which the Church has to work out, is that of adapting Christianity to the age. But it, as the text affirms, the age is evil, why should we attempt to conform Christianity to it? On the contrary, the Word of Scripture is very explicit: "Be not conformed to this age, but be ye transformed, by the renewing of your minds, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God. There is nothing more needed than this demonstration. Exhibitions of the bad and selfish and imperfect will of man, are common enough, but the divine will lived out in human lives; the perfect will exhibited amid imperfect surroundings—this is what our non-conformity should exhibit—"proving what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God."

The will of God is the rule and measure by which all human conduct is to be rectified. If traders have fallen into the sin of measuring with a short yardstick, and weighing with a false balance, is he the best friend of society who succeeds in getting the standard of weight and measure changed so as to conform to this dishonest usage? Surely not. Well sin has deranged our moral standards, and the Christian is set into the world not to adjust himself to the age, but to convince the age of its sin by exhibiting to it "the good and acceptable and perfect will of God." It strikes me as

by which Christians are called in the Bible—"Believers." That is, they are persons who accept what God says as final. They set their watches by the sun instead of by the town-clock. One of our preachers lately declared that all thinkers now accept the doctrine of evolution as true. That may be or may not be—I will not discuss the question. But how is it about believers? Thinkers accept one another's opinions; believers accept the voice of God. Thinkers base their conclusions on a "thus saith science;" believers rest their faith on a "thus saith the Lord." I know that there are multitudes of believers who accept the doctrine of creation as true. They read in Genesis the simple and sublime record that in the beginning "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him;" and they credit the record without question. They believe implicitly that creation proceeds from above, not from beneath; that God spake and it was done, not that chaos fermented and it was begun. "In the image of God created he him." By one creative stroke, man was stamped in the die of the divine nature; instead of being a composite likeness slowly elaborated from patterns of all previously created things. It may seem like a very stupid and stubborn thing not to think with the great thinkers, but we prefer to believe with the great believers. Let who will choose for himself the encomium: "He thought with the great thinkers and it was counted to him for originality," we prefer to take our place with faithful Abraham, if with him we may win this epitaph: "He believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness."

This, my hearers, is the chief distinction of the Christian; he is delivered from the present evil world—from its way of thinking and reasoning; he is "separated unto the Gospel of God." When others walk by sight, he walks by faith; when others look at the things that are seen, he looks at the things that are not seen; while others say, "I have proved, therefore I affirm," he says, "I believe, therefore I spoken." How beautiful is the counterpart to this text which the apostle gives us in another Scripture. He speaks of Christians as those who "have tasted

The Powers of the Age to Come."

That is, they are delivered from the present age, and made partakers of the age to be. It is a strange paradox, but true as strange. The pilgrim feeding from his father's table while yet in the wilderness; nourished by angels' food while yet in the earthly house of this tabernacle. "I have known more enjoyment in one hour of communion with God than in a whole life-time of earthly pleasure," says an experienced Christian. It then you ever get weary and languid for a moment, "taste the powers of the world to come," and you will be refreshed and invigorated! Beautiful illustration of it we have in the story of the sick soldier. He was given up to die, and his father hastened from a long distance to his bedside in the hospital. He lay half conscious, and nothing that father or attendants could say could rouse him till the father said: "Here is a loaf of your mother's bread which I have brought you." "Bread from home!" said the dying man. "Give me some;" and from that hour he began to mend. Bread from heaven! Don't fail to eat it every day, oh Christian. You are in the world, but not of it, and you will die if you eat the native food. Feed upon the Word of God; live upon the promise of God; satisfy your souls with the hope of God which he has revealed to you in the Scriptures. "This is that bread which cometh down from heaven, of which if a man eat he shall never hunger." What then is the will of God in our separation from the world?

I. We are separated for our Lord's ownership. We speak of losing the soul. Who is the loser? We speak of saving the soul.

For whom is it saved? "All souls are mine," saith God. To lose the soul is to defraud him of his redemption-right: to save a soul is to restore to him that of which he has been defrauded. Now gold cannot be used for currency as long as it is mixed with the quartz and rock in which it lies embedded. So your soul is useless to God till taken out from sin and earthliness and selfishness in which it lies buried. By the regenerating power of the Spirit you must be separated unto Christ, stamped with his image and superscription and made into a divine currency which shall bear his likeness among men. The Christian is, so to speak, the circulating medium of Christ, the coin of the realm by whom the great transactions of mercy and grace to a lost world are carried on. As the currency stands for the gold, so does the Christian stand for Christ, representing his good and acceptable will.

Service in the World.

2. Christ takes us out of the world in order to send us into the world. His two great texts should never be forgotten. "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." "As the Father hath sent me into the world, so have I sent you into the world." I am not advocating any surly asceticism, any monkish or selfish seclusion from society. It is the men and women who rise highest into fellowship with Christ, who plunge deepest into the sin and woe of the world to rescue the lost. A swimmer who would dive to the bottom of a pool selects the loftiest point he can find from which to leap. It is to me one of the standing confirmations of the truth of our religion, that its highest saints have been its deepest divers into the woe of our suffering race. A worldly man is in the world, not to make his neighbors more unworldly, but to make himself more worldly. A heavenly man is in the world to lift men up to God. There is no peril to the true saint in going into the world: he can no more be hurt by it, than a sunbeam can be defiled by falling into mud and slime. For the sunbeam has its origin and continuance in the sun, and the Christian has his source and being in God. "Go ye into the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," is our Lord's command, and in order to keep it, rise ye into living and constant communion with your risen Saviour; come out of the world my hearers, by a true and separating faith, that you may be sent into the world bearing the blessing of the Gospel of Christ.

A FAMILY COUNCIL.

IN a letter to the Baptist Missionary Society, Dr. J. S. Grant of Ningpo, China, relates the following: A man named Tah-Kao, came to our neighborhood to work a farm on shares with one of our members. This brother let his light shine both in his work and in his home, and at last persuaded Tah-Kao to go with him on Sunday to the chapel and hear the preacher talk, with the result that he became interested and sent word to his folks, who lived about thirty miles away, near our sanitarium in Daisen-saen, that he wanted to join the foreign religion. His people became much excited on hearing this, and sent off his wife post haste to prevent him from doing what in their eyes seemed a dreadful thing. Our preacher visited them several times in their new home, till at last, his wife became interested enough in the Gospel to allow her husband to go to church, and even walked with him on Sunday, a distance of a little over three miles. The second time she came with her husband I had the pleasure of meeting and talking with her, when she said the doctrine was good, and she was willing for her husband to "jih-kyiao" (that is, join the church).

When his people heard that the wife, instead of keeping the husband in the straight path, had herself, so to speak, been led astray, a family council was held, and his oldest brother and uncle (the father being dead) were sent to talk with Tah-Kao and his wife, with authority, or rather permission, to use whatever means they thought best to keep them from uniting with the church. When the uncle and brother arrived, Tah-Kao and his wife received their reproaches, etc., very meekly, and at last consented to go with them and call on the preacher. They arrived at the preacher's house about the middle of the forenoon, and before leaving said, "Tah-Kao might join the church if he wished still to do so, that the doctrine was good, and the ancestral worship could be attended to by the other brothers." Two Sundays after Tah-Kao joined the church.

CHINESE CRUELITIES.

IN a recent missionary address in England, Rev. Charles Wenyon, M.D., said: "Some people are deceived by the æsthetic euphemisms with which the Chinese are such adepts at covering their depravity that they know nothing of the horrible depths in which those people live. I believe that the cruelties of the Chinese could not be matched outside the cannibal islands, if it could be matched there. They think nothing, on the slightest irritation, of snatching the ear-rings out of the ears of the domestic slaves, and when they are sick unto death they carry them into the graveyard, and leave them there to die. Relationship is no protection. A man came into my hospital. I said, 'How many children have you?' 'Only two.' 'Girls or boys?' These are boys, I had three girls, but I drowned them.' I said to myself, 'Happy the little girls that they had no worse fate!' For the Chinese believe in the transmigration of souls, and it is their custom sometimes, when a girl has been drowned and another girl is born, to burn the little child to death, or put it to death in some other torturing method, that no other girl's spirit shall ever venture to come to that house. I do not say these things are universal. There are men and women in China trying to act according to the higher instincts of their nature. But these things are not uncommon, and they are not done in holes and corners, but in the light of day. Government can hardly interfere, for Government is as cruel itself.

Trial by torture is still a common method in all criminal cases, and the horrible punishment of the Ling-chi, in which the victim—often a woman—is done to death by gashes deliberately made upon the surface of the body, from the head downward, may still be witnessed frequently at the public execution ground at Canton. And the Chinese people as immoral as they are cruel. As a medical man I have special facilities for passing a judgment upon this question. None who have not lived in that country can form any conception of the depths of degradation to which these people have sunk. Crimes which, when discovered in this country, shock the moral sense of the community and send a thrill of horror through the land, are there regarded as a mere matter of course.

Men in high positions—influential Government officials, it may be—have their lives disfigured by the most hideous vices; and, so far from religion being a check to these things, if there is one class of people in China more notoriously immoral than another, it is the priests of Buddha and the "literati," or patrons of Confucius. The immorality is so terrible that what in this country would be a curse, and what some people think is a curse, in China is a positive blessing. I refer to the zenana-like seclusion in which the respectable people live. It is a veritable haven of refuge, a moral sanitarium in which the mothers and daughters and wives and sisters of respectable people may keep clear of the evils which otherwise would be universal. To break down the present separation between the sexes in China, before Christianity has cleared the air would lead to such bacchanalian orgies as might threaten the extermination of the race.

LITERARY CONVERTS.

At the American Board's station at Shao-wu, in the Foochow district, China, Mr. Gardener has been having a cheering experience. He writes: "At this time there seems to be a large number of literary men in this field coming out for the Lord. Last communion Sabbath I baptized five men, two of whom were first-degree graduates. One of these two men may possibly be a candidate as theological student another year. There are also a number of literary men who are inquirers, but have not yet come out definitely. An interesting case is that of our Mr. Tan. His father, himself, and several of his brothers are all first-degree graduates. He is constantly urging others to become Christians and unite with the church, even writing to a distance a letter of exhortation, but he himself holds back, not quite ready, or else a little afraid. At recent examinations of a literary man for church membership, another literary man, having no connection with us, volunteered testimony to the candidate's character and Christian conduct. These things show a remarkable undercurrent bearing the people away from their idols to accept of Christ as their Saviour and Lord.

THE ART OF CHRISTIAN LIVING.

WHEN you think, when you speak,
 When you read, when you write,
 When you sing, when you walk,
 When you seek for delight,
 To be kept from all evil at home and abroad
 Live always as under the Lord.

Whatever you think, both in joy and in woe, Think nothing you would not like Jesus to know;
 Whatever you say, in a whisper or clear,
 Say nothing you would not like Jesus to hear.

Whatever you write, in haste or with heed Write nothing you would not like Jesus to read;

Whatever you sing, in the midst of your glees,
 Sing nothing that God's listening ear could displease.

Wherever you go, never go where you'd fear God's question, if asked you, "What doest thou here?"

Whatever the pastime in which you engage,
 For the cheering of youth, or the solace of age,

Turn away from each pleasure you'd shrink from pursuing,
 Were God to look down and say, "What art thou doing?"

HIM ONLY.

ONLY Christ can save your soul;
 Only he can calm your breast;
 Only Christ can make you whole;
 Only he can give you rest.
 When the world and friends forsake,
 When your sins oppress you sore,
 When the storms around you break,
 Who can hope and peace restore?
 Only Christ! Only Christ!
 He can hope and peace restore!

Only Christ your steps can aid,
 Only he can cleanse from sin:
 Only Christ, whose blood was paid
 As the price your soul to win!
 Would you find the Friend of friends?
 Would your feet in gladness stray?
 Would you know the love he sends?
 Would you seek the Light of the Way?
 Only Christ! Only Christ!
 He alone the Light—the Way!

IN THE PENUMBRA.

The Coming Dispensation Indicated
 Like the Shadow of an Eclipse.

BY REV. BURLINGTON B. WALE.

THE descent of the Spirit on Jew and Gentile on the day of Pentecost, and in the house of Cornelius seven years afterwards, was another and important step towards the dissolution of the fabric. True, indeed, the priests still continued to officiate, to offer sacrifices, to put on their beautiful garments, and to attend to the minutest details of that gorgeous ritual; but the glory had departed, it had ceased to be the house of God, and all its round of ritualistic worship was worse than meaningless in his sight. But though the doom of city and temple and dispensation were sealed, and written by the fingers of a man's hand upon the wall, there was no one among the rulers of the people, Levite or priest or Pharisee, who could interpret the writing, or understand its significance, and it waited thirty years for the Romans to come to decipher its terrible meaning in the lurid light of the burning city and temple. And so it passed away.

Thus the Jewish dispensation overlapped the Christian for thirty years before it finally ceased to be. Thus gradually and almost unnoticed did the one supplant the other. Would there not have been many who in the course of those thirty years which intervened between the crucifixion of Christ and destruction of Jerusalem, refused to believe till the very last, that that dispensation and ritual were fore-doomed of God? was actually perishing, and would ere long cease to exist? Would not some have reasoned thus: "This ritual and worship were beyond all question instituted by God himself; inaugurated amid the thunders and lightnings, blackness and tempests of Sinai, sanctified and illustrated by miracle and prodigy for a thousand years; adorned with the names, the genius, and the inspiration of Prophet and Seer and Psalmist; names that will live while the world lasts. It has been conservative of Divine truth, and of the chosen people during all that time; its temple is the only recognized dwelling place of God upon earth; and its priests the divinely accredited custodians of Divine Revelation: its laws were written by the finger of God, and it comes to us venerable with the weight of years, and yet endowed with the vigor of immortal youth. Is it possible, is it probable that a worship and a ritual divine in their origin, conservative in their influence, hallowed and confirmed by the most solemn and repeated sanctions of the Almighty are now about to be abandoned, disowned by him, and to be supplanted by a system without a temple, without a ritual, and without a temple, without a priesthood? Yet this reasoning would have been false—however plausible. The new-born dispensation, whose symbol was the Cross, was to supplant and to establish itself upon the ruins of the old; and it has done this for eighteen hundred years. Yet even this dispensation is not final—but is to be succeeded by another, the Millennial reign of Christ, introduced by the second advent of the Saviour, though there are many who are reasoning now in reference to the present dispensation as the Jewish objector to Christianity would have reasoned in his day.

But this dispensation, like its predecessors, will pass away by merging gently into its successor. It will not be as the meeting of two thunder-clouds charged with electricity, and coming into collision with a startling report; but in its first stages merging into its successor almost imperceptibly.

And the night will deepen ere the morning dawns. We do not mean for a moment to affirm that no signal signs or catastrophes will herald its approach—nay, have heralded its approach, for we believe that we have now entered upon the silent juncture of eras, and that the overlapping of dispensations is characteristic of the present hour and day; that for the last few years we have been advancing farther and farther into the shadow of the terrible judgment that impends over Christendom, preparatory to the peaceful reign of the Messiah, when the saints of the Most High shall possess the Kingdom under the whole heavens, and "He shall come whose right it is to reign."

THE HOLY SPIRIT'S HELP.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning July 8. John 16: 7-14.

THE difference between intellectual and spiritual life is the measure of help that the Holy Spirit gives to men. In every Christian land there are thousands of men who believe the Bible, who assent to every article of an orthodox creed, who are ready to do battle for the truth, who believe Christ to be the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, yet being all this are not Christians in the true sense of the word. They cannot understand other men, not so intelligent as themselves, not so fully acquainted with the Bible or with current theological discussion, who are nevertheless completely animated with the truths of religion, and to whom Christ is the one supreme ruler and friend, the very essence of their life without whose love and confidence they would perish. To the one, religion is a matter of intellect to the other it is spiritual life. The difference between them is that one has and the other has not experienced the power of the Holy Spirit. He has the power of giving life to theory of making belief a living force. He is the life-giver. Without him belief in Christ has no more power over the life than has the theory that the world goes round the sun. Without him doctrine, even the most orthodox, is outside the man. Efforts may be made to live a cleanly life, to be regular in the observance of service and ceremony, to avoid sin and to do good, but without the Holy Spirit there is no active spiritual life and no real enjoyment of religion. So much the Holy Spirit does—he gives life.

Life once imparted, there is growth. The new life extends its roots entering deeper and deeper into the soil of the man's nature. It permeates his being, forcing out evil passions, correcting and controlling natural tendencies, hereditary proclivities, instilling right principles, quickening the conscience, absorbing more and more of his nature and making him every day more spiritual, until at last he enters congenially the abode of spirits. Thus, throughout his life, the man has an almighty ally in the struggle with his brute nature that every man worthy of the name of man must wage. The animal in him will rule if it is allowed to do so, and when it does, the man knows no joys but such as his body affords him. He leads an animal life, and has abdicated the position his Creator intended him to occupy. If his spirit is to rule, the animal in him must be subdued and held in subjection, and this victory cannot be achieved without a severe struggle. It is in this struggle that the help of the Holy Spirit is invaluable. With God in him, victory is assured. The Holy Spirit also helps as a guide. "He shall guide you into all truth," was Christ's promise concerning him. And he is doing so continually. To every generation some new truth has been revealed. We see and perceive more of Christ and his spirit than our fathers did, and there is yet more to be known. So to the man's intellect and to his spirit, the Holy Spirit becomes his very life, and this Holy Spirit God will give to those who ask him.

THE Y. M. C. A. MEDAL.

As a memento of the great Jubilee celebration of the Young Men's Christian Association, a medal has been struck and issued to the delegates. Pictures of its two sides are given on this page. On one side it bears a portrait of Sir George Williams, the founder of the Y. M. C. A. in 1844; and on the reverse is the Jubilee date, June 6, 1894, and a design of an open Bible, on the pages of which are inscribed the words from Psalms 119: 9: "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy word." The medal was designed and engraved by Queen Victoria's own medallist, Mr. Allan Wyon, F. S. A., and is of exquisite workmanship. It is two inches in diameter.

THREE KING'S DAUGHTERS.

On this page are three prominent members of the famous Order which is showing to the world how Christ's teachings are being realized and obeyed by his followers in this generation. Time was when the church thought it had done its whole duty in preaching the Gospel and seeking the conversion of souls. But in our day an effort has been made, as Christ commanded, to relieve the poor in his name and for his sake.

Prominent in the work have been the women and girls

MISS H. C. TITCOMB,
Pres. of King's Daughters, Newport, R. I.

who wear the little silver badge and have for their motto, "In His Name." The three ladies whose portraits we give and for which we are indebted to the courtesy of the "Silver Cross" are: Mrs. John T. Mason, who has just been re-elected State Secretary of the Order in Maryland; Miss H. C. Titcomb, President of the Knight Errant Circle of Newport, R. I., and Mrs. A. E. Sage, President of the Ready and Willing Circle of Fort Lee and Coatesville, N. J.

The Order in Maryland is in a flourishing condition. At its fourth annual convention recently held in Baltimore forty-two Circles were represented, and each sent in a report showing the various forms of usefulness in which it had been engaged. The almost endless variety of these spheres of service was an indication of the elasticity and adaptability of the Order in cases of need. Some had been making garments for the poor; others had been visiting the sick and friendless; others had been arranging means and plans for convalescents' home; others providing for aged people and besides all these had taken cognizance of special needs connected with their own churches and had met them. The forty-two Circles had an aggregate membership of more than a thousand, and during the preceding year these girls had given, collected and disbursed $5,593, besides the food and garments. Mrs. Mason was re-elected to the onerous and responsible position of State Secretary by a unanimous vote.

The Knight Errant Circle of Newport, of which Miss Titcomb is President, is now in CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR BANNERS.

The United Society of Christian Endeavor has issued a notice in which every Society should be interested. It expresses the hope that the Christian Endeavor unions of the country will not neglect to send in to Secretary Baer a statement of the work they have accomplished along the lines for which diplomas are to be given at Cleveland. Three banners are proposed, it will be remembered; one to the union that reports the largest number of Christian Endeavor societies added to its membership; another to the union that has done the best work along the lines of Christian citizenship; and a third to the union that contains the largest proportion of systematic givers. These unions have until July 1st to report.

EPWORTH LEAGUE IN CALCUTTA.

A correspondent of the "Indian Witness" sends the following account of the organization of a special Epworth League in Calcutta: During the past month, the first Epworth League for the Bengali speaking people of the M. E. Church has been organized. For some time several persons have felt that a distinct need in the Bengali Church was some rallying-point for the young people and this Epworth League with its departments of spiritual work, mercy and help, literary and social work has been launched. We are expecting rich blessings upon the church as a result of getting the young people not simply alive to their duty but to their privilege of doing earnest Christian work. We anticipate when the committee get thoroughly organized that quite a number of cottage meetings will be held, open air preaching conducted, and above all individual effort for the salvation of some of the hundreds and thousands of the Bengalis of Calcutta. We expect that our department of mercy and help will do blessed work among the sick and aged of the church, that they will go out to the hospitals, and in all ways try to shew forth that the Saviour we serve is a merciful and a helpful Saviour. Evidently, in India as in

OBVERSE AND REVERSE OF JUBILEE Y. M. C. A. MEDAL.

America, in Europe, and all over Christendom, the idea of helpfulness is taking hold of Christ's people.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

An Australian society is made up of members none of whom live within a mile of their place of meeting.

The Endeavorers of Minnesota are to send Miss Moulton, a senior at Carleton College, as a missionary to assist Miss Abbott at Bombay, India.

The statistics of the forthcoming Year-Book show that there are 3,392 Congregational Endeavor Societies, with a membership of 166,440, against 3,195 societies and 157,678 members reported last year.

The First Baptist Church of Rockland, Me., has decided to suspend its Sunday night preaching service during the summer months and give the evening every week to the charge of the Young People's Union connected with the church.

Special song and prayer services will be held on board the "Philadelphia Special," which will carry delegates to the National Convention of Baptist Young Peoples' Unions at Toronto on July 19-22. Organ, singing books, etc. will be provided.

The report of the Auckland, New Zealand Y. M. C. A., the oldest Association in the Colonies, shows good, earnest, fruitful work for the past year, both in the spiritual and mental operations. To many the Association has been a refuge in the time of great danger.

The second annual Convention of the South Wales and Monmouthshire Union of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, held at Merthyr Tydvil, was characterized by much spiritual power and fervor, the meetings being large and enthusiastic.

Rev. J. T. Docking, Ph. D., of Westerly, R. I., one of the founders of the Epworth League, has been invited to speak at the Grindewald on the Epworth League of America. This is the great Chautauqua of Europe, in charge of Rev. Dr. Lunn, editor of the Review of the Churches.

The question of electing lady members of the B. Y. P. U., to seats on the Board is likely to be an important one at the forthcoming National Convention. At Detroit a year ago the subject was mooted, in connection with the election of officers and directors. At the suggestion of the secretary, Dr. Wilkins, the subject was not pressed, and the ballot, made up of gentlemen only, was elected. It seems to have been understood by some that the question was simply postponed; by others that the action taken was tantamount to a decision. The subject is however not to rest without a formal decision.

In Mongolian Homes.

A Strange Race of Nomads—Experiences of a Christian Physician—A Vast Field for Future Missionary Effort.

ALMOST all that the civilized world knows of Mongolia has been learned through Christian missionaries. They have travelled up and down through that vast country, lying to the north of China, and stretching three thousand miles from east to west, and nearly one thousand miles from north to south. They have told us, in their letters, of its strange people, its nomad tribes and the multitudes of caravans that travel across the country in many directions, for it is really an immense plateau. In a large part of Mongolia, there are no permanent villages or towns. The people live in tents, like the Bedouins of Syria; and during the summer they wander over the country seeking pasturage for their flocks. In winter, they seek sheltered places and there with comfortable tents pitched and fires burning, they remain till the cold season is ended. The occupants of the tents sleep around the fire, after the fashion of American Indian nomads. In another part of Mongolia, where the population is not of same roving nature, it is customary to sleep on bedsteads made of bricks, that are kept warm by a little oven underneath. So intense is the cold in winter that without such a precaution, the young and the sick would perish.

One of the bravest Christian missionaries who ever travelled in Mongolia was the late James Gilmour. He passed many years of his life among these people, teaching the Gospel and healing the sick. In a little volume entitled, "James Gilmour and his Boys," published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, interesting information is furnished concerning the country and its inhabitants, their customs and superstitions. The Mongolian religion is Buddhism and nearly half the men of the country are priests or "lamas." It is, consequently, a difficult thing for a missionary to secure a hearing, for where every second man is a priest, the opposition to any new form of religion is probably greater than is to be found anywhere else in the world. But where the missionary is physician as well as teacher—as Mr. Gilmour fortunately was—he quickly finds a welcome. His cures are regarded as little short of miraculous, and frequently pave the way for a belief in that Great Physician in whose name they are performed. But it often happens that the missionary is asked to perform impossible and ridiculous cures. One man asks to be made fat, another to be clever, another wishes to be cured of hunger, another to have his taste for tobacco or whiskey taken away, while almost everybody would like to have his skin made white, like the foreigner.

What Mongolia needs most, next to spiritual teachers, is schoolmasters and cooks. The people are woefully ignorant of letters and cuisine, and a majority are given to drinking. Mothers know little about the training of children, and the latter are reared in a haphazard way, with little or no attempt at teaching morals. The women are tidy and the girls well-behaved and modest. Many of the adults are opium smokers. The land is crowded with temples and idol-worship is universal. Theatres, gambling-houses and such like places thrive. During his years of faithful work, Mr. Gilmour had the satisfaction of seeing many whom he had been instrumental in bringing to the Saviour. He established classes to teach the young girls some of the simpler domestic duties, being taid in this branch of the work by Mrs. Gilmour.

Many of the Mongols are industrious traders, farmers and shepherds. With more missionaries and teachers to labor among them, a great moral and educational advancement would be possible. The gospel seed sown by such noble men as Gilmour has already produced a harvest that will increase as the years go on.

"He Lives in our Alley."

"Where," said a teacher to his class of little ragged boys gathered from the crowded courts of the great city, "where is Jesus Christ?"

Quickly the answer came from a bright-eyed little fellow, in a tone of the utmost confidence, as though there were no manner of doubt about it:

"Oh, he lives in our alley now!"

What a revelation of faith and hope and love embodied in the daily life and work, was wrapped up in that answer. The alley had been the abode of poverty, dirt and misery. The women quarrelled, the men drank, the children were neglected. But a lady came to reside in the neighborhood who offered her services as a district visitor to the pastor of the parish. In a sort of apologetic way he said:

own, with which those around them are not familiar. The communings of their hearts are with the scenes of the past and the companions of other years who have long ago passed away. Lover and friend have been taken from them, and their acquaintance laid in darkness. The forms they admired and loved are gone, the eyes that looked into theirs with the tenderest affection are sightless, and the voices that cheered and stirred their souls have long been silent. Their early world of hope and joy has become a desolation, and they sit in silence. They are

Only waiting till the shadows
Are a little longer grown, to pass on to the reunion that awaits them, and the glad greetings of those they love.

Where She Wanted to Get Out.

A little boy and his younger sister were playing at "trains." He was the engine, and she was the carriage and passengers all in one. Determined to get a big enough station to start from, he shouted, "London!" and went puffing away. In a little while he stopped, and called out "Liverpool!" and then again "New York!" After that he had to come to a stop again, but his geography was exhausted, and so, unable to remember any other place, he shouted "Heaven!" The little passenger thereupon spoke: "Top, I sink I should like to get out here."

Helping Mother.

One of the papers tells of a pretty and talented girl who had completed her school course with credit, and by reason of special accomplishments had received much attention and admiration, and who was asked

THE LITTLE ARM CHAIR.

NOBODY sits in the little arm-chair, It stands in a corner dim; But a white-haired mother gazing there And yearningly thinking of him, Sees through the dust of long ago, And the bloom of her boy's sweet face, As he rocks so merrily to and fro, With a laugh that cheers the place.

Sometimes he holds a book in his hand, Sometimes a pencil and slate; And the lesson is hard to understand, And the figures hard to mate; But she sees the nod of the father's head So proud of his little son, And she hears the word so often said: "No fear for our little one."

These were wonderful, dear sweet days, When a child with sunny hair Was here to scold, to kiss and to praise At her knee in the little chair. She lost him back in her busy years, When the great world caught the man, And he strode away past hopes and fears To his place in the battle's van.

And now and then, in a wistful dream, Like a picture out of date, She sees a head with a golden gleam Bent over a pencil and slate. And she lives again the happy day, The days of her young life's spring, When the arm-chair stood just in the way, The centre of everything.

SCOLDING THE CHILDREN.

A sclaundersome tunge, a tunge of a skold, Worketh more mischief than can be tolde. Scolding is always an expression of a bad spirit and a loss of temper. This is as truly the case when a loving mother scolds her child for breaking his playthings wilfully, or for soiling his third dress in one forenoon by playing in the gutter which he was forbidden to approach, as when one apple-woman yells out her abuse of another apple-woman in a street-corner quarrel. In either case, writes H. Clay Trumbull, the essence of the scolding is in the multiplication of hot words in expression of strong feelings that, while eminently natural, ought to be held in better control. The words themselves may be very different in the two cases, but the spirit and method are much alike in both. It is scolding in the one case as in the other; and scolding is never in order.

If a child has done wrong, a child needs talking to; but no parent ought to talk to a child while that parent is unable to talk in a natural tone of voice, and with carefully measured words. If the parent is tempted to talk rapidly, or to multiply words without stopping to weigh them, or to show an excited state of feeling, the parent's first duty is to gain entire self-control. Until that control is secured, there is no use of the parent's trying to attempt any measure of child-training. The loss of self-control is for the time being an utter loss of power for the control of others. This is as true in one sphere as in another.

In giving commands, or in giving censure, to a child, the fewer and the more calmly spoken words the better. A child soon learns that scolding means less than quiet talking; and he even comes to find a certain satisfaction in waiting silently until the scolder has blown off the surplus feeling which vents itself in this way. There are times, indeed, when words may be multiplied to advantage in explaining to a child the nature and consequences of his offense, and the reasons why he should be different in the future; but such words should always be spoken in gentleness, and in self-controlled earnestness. Scolding—rapidly spoken censure and protest, in the exhibit of strong feeling—is never in order as a means of training and directing the child. No child is ever helped or benefited by any scolding that he receives; and no parent ever helps or benefits his child by means of a scolding.

LIFE IN MONGOLIA—

A FAMILY OF NOMADS AT HOME.

"I suppose I must not ask you to take this alley?"

"Why not?" asked the lady.

"Well," he said, "it's not a very promising district."

She modestly replied: "Then it must be more need our sympathy."

So the lady began her work in the alley, not in her own strength, but in the power of God's Holy Spirit. By her sweet smile and kindly looks and loving words she soon won all hearts. The small rooms became cleaner, and scolding women became more gentle, and the hard-earned money of the laborer was brought home to buy bread instead of being spent at the saloon. So evident was the transformation that even the children felt it; hence the touching reply, "Oh, he lives in our alley now!"

The Loneliness of Old Age.

How few treat with due tenderness and consideration those who have outlived their generation, and whose early companions and friends have been taken from them! Unable to engage in the activities of life, they are no longer brought into contact and sympathy with those around them, and no tie of common interest and mutual dependence binds them together. They necessarily, to a great extent, live in a world of their

the other day how she enjoyed her freedom from school life.

"Oh, I'm enjoying it very much," she answered, brightly. "I'm doing the housework, and letting mother have a little rest."

"Your mother is away, then, is she not?" was the natural question.

"Oh, no," was the reply; she's at home but I'm giving her a chance to rest in the morning, and to dress up and to sit out on the piazza when she feels like it. I think it will do her good to have a little change."

Dicken's Children's Prayer.

Charles Dickens, the famous English author, wrote the following simple, touching prayer for his children, and they repeated it night and morning:

"Pray God, bless my dear papa, mamma, brothers and sisters, and auntie, and all my relatives and friends. Make me a good little girl. Let me never be naughty or tell a lie, which is a mean and shameful thing. Make me kind to my nurse and servants, and to all poor people. Let me never be cruel to any dumb creature; for if I am cruel to anything, even to a poor little fly, thou, who are so good, wilt never love me. Pray God to bless and preserve us this night and for evermore, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

The Sons of Ishmael.

A Sheikh's Wife at Home—In a Happy Bedouin Family—Nomad Poetry and Romance—Brave Ali Diab.

CLESS formal call than that reported in my last letter is paid to a Bedouin camp of humbler pretensions and many miles distant from the powerful sheik whose portrait accompanied that paper.

A woman came to our tents this morning before breakfast with exactly two boiled eggs to sell. She belonged to the poorer class of Bedouins, emigrants from the wealthier tribes across the Jordan. A thin, miserable-looking baby was upon her shoulder, and scratched its head while the kodak, hidden by a curtain of the tent door, took a picture of mother and child. She had come from an encampment four hills away, she said, and was on her way to Jericho to spend the money she would get for her fresh eggs. They were laid yesterday. John had his orders to pay her three times what they were worth, and to give something to the baby. With all my love for the young of the human species, I did not care to go nearer this specimen.

It is after our lunch and "siesta," that our journeying brings us in sight of the village the woman must have quitted at dawn for the walk over the hills. The turn that reveals it, burrowing, as it were between two sand-mountains, is so abrupt that the community is spell-bound for an instant. Children playing upon the waste lands about the black booths, gape at the approaching party, and the one man visible out-of-doors is the only person who has the self-possession to call back the pack of yelping, baying curs rushing about the feet of the horses. To the momentary consternation succeeds a hurry-scurry on the part of the women, led on by a tall figure who is named to us as the principal wife of the sheik. From two compartments of the three-roomed tent they issue in frantic haste, laden with quilts and rugs, and bearing them into the guest-room. By the time we enter this, a sort of bed or divan is laid around two sides of the compartment, and cushions are piled at irregular intervals upon it. The wife-in-chief meets me, stoops to kiss my hand, carries it to her forehead and her heart, and indicates where she would have me sit. When I comply, but do not recline, another older woman pats the nearest heap of cushions, and smiles persuasively. A compromise is effected by resting an elbow upon this "arm" of the divan.

The sheik's favorite, registered in our note-book, at one time, as "Zenobia!" at another, "Boadicea," must have been as nearly handsome in youth as a dusky maiden can be, whose forehead, cheeks and chin are tattooed with polka-dots, rings, crescents, stars and other designs, and whose upper and lower eyelids are painted. She is stately in shape and carriage, and wears her dark-blue gown and veil, upon which are some tatters and embroidery, as an empress her ermine. Taking a handful of dried thorns and twigs from a maid, she kneels over the hillock of white ashes in the middle of the floor, and herself kindles the fire, pushing up her loose sleeves to the elbow, and holding back her veil that she may blow the embers to a blaze. Her slender wrists are loaded with silver bracelets, and her arms are tattooed as far as we can see them. As she sits on her heels, watching the result of her labor upon the creeping flame, we open the conversation by thanking her for taking so much trouble to make us comfortable, and protesting against further exertion on her part. She answers without withdrawing her eyes from the fire or turning her head.

"She says that she is only performing her duty in her husband's absence," says David from the other side of the apartment. "That," should he be told, when he returns, that she had done less, he would be displeased with her. Also, that he would have a right to be."

Uneasy at the silence that prevails, we give the ball of talk another "shove."

"Tell her how much we admire those bracelets, and that we have seen no others of that pattern. And if it is quite the thing, ask where we can find some like them."

"In Jerusalem!" returns the sheik-ess, laconically, still staring the fire out of countenance.

Seeing it, at length, burn brightly, she rises like a queen, for all her tattooing and tatters, and sweeps her long robes out of sight. Her mother, very like her in face, but gentler of mien, takes her place, producing two brass coffee-pots, with tops, one of which she sets in the ashes, the other upon the ground. To a man, who is our

The acting host listens respectfully, his head slightly bent, and not a muscle of his visage relaxing from the pensiveness which seems habitual. Then he turns to me and makes a speech of several sentences.

"He says that in his father's absence, he hopes you will look upon him as the head of the household, and your host. That he is proud and honored by your visit to his poor hut. That he trusts you will remain long, and consider all that he has as yours," repeats David, conscientiously.

In response to our queries, the young man informs us that his father is sheik over about one hundred and twenty families, scattered over an area of five or six miles. The flock and herds we have passed on the road since luncheon belong to the tribe.

The, until now, unsmiling countenance light up as a little toddler of two and a half years runs into the tent and clasps him about the knees.

"My son!" he says proudly, raising him in his arms. The old woman who made the coffee laughs sympathetically, and glances at me with the quick free-masonry of motherhood which is comprehended the whole world round.

"How many children have you?" I have David Jamal to ask her.

"Two."

"Both are married, I suppose?" recollecting that she is mother-in-law to the sheik.

"Neither is married."

This "poser" is solved subsequently by tion is put to us, and there is not a symptom of surprise at our descent, horse and foot, upon the encampment. When we make a motion to go, we are urged to remain to dinner, and assured that we could be made comfortable for the night. Our diffident petition to be allowed to carry off pictures of the village and inhabitants meets with ready assent, the women (unaided by the men, we notice) eagerly looping back the western curtain to let in a stream of light upon an interior that, even thus, shows hut obscurely upon the developed "film."

Good-byes have been exchanged, and our small party is in motion, when the sheik's son brings forward his boy—the fond smile which the baby alone has called to the serious face, irradiating it—and holds him to kiss my hand. The little fellow, tutored by his parent, goes prettily through the form; I detach a bright flower I am wearing, from my dress, and drop it into the child's hand, and we carry away the image of the two in the foreground of our memory of the visit.

A mile further upon our road we meet the tribal poet, and he is duly presented to our notice.

"Herein is novelty!" we can hardly await our parting to ejaculate. "A Bedouin bard! What does he do? and when? and how? and where?"

As a sequence, we enjoy at our tent-door in the moonlight or succeeding the evening meal an intelligent and entertaining lecture upon Bedouin war-songs, love-songs, and horse-songs. To the latter, the Ishmaelish muse most seriously and frequently inclines. A metrical translation of one copied from Alcides's note-book will give a fair idea of their scope and spirit:

I covet not the hoarded wealth the rich
Damascene boasts;
I covet not the merchant's ships that trade with distant coasts;
But the man who owns the swiftest steed that sweeps the desert sands,
His wealth I covet more than all throughout the Prophet's lands.
I covet him, although he bears no saddle and no rein;
That horse I'll buy if he should cost all
I e'er hope to gain,
Although any tribesman call me mad,
—although they speak me ill.
I wish nought more: my horse shall be my greatest treasure still.

The Bedouin war-lyrics are in the same key with the old border-ballads. While they may not rank in poetic merit with "Chevy Chase" and "Edom o'Gordon," we make notes of some which show fire of imagination, as well as of spirit. One, founded upon an actual occurrence, is worth relating here. The meagre outline can not impress the reader as the hearing moves us in the profound stillness of an evening as mild as May-time. The interpreter sits a few feet away, the moon full upon the dark, strong features, reciting one line at a time in the native Arabic, as in soliloquy, then rendering it in English for our enlightenment.

A young man's sweetheart was captured by a marauding band with whom her people were at war. All through the country-side went the call to arms against the robbers who had stolen the fairest treasure of the tribe. When all the men-of-war mustered before the tent of the sheik, he said there were too many. There would be no honor in attacking the enemy with an overwhelming force. He would take with him no boys, only warriors used to carry arms, and as a test, he decreed that none should follow him whose beards were not thick enough to hold the "beard comb" when stuck into them.

Now, the youth whose promised bride had been carried off was but twenty years of age, and had no beard. Should he endure the disgrace of seeing the fighting men of the tribe depart to recover his betrothed, and revenge him upon her captors, and he be left behind with the women and children in the tents? So, he drove the beard-comb into his chin, and leaving it sticking in the flesh, presented himself thus to the sheik. The chieftain was so delighted with his daring that he allowed him to ride forth at his side. The lover recovered his bride, fellow-guest, and who at our entrance, lay asleep upon a mat at the back of the tent, is assigned the duty of roasting the coffee.

"He is a near relative of the family," says the interpreter, "and may therefore be honored by helping prepare for entertaining the visitors."

The son of the sheik, well-knit in figure and of good stature, but whose otherwise fine face is disfigured by weak eyes, now makes his appearance from another part of the village. His black-and-white "abieh" parts over an embroidered vest; his ample "kateveh" is also wrought in various colors, and one end is flung picturesquely across his breast. When the coffee is ready, he presents a cup to me upon one knee, and hopes I will honor him by tasting it. So princely is his deportment, so thorough-bred the grave courtesy of his behavior to the intruders upon his home, that I entreat David to convey him in his very best manner our appreciation of his kindness and our sense of our ill-deserts.

the intelligence that her two bachelor sons are much younger than the favorite of the harem (who is not the young host's mother, by the way) and that her three daughters do not count in the computation of her "jewels."

There are twelve children, belonging to somebody—or somebodies—in the sheik's abode. Handsome, black-eyed and merry younglings, all of them, and as ragged and unkempt for the most part, as they are jolly. We beg to be allowed to photograph a group drawn up in unconscious effectiveness across the open front of the "reception room," and it is pleasant to see the sheik's son persuading them to stand still, and holding his shiv half-sister, the beauty of the band, by the hand to reassure her that we intend no harm. A second trial brings in more subjects, and in the foreground the baby-boy, the apple of his father's eye.

They are a gentle, peaceable tribe, it we may trust the evidence of our observation among them this afternoon. Not a ques-

Another song has to do with the adventures of Ali Diab, a sheik in the land of Moab, renowned for bravery. He was proscribed by the Government for daring violations of the law, and, while an outlaw, married one of the most beautiful women in Syria. Shortly after the wedding, he, his wife and a few horsemen were crossing the country when news was brought that a body of the Pasha's soldiers were in close pursuit of them. The sheik ordered his

A CHRISTLESS REGION.

IN a communication to "The Occident," Mrs. R. F. Coyle has the following regarding the Mountain Whites of Alabama and Virginia: "This great people is divided into two distinct and separate classes. The educated and well-to-do class live in the rich valleys, grouped in towns and villages, or cultivating the farms. And the poor, ignorant class live among the mountains. This second class is again divided into three grades, which we must keep clearly in mind when dealing with this question of Mountain Whites. First, there are the Bankers, whose home is on the sandy coast or sand bars. These are very degraded. The second grade are the Crackers, who derive their name from the crude manner in which they prepare their corn for food. The Crackers inhabit the sand hills, and have acquired an abnormal habit of eating a white clay found there, for the arsenic which it contains. These people are characterized as 'long, lank, colorless-haired, dim-eyed, green-complexioned' fellows. "As far as is known, there is no evangelical work being done amongst them. Then there are the people among the mountains. These are principally of Scotch-Irish descent, and are known to us as the Scotch-Irish mountaineers. It is here that our schools are being carried on, and it is here that our teachers are reaping such bountiful harvests for the Master. The Bankers, Crackers and Scotch-Irish mountaineers together number about one million. Most of these are within twenty-four hours' ride of New-York City, and yet so many are dying without the Gospel of our Christ. They have been driven back and back, kept in abject poverty, until they absolutely know of nothing better or higher.

"Most of these people are of good parentage; in some districts their ancestors were outlaws and refugees from justice. So that in some districts even these poor schools cannot be carried on because of family feuds and neighborhood brawls. Even their ministers are a very uneducated class, and believe that for themselves or their people to seek an education, would be dying in the face of Providence."

PALEY'S CONVERSION.

It sometimes happens that the impulse to a change of life comes to us from an unexpected quarter. It is said that when Paley, who afterwards became distinguished as a philosopher and theologian, was a young man at Cambridge, he was for his first two years considerably given to society, and neglectful of the studies of the University. He was induced to change his course of life by a somewhat singular circumstance. One morning, which had succeeded an unprofitably-spent evening, he was awakened at a very hour by one of his idle companions, who addressed him somewhat in the following terms: "Paley, I have been thinking how foolish you are. I could do nothing, probably, were I to try; and can afford the life I lead; you could do everything; and cannot afford the life you lead. I have had no sleep during the whole night on account of these reflections, and am now come solemnly to inform you that, if you persist in your indolence, I must renounce your society." The remonstrance produced a wondrous effect. The appeal to Paley's pride, the prudential considerations urged, the unexpectedness of a rebuke from such a quarter, the time and circumstances of the visit, combined to rouse the young votary of pleasure. The greater part of that day he passed in meditating on the occurrence, and in forming plans for the future. The next saw his life change, and in due time he became a successful student and an earnest Christian.

ON THE TOP OF ARARAT.

The summit of Mount Ararat is really a double summit, "each a few hundred yards apart," says a writer in the "Century." "The eastern top, on which we were standing, was quite extensive, and thirty to forty feet lower than its western neighbor. Both tops are hummocks on the huge dome of Ararat, like the humps on the back of a camel, on neither one of which is there a vestige of anything but snow. There remained just as little trace of the crosses left by Parrot and Chodzko, as of the ark itself. We remembered the pictures we had seen in our nursery-books, which represented this mountain-top covered with green grass; and Noah stepping out of the ark, in the bright, warm sunshine, before the receding waves; and now we look around and saw this very spot covered with perpetual snow. Nor did we see any evidence whatever of a former existing crater, except perhaps the snow-filled depression we have just mentioned. There was nothing about this perpetual snow-field, and the freezing atmosphere that was chilling us to the bone, to remind us that we were on the top of an extinct volcano that once trembled with convulsions of subterranean heat. The view from this towering height was immeasurably extensive and almost too grand. All detail was lost—all color, all outline; even the surrounding mountains seemed to be but excremental ridges of the plain. Then, too, we could catch only occasional glimpses, as the clouds shifted to and fro. At one time they opened up beneath us, and revealed the Aras valley with its glittering ribbon of silver at an abyssal depth below. Now and then we could descry the black volcanic peaks of Ali Ghez forty miles away to the northwest, and on the southwest the low mountains that obscured the town of Bayazid. Of the Caucasus, the mountains about Erzerum on the west, and Lake Van on the south, and even of the Caspian Sea, all of which are said to be in Ararat's horizon, we could see absolutely nothing."

wife to mount before him on his horse, that they might make a desperate flight while the way was yet open. She spat in his face and broke into biting reproaches. "I married you not for your beauty but your courage," she said. "I see you are a coward and no better than a woman."

The husband hastily detailed a handful of his men to remain with his wife; took the rest along "to guard his back," charged upon the soldiers, killed thirty of them, captured their horses; rode back to his bride and they escaped to the mountains together. This woman was so fair that a song was sung in her honor in Ali Diab's tribe, the refrain of which runs something like this: "We will beat the soldiers of the Pasha, for the sake of the eyes of Ali Diab's wife."

The hero of this tale is still living in a hale old age, and is reputed to be the mightiest and wealthiest Beduin in Syria.

WATCH YOUR WORDS.

KEEP a watch on your words, my sisters, For words are wonderful things; They are sweet like the bees' fresh honey— Like the bees, they have terrible stings; They can bless like the warm glad sunshine, And brighten a lonely life; They can cut, in the strife of anger, Like an open, two-edged knife.

Let them pass through your lips unchallenged

If their errand is true and kind—
If they come to support the weary,
To comfort and help the blind;
If a bitter, revengeful spirit
Prompt the words, let them be unsaid;
They may flash through a brain like lightning,
Or fall on the heart like lead.

PAUL'S PASTORAL TRIALS.*

THE starting-point for every inquiry into the relations between Paul and the Corinthians, is to be found in the close connection between the two epistles to the Corinthians which we possess. It is plain that before Paul wrote either, he had an intention, of which the Corinthians were aware, to visit Corinth in a certain way. He was to visit Ephesus, sail straight across the sea to Corinth, go from Corinth to Macedonia, and then return via Corinth to Asia again. In other words, on this tour he was to visit Corinth twice. In the last chapter of the first epistle, he announces a change of plan: he is not going to Corinth direct, but via Macedonia, and the Corinthians are only to see him once. He does not say in the first epistle why he has changed his plan, but the announcement caused great dissatisfaction in Corinth. Some said he was a fickle creature; some said he was afraid to show face. This is the situation to which the second epistle directly addresses itself, the very first thing Paul does in it is to explain and justify the change of plan announced in the first. It was not fickleness, he says, nor cowardice, that made him change his mind, but the desire to spare the Corinthians and himself the pain which a visit paid at the moment would certainly inflict.

Paul's remarks in the first verse of the second chapter and in the second verse of the thirteenth chapter of the second epistle compel us to assume that Paul had already visited Corinth a second time, and had very painful experiences there. But the close connection between the epistles equally compels us to assume that this second visit had been paid before even the first epistle was written. We know nothing of it except that it was not pleasant, and that Paul was very willing to save both himself and the Corinthians the repetition of such an experience. Hardly anything of this is known to us from Acts, and probably we should never have known of this journey unless in explaining the change of purpose which the first letter announced, it had occurred to Paul to say in effect: "I did not wish to come when it could only vex you; I had enough of that before."

The second epistle falls of itself into three clearly marked divisions. The first extends from the first chapter to the end of the seventh. In this the Apostle makes his peace, so to speak with the Corinthians, and does everything in his power to remove any feeling of soreness which might linger in their minds over his rigorous treatment of one particular offender. But embedded in this there is a magnificent vindication of the spiritual apostolic ministry, and an appeal for love and confidence such as he had always bestowed on the church. The eighth and ninth chapters form the second part of the epistle and are devoted to the collection which was being made in the Gentile churches for poor Christians in Jerusalem. The third part consists of chapters ten to thirteen. In this Paul confronts the disorders which still assert themselves in the church; the pretensions of certain Judaists, "superlative apostles," as he calls them, who were assailing his apostolic vocation and subverting his gospel; and the immoral license of others, presumably once pagans, who used liberty as a cloak to the flesh. He writes of both with unsparing severity, yet he does not wish to be severe. He parts from the church with words of unaffected love, and includes them all in his benediction.

INDIAN IDEAS OF THUNDER.

A thunder-storm that had been threatening for some time now began in good earnest. We crossed over to Reynal's lodge, though it hardly deserved the name, for it consisted only of a few old buffalo-ropes, supported on poles, and was quite open on one side. Here we sat down, and the Indians gathered round us.

"What is it," said I, "that makes the thunder?"

"It is my belief," said Reynal, "that it's a big stone rolling over the sky."

"Very likely," I replied; "but I want to know what the Indians think about it."

So he interpreted my question, which produced some debate. There was a difference of opinion. At last old Mene-Seela, or Red-Water, who sat by himself at one side, looked up with his withered face, and said he had always known what the thunder was. It was a great black bird; and once he had seen it, in a dream, swooping down from the Black Hills, with its loud roaring wings; and when it flapped them over a lake, they struck lightning from the water.

"The thunder is bad," said another old man, who sat muffled in his buffalo-robe; "he killed my brother last summer."

Reynal, at my request, asked for an explanation; but the old man remained doggedly silent, and would not look up. Some time after, I learned how the accident occurred. The man who was killed belonged to an association which, among other mystic functions, claimed the exclusive power and privilege of fighting the thunder. Whenever a storm which they wished to avert was threatening, the thunder-tighters would take their bows and arrows, their guns, their magic drum, and a sort of whistle, made out of the wing-bone of the war-eagle, and, thus equipped, run out and fire at the rising cloud, whooping, yelling, whistling, and beating their drum, to frighten it down again. One afternoon, a heavy black cloud was coming up, and they repaired to the top of a hill, where they brought all their magic artillery into play against it. But the undaunted thunder, refusing to be terrified darted out a bright flash, which struck one of the party dead as he was in the very act of shaking his long iron-pointed lance against it. The rest scattered and ran yelling in an ecstasy of superstitious terror back to their lodges.

HYMN.

WHY am I so often halting,
Stumbling, falling in the way,
When my footsteps should be speeding
To the land of endless day?
Why this doubting and distrusting,
Fearing, trembling and dismay,
When the word of Christ is steadfast,
"I am with you all the way?"

Why am I so often idle
In the service of the King,
When the knowledge of his goodness
Unto others I might bring?
Ah! my heart is cold and selfish,
In my hand no offering;
And my tongue is often silent,
When his praises I should sing.

Lord, I come in deep contrition,
Humbly on thy name I call,
Hear my cry for love and mercy,
Graciously forgive me all;
Fill me with thy Holy Spirit,
Let its power my heart enlhrall,
Give me wisdom, strength, and patience
For each duty, howe'er small.

THE ROYAL ROAD OR LIVING BY FAITH DAY BY DAY BY MARION HARLAND

CHAPTER XX. (Concluded.)

"I SAW something to-day that made me wish that you were with me," answered Lanier. The accord between their spirits was perfected with the passing of years. "Close by the Peddington station, right in the thick of wheels, horses and people, within six feet of the rails where locomotives were drilling up and down, were two sparrows picking up scattered grain, that had fallen from freight car or wagon. The chippiest, chirpiest pair of busybodies you can imagine, so happy over their 'find,' that they chattered as they ate. I stood still for fully five minutes to watch them. It was a sermon in song and feathers. The roar of traffic and the jargon of voices went for less than nothing to the wise midgets. God had put their dinner—such a big dinner! I just there, and they took it, asking no questions."

"The dear little types!" smiled the mother, tenderly. "I never see one without wishing he knew how honored he is—far above the other birds of the air. How careless of me not to notice that you are cumbered with all these letters and papers, and have to hold the reins besides! We have a lordly mail! Let me take it!"

"The heaviest—and it goes without saying—the most important part for Marie, including the usual corpulent envelope from Philadelphia. The postal service of Pequod will be lighter after November fifteenth. I am to be best man, she tells me. You must advise me what to get for a wedding-present. Lanier & Co. must have had the event in view when they raised my salary the first of the month. You will miss our bonnie girl."

"More than I could have believed possible, two years ago. The shock that awaited her upon her return from what we all considered an ill-starred voyage, threw her back into her mother's arms, and I have kept her there. Her friends are very good to her. Her Aunt Virginia has given her all her linen, and Mrs. Barnes is embroidering her initials upon each piece, 'stitching love into every letter,' as she says in her graceful way. I shall not let Mrs. Williams leave us until after the wedding. I shall convince her that we cannot get ready for it without her help. That is true as far as it goes, but she ought to have the change and rest."

"Has she been ill? I was actually appalled at the alteration in her when I met her at the station this afternoon. She must have lost fifty pounds of flesh since I saw her in July. But for her voice and laugh I should hardly have known her. I asked her through what mill of self-sacrifice she had been putting herself lately?"

Mrs. Paul uttered an exclamation of regret, then checking it midway, asked with interest:

"What did she say?"

"That she was no fonder of peas in her shoes and hair-cloth shirts than other folks. For her part, she thought the most dangerous part of spiritual vanity was that people felt in making martyrs of themselves. 'It's a great honor to be a martyr when God calls you to the stake, or to the gallows,' she went on to improve the occasion by remarking. 'But a great piece of presumption when one grabs at the martyr's crown before it is offered to him. Even our Lord made himself invisible, and passed through the midst of them that wanted to throw him off the hill on which Nazareth was built. The very city in which he was brought up, too! What a Bible scholar she is!'"

"What a noble, plucky Christian heroine she is!" said Mrs. Paul, much moved. "No martyr ever went to the torture more unflinchingly than she has walked the cruel stones of her appointed pathway of life."

"Drive slowly, dear! I must tell you a sad, true story before we reach home. You should hear it that you may not wound our dear friend by thoughtless questions. She would never allow you to suspect it if she did, but she has borne so much that we must shield her in every possible way. Mrs. Barnes told me the sorrowful tale last week when she was here. She said that Mrs. Williams wished me to hear it, but could not trust herself as yet to talk of it."

"She was married at twenty to a smart young fellow—a machinist by trade, and in a good business. Within six months she knew that he was a drunkard—a confirmed sot. He had loved liquor ever since he was a boy, as his father had before him—so he told her. On her death-bed his mother had begged him to promise her that he would never touch another drop, and he had vowed upon her Bible, that he would not. This was a year before his marriage, and before he met Mary Johnson who became his wife. He was good-looking, Mrs. Barnes says, with a kind heart and sweet temper, one of the most lovable of men when sober, industrious and ambitious. A few glasses of the accursed stuff converted him into a demon, quarrelsome, violent and cruel. His wife kept the knowledge of his besetting sin to herself as long as she could, hoping with all the strength of her sanguine nature to bring about his reform. When one fall after another would have discouraged any other woman, she clung to the belief that the good in him would get the upper hand of the evil."

"He never said a cross word to me when he was himself," she told Mrs. Barnes, "and when the crazy fit was over, he was fairly broken-hearted for what had happened. Many's the time I've known him spend half the night praying, with his Bible open before him, when he felt the terrible thirst coming on him. It was like a sly devil creeping up to him and then, all at once, seizing him and carrying him off. I know now they say it is a disease, and to be treated like a disease, and not as a crime. Maybe so, but I call it being possessed by devils—sometimes by one, sometimes by a whole legion of them—as many as entered into the swine. It makes swine of some men; it made a wild beast of my husband. His eyes would get deeper set in his head, with red fire burning down in them, his forehead was lower and ridged down to his eyebrows, and you wouldn't have known the voice for his, that was almost like a woman's for gentleness when he was right."

"Stop here, my son! I never weary of that picture set in the opening between these trees."

They were upon the upper slope of the hill on which the homestead was built. The lights from the windows twinkled through the thinned foliage; below the house and lawn, the lake spread an irregular sheet of silver-gray, shading into black where the banks were high. The blasted oak to which the mother had compared herself formed one side of the view, the shadow of the branchy crown projected upon the white road. The air was fragrant with the odor of fallen hickory leaves, and pulsed with distant music. Marie was at the piano, her glorious voice carrying far through the placid night.

"It is not the time or the place for a tragic story," resumed Mrs. Paul. "We will get it over quickly. They had been married several years and had two children, a boy and a girl. Times were hard with them in consequence of the husband's habits, and Mary was obliged to go out sewing by the day to help support the family. When she did this, her sister, a girl of eighteen, used to stay with and take care of the children. Williams came home one noon, while his wife was absent, drunk and raving. It is supposed that his sister-in-law, who was spirited and fearless, reproached him with his condition. Or she may have interfered to protect the little ones from their father's violence. The neighbors heard her scream and ran to her help—too late to save her. He had killed her and the children with an axe and was raging about the room, cutting up the furniture with the bloody instrument. "We read of similar deeds every week, but the revolting details and all the attendant horrors mean comparatively nothing to us who hear of them afar off. Think of this happening to a woman like our dear Nurse Williams—a clean-lived, God-tearing wife and mother!"

"Mother! are you quite sure it is true?" "Dr. Barnes was her pastor then, as now. He was sent for to break the news to her. She tainted when the full force of the calamity fell upon her. Her first inquiry upon reviving was for her husband."

"Drink murdered them—not he!" she said. "When he comes to himself he will not recollect anything he has done. He must be watched, or he will take his own life, when he finds it out. He has the lovingest heart ever put into a man's bosom."

"The thought that he would be tried for the triple murder, seemed not to occur to her. She was in the court-room when he was sentenced to imprisonment for life. For thirty years she has visited him regularly, once a month, and written to him whenever she was allowed send to a letter. He died a fortnight ago. By the favor of the penitentiary officials who were acquainted with his history, she was appointed his nurse in the prison hospital, and had been with him for a month when the end came."

"When Mrs. Barnes wrote to me how sadly shaken the noble woman was, I insisted that she should pay us a visit, writing directly to Mrs. Williams. Her presence ought to bring a blessing to any house. I covet the privilege of helping to mete out to her the measure she has given into other bosoms."

"Not a word of this to Marie, or to the children! I knew I could count upon your sympathy and co-operation."

They drove slowly and silently through the gate and wood, and around to the front door. Marie had left the piano and was watching for them—and the mail—upon the porch. A glance in at the kitchen window showed Tom and Edwin measuring the chestnuts gathered that day into a great basket under Elspeth's approving inspection, and the mother passed through sitting-room and hall to her own chamber. The sound of voices met her on the threshold. The door was not fast, and she pushed it aside, noiselessly.

Mrs. Williams sat by the fire with Gladys—a slight weight for her years, in her arms. The child was wrapped in a dressing-gown, the golden head rested confidently upon her friend's shoulder.

"There's one more verse," she pleaded. "I used to think it the nicest one of all. Don't you remember, when I was a wee bit of a girl, I was never satisfied if you did not sing it clear through? You can't cheat me now, dear old nurse!"

With her cheek—less plump and rosy than in the times of which her favorite reminded her—nestled among the flossy curls, the shining of a great peace in her eyes, the nurse finished her song:

"It may be the sweet surrounding,
Of thine angels' banding wings,
May define fair meads, abounding
In the dew from Bacchus' springs.
If, instead of beauty, burning
Be the measure of Thy will,
May eyes, made by faith discerning,
See the shining ones there still."

Bicycle Truths.

It is a settled, fixed truth, about the certain quality of which there can be no doubt, that American skill and enterprise have carried bicycle design and construction far ahead of that of any country on the globe, and that the first in the field, have been principally responsible for this result. The same enterprise that started and made a place for this great industry in America has kept these peerless wheels at the head of every improvement in design and method of construction, and has given them a rating as the standard bicycles of the world. In every essential bicycle quality, they are not only unequalled, but unapproached.

Columbias,

TWENTY THOUSAND ENDEAVORERS.

The Mammoth Convention of Delegates of Christian Endeavor Societies, Representing Two Million Young Christians, to Assemble in Cleveland, Ohio, July 11.

For all the cities in the world there is none that for the next two weeks will occupy so large a share of the attention of so many Christian people as the beautiful city of Cleveland, O. It is to be this year the Mecca of the mighty host of young people who are joined in spiritual brotherhood in the ranks of Christian Endeavor, to do battle for Christ and his Church. One week from the date of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there opens in Cleveland the thirteenth of those great Conventions which have in past years astonished the whole world. Not less than twenty thousand persons and probably more than that number, will assemble to praise God, to congratulate each other, and to gain new inspiration for future work. The Christian Endeavor spirit grows with the years, and encouraged by the triumphs it has won, it will this year manifest new developments, make a new advance and gain new strength for service. Each past Convention has given a spiritual uplift to the thousands who have attended it, made the brotherhood of the rival sects a more real thing and filled every heart in the vast assemblies with a deeper and warmer love to the common Master and to humanity. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." From the contact of mind with mind, from the consciousness of a common object and common principles, and, more than all, from the answer to united prayers for God's blessing, there come in these great conventions such accessions of grace and power as to make them life-long memories. Like the disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration, those who form part of the mighty host feel that they have caught a glimpse of their Lord in his glory and say "It is good to be here." Increased consecration and deeper faithfulness are instilled in every heart and when the great gatherings separate to go into the cities, towns and villages of our beloved land the individual members carry with them an inspiration and an impetus for work that is felt by all with whom they come in contact.

When one who holds communion with the skies, Has fill'd his urn when those pure waters rise, And once more mingles with us meaner things, 'Tis ev'n as if an angel shook his wings; Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide, That tells us whence his treasures are supplied.

tory of the Church of Christ since the day of Pentecost, has there been a time when so cheering and hopeful a spectacle has been witnessed as these representative assemblies. No worldly enjoyment or worldly attraction draws them together, no earthly gain is to be anticipated, no office, nor power, nor profit is to be gained. Those who go, "declare plainly that they seek a country . . . a better country, that is a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city." They, and those they represent, are avowed followers of Christ, enlisted in his service and eager to do more earnest and more efficient work for him. They expect to gain from mutual consultation and mutual interchange of thought, fresh light and fresh ideas of successful effort, that they may be better able to win souls and shine forth with increased lustre, as the city set on a hill that could not be hidden. The world identifies them by their business or social position; the Church knows them as Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists or Methodists; but, for the few days they the living God—a people gathered in his name. This is the glory of the Christian Endeavor movement, the sublime basis of union which has appealed to the Christian heart the world over. While doing nothing to undermine the loyalty of any one to the church of his choice, the Society has furnished a platform on which all can meet as comrades and brethren. Its creed, if creed it can be called, does not express all that any member believes, but all believe what it expresses, and it is gratifying and cheering to perceive that it embraces the fundamentals of vital Christian faith. Rudimentary it may be, but it is to the rudiments that we must go for substantial unity. It is here, in loyalty to Christ as King, in earnest desire to walk in his steps, and in strenuous effort to extend his kingdom, that Christians of every name and creed are one in heart and can work together in harmony. So much in the thirteen years of its history Christian Endeavor has done, and the results are manifest in the greater kindness existing between the denominations and the vigor of united aggressive movements in various sections. The Christian Church is no longer divided into hostile sections as it moves against the enemy of Christ, for there are in every brigade young people who know that they have brothers and sisters in the other brigades equally in earnest with themselves in the war, and equally loyal and obedient to the Great Captain of their salvation. Thus has Christian Endeavor in its home work and in its great conventions brought the Church of today, and still more will it bring the Church of the future, nearer to the condition for which our Lord prayed. "That they all may be one; as thou Father art in me and I in thee." On this page we give a picture

There is a significance in these enormous assemblies beyond their actual numbers. The twenty thousand young Christians who will meet at Cleveland next Wednesday are merely representatives at the ratio of one to a hundred. More than two million souls will be with them in the spirit; and all over the world prayers will go up to God for a blessing on the meetings. Never in the his-will be together in communion, they will be known by the common title of Christians—a name dearer to all than any other name they bear; for one is their Master, even Christ and all they are brethren. They learn there, as they learn so well nowhere else, that the barriers which divide them are lower and feebler than the great wall of the fold which encloses them all as one flock of of the Committee of Arrangements, taken from a photograph for which we are indebted to the courtesy of Secretary Baer, of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. On page 426 is a picture of the building in which the chief sessions of the Convention will be held, with a summary of the Provisional Programme of the proceedings and other details of the arrangements.

THE ROYAL GARDEN.

Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Solomon's Song 5: 1, I am come into my garden."

THE world has had a great many beautiful gardens. Charlemagne added to the glory of his reign by decreeing that they be established all through the realm—decreeing even the names of the flowers to be planted there. Henry IV. at Montpellier, established gardens of bewitching beauty and luxuriance, gathering into them Alpine, Pyrenean and French plants. One of the sweetest spots on earth was the garden of Shenstone, the poet. His writings have made but little impression on the world; but his garden, "the Leasowes," will be immortal. To the natural advantage of that place was brought the perfection of art. Arbor, and terrace, and slope, and rustic temple, and reservoir, and urn, and fountain, here had their crowning. Oak, and yew, and hazel put forth their richest foliage. There was no life more diligent, no soul more ingenious than that of Shenstone, and all that diligence and genius were brought to the adornment of that one treasured spot. He gave three hundred pounds for it; he sold it for seventeen thousand. And yet, I am to tell you of a richer garden than any I have mentioned. It is the garden spoken of in my text, the garden of the Church, which belongs to Christ, for my text says so. He bought it, he planted it, he owns it, and he shall have it. Walter Scott, in his outlay at Abbotsford, ruined his fortune; and now, in the crimson flowers of those gardens, you can almost think or imagine that you see the blood of that old man's broken heart. The payment of the last one hundred thousand pounds sacrificed him. But I have to tell you that Christ's life and Christ's death were the outlay of this beautiful garden of the Church of which my text speaks. Oh, how many sighs, and tears, and pangs, and agonies! Tell me, ye women who saw him hang! Tell me, ye executioners who lifted him and let him down! Tell me, thou sun that didst hide, ye rocks that fell! "Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it." If then the garden of the Church belongs to Christ, certainly he has a right to walk in it. Come then, O, blessed Jesus, this morning, walk up and down these aisles, and pluck what thou wilt of sweetness for thyself.

The Church, in my text, is appropriately compared to a garden, because it is a place of choice flowers, of select fruits and of thorough irrigation.

That would be a strange garden in which there were no flowers. If nowhere else, they will be along the borders, or at the gateway. The homeliest taste will dictate something, if it be the old-fashioned holly hock, or Jahlia, or daffodil, or coreopsis; but if there be larger means, then you will find the Mexican cactus and dark-veined arbutus, and blazing azalea, and clustering oleander. Well, now, Christ comes to his garden, and he plants there some of the brightest spirits that ever flowered upon the world. Some of them are violets, unobtrusive, but sweet in heaven. You have to search for such spirits to find them. You do not see them very often, perhaps, but you find where they have been by the brightening face of the invalid, and the sprig of geranium on the stand, and the window-curtains keeping out the glare of the sunlight. They are, perhaps, more like the ranunculus, creeping sweetly along amid the thorns and briars of life, giving kiss for sting, and many a man who has had in his way some great black rock of trouble, has found that they have covered it all over with flowering jasmine running in and out amid the crevices. These Christians in Christ's garden are not like the sunflower, gaudy in the light; but whenever darkness hovers over a soul that needs to be comforted, there they stand, night-blooming cereuses. But in Christ's garden there are plants that may be better compared to the Mexican cactus—thorns without, loveliness within—men with sharp points of character. They wound almost every one that touches them. They are hard to handle. Men pronounce them nothing but thorns, but Christ loves them, notwithstanding all their sharpnesses. Many a man has had very hard ground to culture, and it has only been through severe toil he has raised even the smallest crop of grace.

A very harsh minister was talking with a very placid elder, and the placid elder said to the harsh minister: "Doctor, I do wish you would control your temper." "Ah," said the minister to the elder, "I control more temper in five minutes than you do in five years." It is harder for some men to do right than for others to do right. The grace that would elevate you to the seventh heaven might not keep your brother from knocking a man down. I had a friend who came to me and said: "I dare not join the Church." I said: "Why?" "Oh," he said: "I have such a violent temper. Yesterday morning, I was crossing very early at the Jersey City ferry, and I saw a milkman pour a large amount of water into the milk can, and I said to him: 'I think that will do,' and he insulted me, and I knocked him down. Do you think I ought to join the Church?" Nevertheless, that very same man, who was so harsh in his behavior, loved Christ, and could not speak of sacred things without tears of emotion and affection. Thorns without, but sweetness within—the best specimen of Mexican cactus I ever saw.

There are others planted in Christ's garden, who are always ardent, always radiant, always impressive—more like the roses of deep hue that we occasionally find called "giants of battle."—the Martin Luthers, St. Pauls, Chrysostoms, Wickliffes, Latimers, and Samuel Rutherfords. What in other men is a spark, in them is a conflagration. When they sweat, they sweat great drops of blood. When they pray, their prayer takes fire. When they preach, it is a Pentecost. When they fight, it is a Thermopylae. When they die, it is a martyrdom. You find a great many roses in the gardens, but only a few "giants of battle." Men say: "Why don't you have more of them in the Church?" I say: "Why don't you have in the world more Napoleons, and Humboldts, and Wellingtons?" God gives to some ten talents, to another one.

In this garden of the Church, which Christ has planted, I also find the snowdrops, beautiful but cold looking, seemingly another phase of the winter. I mean those Christians who are precise in their tastes, unimpassioned, pure as snowdrops, and as cold. They never shed any tears, they never get excited, they never say anything rashly, they never do anything precipitately. Their pulses never flutter, their nerves never twitch, their indignation never boils over.

They live longer than most people; but their life is in a minor key. They never run up to "C" above the staff. In the music of their life they have no staccato passages. Christ planted them in the Church, and they must be of some service, or they would not be there; snowdrops, always snowdrops.

But I have not told you of the most beautiful flower in all this garden spoken of in the text. If you see a "century plant," your emotions are started. You say: "Why, this flower has been a hundred years gathering up for one bloom, and it will be a hundred years more before other petals will come out." But I have to tell you of a plant that was gathering up from all eternity, and that nineteen hundred years ago put forth its bloom never to wither. It is the Passion Flower of the Cross! Prophets foretold it. Bethlehem shepherds looked upon it in the bud; the rocks shook at its bursting; and the dead got up in their winding-sheets to see its full bloom. It is a crimson flower—blood at the roots, blood on the branches, blood on all the leaves. Its perfume is to fill all the nations. Its touch is life. Its breath is heaven. Come, Oh winds, from the north, and winds from the south, and winds from the east, and winds from the west, and hear to all the earth the sweet smelling savor of Christ my Lord.

His worth, if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole earth would love him too.

Again: The Church may be appropriately compared to a garden, because it is a place of select fruits. That would be a strange garden which had in it no berries, no plums, no peaches, or apricots. The coarser fruits are planted in the orchard, or they are set out on the sunny hillside; but the choicest fruits are kept in the garden. So in the world outside the Church, Christ has planted a great many beautiful things—patience, charity, generosity, integrity; but he intends the choicest fruits to be in the garden, and if they are not there, then shame on the Church. Religion is not a mere flowering sentimentality. It is a practical, life-giving, healthful fruit—not posies, but apples. "Oh!" says somebody, "I don't see what your garden of the Church has yielded." Where did your asylums come from? and your hospitals? and your institutions of mercy? Christ planted every one of them; he planted them in his garden. When Christ gave sight to Bartimeus, he laid the corner-stone of every blind asylum that has ever been built. When Christ soothed the demoniac of Galilee, he laid the corner-stone of every lunatic asylum that has ever been established. When Christ said to the sick man: "Take up thy bed and walk!" he laid the corner-stone of every hospital the world has ever seen. When Christ said: "I was in prison, and ye visited Me," he laid the corner-stone of every prison reform association that has ever been formed. The Church of Christ is a glorious garden, and it is full of fruit. I know there is some poor fruit in it. I know there are some weeds that ought to have been thrown over the fence. I know there are some crab-apple-trees that ought to be cut down. I know there are some wild grapes that ought to be uprooted; but are you going to destroy the whole garden because of a little gnarled fruit? You will find worm-eaten leaves in Fontainebleau, and insects that sting in the fairy groves of the Champs Elysees. You do not tear down and destroy the whole garden because there are a few specimens of gnarled fruit. I admit there are men and women in the church who ought not to be there; but let us be just as frank, and admit the fact that there are hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of glorious Christian men and women holy, blessed, useful, consecrated and triumphant. There is no grander collection in all the earth than the collection of Christians. There are Christian men in the church whose religion is not a matter of psalm-singing and church-going. To-morrow morning that religion will keep them just as consistent and "consecrated on exchange" as it ever kept them at the communion-table. There are women in the church of a higher type of character than Mary of Bethany. They not only sit at the feet of Christ, but they go out into the kitchen to help Martha in her work, that she may sit there too. There is a woman who has a drunken husband, who has exhibited more faith, and patience, and courage than Hugh Latimer in the fire. He was consumed in twenty minutes. Her's has been a twenty year's martyrdom. Yonder is a man who has lain fifteen years on his back, unable even to feed himself, yet calm and peaceful as though he lay on one of the green banks of heaven, watching the oarsmen dip their paddles in the crystal river! Why, it seems to me this moment as if Paul threw to us a pomologist's catalogue of the fruits growing in this great garden of Christ—love, joy, peace, patience, charity, brotherly kindness, gentleness, mercy—glorious fruit, enough to fill all the baskets of earth and heaven.

I have not told you of the better tree in this garden, and of the better fruit. It was planted just outside Jerusalem a good while ago. When that tree was planted, it was so split, and bruised, and barked, men said nothing would ever grow upon it; but no sooner had that tree been planted, than it budded, and blossomed, and fruited, and the soldiers' spears were only the clubs that struck down that fruit, and it fell into the lap of the nations, and men began to pick it up and eat it, and they found in it an antidote to all thirst, to all poison, to all sin, to all death—the smallest cluster larger than the famous one of Eshcol, which two men carried on a staff between them.

Again: the church, in my text, is appropriately called a garden, because it is thoroughly irrigated. No garden could prosper long without plenty of water. I have seen a garden in the midst of a desert, yet blooming and luxuriant. All around was dearth and barrenness; but there were pipes, aqueducts reaching from this garden up to the mountains, and through those aqueducts the water came streaming down and tossing up into beautiful fountains, until every root, and leaf and flower were saturated. That is like the church. The church is a garden in the midst of a great desert of sin and suffering; it is well irrigated, for "our eyes are unto the hills from whence cometh our help." From the mountains of God's strength there flow down rivers of gladness. There is a river, the stream whereof shall make glad the city of our God. Preaching the Gospel is one of these aqueducts. The Bible is another. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are aqueducts. Water to slake the thirst, water to restore the faint, water to wash the unclean, water tossed high up in the light of the Sun of righteousness, showing us the rainbow around the throne. Oh! was there ever a garden so thoroughly irrigated? You know the beauty of Versailles and Chatsworth depends very much upon the great supply of water. I came to the latter place one day and the gardener went up the stairs of stone and turned on the water. I saw it gleaming on the dry pavement, coming down from step to step, until it came so near I could hear the musical rush, and all over the high, broad stairs it came foaming, flashing, roaring down, until sunlight and wave in gleesome wrestle tumbled at my feet. So it is with the church of God. Everything comes from above, pardon from above, joy from above, adoption from above, sanctification from above. Oh! that now God would turn on the waters of salvation, that they might flow down through his heritage.

Hark! I hear the latch at the garden gate, and I look to see who is coming. I hear the voice of Christ: "I am come into my garden." I say: "Come in, O Jesus, we have been waiting for thee; walk all through these paths. Look at the flowers; look at the fruit; pluck that which thou wilt for thyself." Jesus comes into the garden, and up to that old man, and touches him, and says: "Almost home, father; not many more aches for thee; I will never leave thee; I will never forsake thee: take courage a little longer, and I will steady thy tottering steps, and I will soothe thy troubles and give thee rest; courage, old man." Then Christ goes up another garden-path, and he comes to a soul in trouble, and says: "Peace! all is well. I have seen thy tears; have heard thy prayer. The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night. The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil; he will preserve thy soul. Courage, oh! troubled spirit." Then I see Jesus going up another garden-path, and I see great excitement among the leaves, and I hasten up that garden path to see what Jesus is doing there, and lo! he is breaking off flowers, sharp and clean, from the stem, and I say: "Stop, Jesus, don't kill those beautiful flowers." He turns to me and says: "I have come into my garden to gather lilies, and I mean to take these up to a higher terrace, and for the garden around my palace, and there I will plant them, and in better soil, and in better air; they shall put forth brighter leaves and sweeter redolence, and no frost shall touch them forever." And I looked up into his face, and said: "Well, it is his garden, and he has a right to do what he will with it. Thy will be done"—the hardest prayer a man ever made.

I notice that the fine gardens sometimes have high fences around them, and I cannot get in. It is so with the king's garden. The only glimpses you ever get of such a garden is when the king rides out in his splendid carriage. It is not so with this garden—the King's garden. I throw wide open the gate, and tell you all to come in. No monopoly in religion. Whosoever will, may. Choose now between a desert and a garden. Many of you have tried the garden of this world's delight. You have found it has been a chagrin. So it was with Theodore Hook. He made all the world laugh. He makes us laugh now when we read his poems; but he could not make his own heart laugh. While in the midst of his festivities, he confronted a looking-glass, and he saw himself, and said: "There, that is true. I look just as I am, done up in body, mind, and purse." So it was with Shenstone, of whose garden I told you at the beginning of my sermon. He sat down amid those bowers, and said: "I have lost my road to happiness. I am angry, and envious, and frantic, and despise everything around me, just as it becomes a mad man to do." Oh, ye weary souls, come into Christ's garden to-day, and pluck a little heart's-ease. Christ is the only rest and the only pardon for a perturbed spirit. Do you not think your chance has almost come? You men and women who have been waiting year after year for some good opportunity in which to accept Christ, but have postponed it five, ten, twenty, thirty years, do you not feel as if now your hour of deliverance, and pardon, and salvation, had come? Oh, man, what grudge hast thou against thy poor soul, that thou wilt not let it be saved? I feel as if salvation must come now to some of your hearts.

Some years ago a vessel struck on the rocks. They had only one life-boat. In that life-boat the passengers and crew were getting ashore. The vessel had foundered, and was sinking deeper and deeper, and that one boat could not take the passengers very swiftly. A little girl stood on the deck, waiting for her turn to get into the boat. The boat came and went—came and went—but her turn did not seem to come. After awhile she could wait no longer, and she leaped on the taffrail, and then sprang into the sea, crying to the boatman: "Save me next! Save me next!" Oh, how many have gone ashore into God's mercy, and yet you are clinging to the wreck of sin. Others have accepted the pardon of Christ, but you are in peril. Why not, this morning, make a rush for your immortal rescue, crying until Jesus shall hear you, and heaven and earth ring with the cry, "Save me next! Save me next!"

A MISSION BOAT BURNED.

The "Good News," Commander Gibbud's Gospel Craft, Destroyed on the Oswego Canal—Some Providential Escapes.

NE of the best agencies ever devised for the dissemination of the Gospel along the interior waterways of Northern New York—the Rescue Mission boat "Good News"—was burned to the water's edge on the Oswego Canal at Syracuse recently. A heavy wind-storm was prevailing at night when a conflagration broke out in a lumber yard on the banks of the canal. The flames communicated to the "Good News," which was tied up near the lumber yard. Her sleeping crew were all unconscious of peril until they were aroused by the fierce heat of the flames and the shouts of the firemen. Soon the moorings of the "Good News" gave way and she floated out on the waters, a blazing mass of fire. Robert Wilson, the captain, swam ashore in safety, but his wife and Alonzo Deland, her brother-in-law, who had been visiting there, were drowned.

The "Good News" was known all along the line of the canal and many will lament her loss, as well as that of the two valuable lives that were sacrificed. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall the account of the Gospel boat and its work that was published in these columns last year. Mr. H. B. Gibbud, of the Rescue Mission of Syracuse, N. Y., originated the idea of using the boat in connection with the mission work. From his own observation and from were thrust from all the factory windows, and the workers on the boat were able to throw many packages of religious reading to people along the line. Mr. Gibbud rigged up a fishpole, and as the canal boats passed by, packages of religious reading were passed over to the boatmen. Over four hundred boats were thus supplied on the first trip, which lasted sixteen days. When the boat came to a town the workers went out with tracts and invitations, visiting the saloons and non-church going people, preaching Christ and inviting them to the meetings. At eventide an open-air service was held from the deck, and a talk given on a large oil painting of the "Two Ways." At ten of these meetings, 7,590 people heard the Gospel.

The boat was tastefully and prettily repainted and wreaths and scrolls bearing appropriate passages of Scripture adorned the walls of the cabin or auditorium within and without. Among them were the following:

Boycott the Devil, he don't give living wages, for "the wages of sin is death."

Wilt thou have thy sins and go to hell, or leave them and go to heaven? It must be one or the other.

Has drink got the best of you? Jesus can save and keep.

One thing you may be sure of—"Be sure your sins will find you out!"

Evangelistic meetings were held in the

the reports of men who found their way to the Gospel services which he conducts in Syracuse, he became convinced that a rich field for Gospel effort existed in the floating population on the canal, in the farm houses, factories and stores which line both its banks throughout its course, and in the cities, towns, villages, and hamlets to which it is the simplest and cheapest route. Many of these people had no opportunity of hearing the Gospel message and a still larger number were disinclined to avail themselves of such opportunities as were within their reach. Business men used the canal as a means of communication but the men who were offering the Pearl of Great Price had somehow failed to turn the great avenue of commerce to account in their mission.

Mr. H. B. Andrews, a prominent business man of Syracuse, to whom the Mission was already indebted for its building and equipment, entered heartily into the project, and offered to provide a boat if Mr. Gibbud and his friends would undertake to use it in aggressive Christian work. The promise was gladly given and the project was fairly launched.

In the hot summer evenings Gospel meetings were held on the deck around which ran a substantial railing. Here one hundred and fifty persons could be accommodated. All along the line the boat attracted great attention. People came from their homes, heads villages, towns and cities along the waterway, stopping in a place for a few meetings, working especially with non-church goers, drinking men and the masses generally. The plan was to carry on the work during the summer and tie the boat up for the winter near the centre of some city and hold a service every evening. Last winter the boat was moored in the canal at the Market Square in Syracuse. Hundreds of farmers, buyers and sellers of various kinds, congregated there and there was no lack of audiences. Every evening there was a service on the usual plan of Rescue Mission Meetings. The work was under the general supervision of Mr. H. B. Gibbud. He and his wife had charge of the meetings. The whole work was one of faith, as the Mission in Syracuse had no funds available for the support of the boat and its crew.

After the recent fire a mass meeting was held in the First Presbyterian Church, Syracuse, under the auspices of the Rescue Mission. A large audience assembled and the services were very impressive, several clergymen taking part. A high tribute was paid to the memory of Mrs. Wilson, who had been most active in the labors of the Mission. During the services, four young men, who had been converted through the instrumentality of Mrs. Wilson, gave testimony. Rev. George B. Spalding, D.D., said that the Rescue Mission, was the chief glory of Syracuse and that God had baptized it as with a baptism of fire.

The "Good News" was burned just one year after the day of its dedication. During a period of five months, fifty-nine meetings were held, the attendance being 39,508; conversions, 72; requests for prayer, 103; visits to families, 1,000; saloons visited, 333; canal boats furnished with Gospel literature, 1,000. During the winter months, meetings were held with success. The whole work was so spiritually fruitful that it will probably soon be started again in the hope of continuing the service of Christ in this novel and effective way among a needy and much neglected class.

A HINDOO NICODEMUS.

When the Christians of India are counted the result does not look favorable for missions; but none can tell how many there are who have accepted Christ, but, like Nicodemus, have not the courage to confess him openly. How much courage it needs to do this is shown by the following incident related by Rev. M. Phillips, a missionary in Madras. He says: "After preaching, some time ago, in a certain place, an intelligent Hindu came to see me privately. He said, 'I have listened to your preaching, and I believe every word you said.' 'Well,' I replied, 'I am glad of that; but how do you reconcile that with the fact that you have the mark of Vishnu painted on your forehead?' 'Ah!' he answered, 'you have been long enough in India to know what it is for a man in my position to give up Hinduism, and declare himself publicly a follower of Christ. It means that my wife would leave me, my children would forsake me, my caste people would throw me out upon the world friendless. I am not prepared to do that now. I may be prepared to do it by and by.' I could sympathize with that man. I said, 'Whom, then, do you worship?' and he said smiling, 'I worship the same God as you worship, and I worship him in the same way through Jesus Christ.' 'Tell me how it came about,' I said. 'It came about in this way. For more than twenty years I worshipped Vishnu in the temple regularly. I derived no spiritual benefit. My mind was full of doubts and distractions of all kinds. I heard the missionary preaching one evening, and he said that the mind of man could only find rest in the worship of the true God. I went home; I concentrated my thoughts upon God, the Great One; I poured out my soul to him; I asked him to forgive my sins, to reveal himself to me, and to be my guardian and guide in the future! God the Great One answered that prayer! When I rose I was a different man; my doubts and my distractions had left me, and I had that joy and peace which I cannot describe to you. Ever since I have not worshipped Vishnu in the temples. That man is a type of some other Hindus. To-day they are secret Christians.'

A BICYCLE FOR A TEXT.

In Bailundu, in West Central Africa, the king has manifested an antipathy to mission work, for reasons well understood. Recently, however, Mr. Read, one of the missionaries at the station, has received a bicycle from home. He has become an expert in using it, and has made several long journeys on it. Some one told the king about it and his curiosity was excited. It could not be gratified without an interview with the missionary. Finally aversion yielded to curiosity and Mr. Read has had a long talk with him, using the opportunity to disabuse his mind of his long cherished prejudices. Mr. Read is succeeding in his work. Referring to a case of interest as showing the growing confidence of the natives and the chiefs in the missionaries, he says: A man seriously injured by falling from a tree was brought to him for treatment. He was one of the king's servants. Mr. Read adds: "It is evident from this and other cases that, although the natives cling to their own doctors and their fetiches, yet our manner of treatment and our medicines are looked upon with growing favor by them. Would that they would look more favorably upon the remedy we offer them for their souls' diseases!"

VISIT OF THE WISE MEN.

S.S. Lesson for July 15. Matt. 2: 1-12. Golden Text, Matt. 2: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

NOT only did God call, here and there, Jewish witnesses to know and speak of the birth of the Messiah, he also gave him to be "a light of the Gentiles." From the very time of his nativity God fulfilled these prophecies, which were understood and quoted by the aged Simeon, in sending wise men from the East to inquire after, and to worship the new-born Christ. "When Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the East to Jerusalem saying: Where is he that is born King of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the East and are come to worship him." Who were these men and from what country in the East did they come? Of what position were they, and how was it that their communication, so unpalatable to the people, should yet receive so much attention, that the king and all Jerusalem should be troubled at it? Were they people of high position politically: or were they men of learning, whose reputation had gone before them? We know not. In any case, their journey and its object became the talk of the whole city. They did not hesitate to enquire for him that was "born King:" and the very tone of the inquiry showed that it was God's King that they sought, whom he should set upon his holy hill of Zion.

There was no uncertainty about their inquiry: they did not ask if he was born:

"Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" He does exist. He is among you, show us your Messiah-King! It was a startling request for Gentiles to make of the indifferent Jews, who had heard a rumor of some child that was born, and of some fanatical shepherds, as they might have termed them, who declared that a vision of angels had proclaimed that this was the Messiah: but how should they take any notice of a handful of ill-educated shepherds? True, that aged Simeon had said the shepherds were in the right, as did also the old prophetess in the temple, but then both of these were nearly superannuated, and so they could not be expected to take account of their testimony. It was not pleasant to this people, who prided themselves on their knowledge of the Scriptures, and on their true interpretation of them, to have these wise men from another land come into their very midst—not to argue about the coming Messiah, they would have been at home in argument—but demanding to be led to him, insisting on finding him out, and declaring, as the very object of their long and expensive journey,

"We are Come to Worship Him."

Their coming with such an object was a reflection on the ignorance or indifference of the Jews on the subject of their Messiah-King, and as such it was unwelcome. God loves a teachable spirit: It is the sure sign of a really advancing Christian. Those who in their own eyes are "rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing," are contemptible in the eyes of God. The wise men came to hear more about God's King, they were ready to take any trouble if they might find him. But his own people, among whom he came "to seek the lost sheep of the house of Israel" were unteachable: they would rather remain under the yoke of the tyrant Herod, than receive God's King in such a way as would not answer their carnal expectations. They wanted a being who would bring glory to them, while the seeking wise men sought only that they might worship him. But their question was one that must be answered: "Where is he?" He is born, we have seen his star, the announcement of his advent has come direct to us from heaven: where is he that we may worship him? The real need of a really awakened soul cannot be hushed because it is ignored by men: it must have its answer: it cannot be put aside.

Herod must do everything according to the usage of the State. Had he inquired of old Simeon, he would have learned all the wise men wanted to know about Jesus, but the dignity of the State demanded that the schools of theology in Jerusalem must be consulted: and, therefore, he gathered a convocation, and commanded the attendance of "all the chief priests and scribes of the people, and he demanded of them where the Christ should be born." Students of Prophecy there were then as now, who could lay their finger upon the very passage which foretold the coming of the Messiah, and yet held it only as head-knowledge and matter for discussion. None of the holy gladness of the shepherds, none of the holy worship of Simeon and Anna, characterized these chief priests and scribes. The result of their consultation was that the Christ should be born "in Bethlehem of Judea, for thus it was written by the prophet, And thou Bethlehem in the land of Judah art not the least among the princes of Judah, for out of thee shall come a Governor that shall rule my people Israel." (Mic. 5: 2.)

They knew as though they knew not, they could quote the words of the prophet Micah, yet these inspired words meant nothing to those who uttered them: it was as a truth quite outside of, and apart from, themselves, when they spoke of the locality where the Christ should be born. O, what an instance was this of that truth of God: "The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life!" (John 6: 62.)

as to be possessed of spiritual knowledge which does not change and transform our lives! But the wise men could not rest until they could come in contact with the Christ: they wanted him to be their King, and they must worship him as such. To the scribes and Pharisees he was only a historical personage, and nothing to them individually: their hearts and consciences were all untouched by the knowledge of his coming. It is this could be so at the first coming of our Lord, how much more terrible must the unreal and profane handling of God's second coming be, now that the Holy Ghost has been given: now that every unreal handling of Divine truth is a grieving of the Holy Spirit!

King Herod took upon himself to tell the wise men the result of the prophetic inquiry of the chief priests and scribes, but he trembled for the security of his throne: he called the wise men to a private interview: he "inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared." He was impressed by the sign, but had no thought of personally coming in contact with the person of the Christ. "And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search diligently for the young child, and when ye have found him, bring me word again that I may come and worship him also;" but thoughts of murder and not of worship were filling his heart. What an incomprehensible thing for these Gentile inquirers! Could they be mistaken? Could the message which had so surely brought them together on the same errand have been a delusion? It was true that the Christ, the promised Messiah, for whom the Jews professed to look, was really born in the city of David, how came it that not one of the chief priests or scribes went down to Bethlehem to welcome and to adore him? How came it that Herod, who was sitting on the very throne he was to occupy, could rest content for Gentiles to investigate the matter, while he who was so nearly concerned in it, was content to await the result of their investigations? It was enough to damp the zeal of these earnest inquirers, and to suggest many a doubt as to the reality of their mission. But God had not abandoned them: "when they had heard the king, they departed, and lo the star which they saw in the East, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was." Away from the king, away from the priests, away from men and from earth, they looked up to heaven. And now they were at home, God had not left them, the same star which had brought them thus far shone upon them once more, they were at large, doubts fled, God was faithful, and they were faithful to him.

Oh, the utter blindness of earthly minded men to the realities of God and of eternity! Oh, the terrible consciousness which must sometimes force itself upon us, that multitudes of human beings are walking "in a vain show and disquieting themselves in vain," while they are missing, and letting slip from their grasp, the only things which are worth seeking and possessing!

the wise men were three in number, that they came from Persia, that they were kings, and has even given us their names as Gaspar, Melchior and Balthasar. More was needed, and their bodies were obtained and enshrined first in St. Sophia at Constantinople, then in the Cathedral at Milan, and now in the Cathedral at Cologne, where any one can see them for a small fee, and believe the story if he chooses. It is better to keep to the simple facts of the Evangelist's record. He simply describes the visitors as "wise men from Eastern lands." They probably belonged to some such class as is mentioned in Daniel 2: 2. It may be, as tradition says, that they came from Chaldea or Persia. They were guided by a star, about which there have been conjectures as well as about the personality of the visitors. They were students of the stars, and would be affected by any extraordinary or unusual celestial event. Calculating backwards, our astronomers find that about the time of Christ's birth there was such an extraordinary event—one that happens only once in eight hundred years. It was the near approach to each other of three planets, Jupiter, Saturn and Mars. Though separated by immense distances, they looked so close to each other, as seen from the earth, as to almost cover each other. They were, too, in the constellation Pisces, which was the celestial symbol of Judaea. Probably this spectacle, conjoined with the knowledge of the magi about the Jewish hopes of the Messiah, set them journeying to Jerusalem, with the idea that the long expected king had appeared. But the planetary conjunction could not have guided them. We are obliged to assume that a miracle produced a meteor, which served as their guide. They sought Herod, on their arrival, naturally supposing that the king would know of such a momentous event. Their visit disturbed him; and the people, knowing how cruel and unscrupulous he was when provoked, were disturbed too. He had already killed his wife, his brother, and three sons, and was to conclude his sanguinary atrocities by killing some ten or a dozen children in the vain attempt to kill the Messiah. The Magi found the babe and, although they must have been surprised to find him in circumstances so humble, they gave him the offerings they had brought, as suitable gifts for a king—gold, frankincense and myrrh.

They said: in Bethlehem. The priests knew all about the theories respecting the coming of their Messiah, but even though now they heard that a child had been born there fulfilling the conditions, they did not go with the wise men to worship. Long before the discovery of gold in Australia, geologists had pronounced the strata auriferous. But no one went to look for gold. The gold lay there untouched until a few shepherds in the bush came into Melbourne with pebbles prettily encrusted with some yellowish stuff that looked like gold. It was found to be gold and then there was a rush. Thousands went out to search for the precious metal. They had not been moved by the theories of the geologists, but the sight of the gold was enough. The shepherds knew nothing about the strata, but they had the gold. So it is with the religion of Christ. Those who really have it in their hearts and lives can do more for him than learned men who only theorize about it.

They saw the young child. The wise men came to worship a king, and they found in the house, indicated by the star, only an ordinary woman with a baby. But they worshipped just the same and gave him the gifts fit only for royalty. They could have given no greater proof of their right to the name of wise men. The Princess Louise called at a poor Canadian cottage on one occasion when her husband was Governor General of Canada. She wanted a glass of water, but the woman said she had none in the house. Would she not go to her well and draw some? She could not do so, for she was busy ironing a shirt, and must get it done, for her husband would want it as he was going that afternoon to the festival at which the queen's daughter would be present. "I'll do your ironing," said the Princess, "if you will go and get the water." On the woman's return she was amazed to discover that not only was the shirt well ironed, but the ironer was the queen's daughter.

They presented to him gifts. They were very valuable, but to Mary and her Child they would not be of much use in their humble life. But it is less the gift, than the spirit of the giver, that is important in making gifts to Christ. An eminent minister tells the following story: "It was my birthday; I received many kind wishes and loving gifts. My little daughter, seeing me leave the house, came running after me. Pressing a penny into my hand, she said, 'Now, father dear, there's a penny all to yourself.' Did the father reject the gift as trifling? No; he saw in it an expression of his child's deep love, and kept the coin among his choice treasures.

When they saw the star they rejoiced. Apparently they had lost sight of it on their way to Jerusalem. After their interview with Herod they saw it again, and recognized it and rejoiced. They were going to be led again. Like the sailor on the lookout who sees the light of the lighthouse on a dark and stormy night, they saw which way to direct their course. It is related that the Governor of a certain island whose inhabitants had in former times grown rich by plundering wrecked vessels, was going home at the close of his term. He told the people that if they had any request that they wished to be presented to the king, to mention it, as he would have an opportunity of speaking to his majesty. They said, "Ask him for permission to tear down all the lighthouses; we grow poor now there are no wrecks." Sometimes such people go further and display a false light inland which lures the sailor on the rocks. There are many false lights like the Will-o'-the-wisp, over marshy ground which lead young people astray in religion. The true light is the light that God gave to light every man that comes into the world.

Fell down and worshipped him. There are many ideas of worship. Probably the worship here spoken of was merely the homage paid to a monarch. But Jesus is worthy of higher homage than that. A Greek legend has it that there was once an ancient temple in which there were many gods. Worshipers came there in crowds, some to worship one god and some another. They could choose and might worship Pluto the god of wealth, Mars, the god of war, Bacchus, the god of drunkenness, or any of the other deities represented there. At the door was a mirror which cast a reflection on every one who entered, and that reflection in each case was the image of the god the man worshipped. That is a legend, but it is a truth that we grow like what we adore.

THE GOSPEL FUND GROWING.

Mr. Moody's Appeal Bearing Fruit in a Soul-Winning Crusade—More Encouraging Letters and Contributions to the Cause—Let every Christian in America Lend a Hand.

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, two weeks ago, published the appeal of Evangelist D. L. Moody to the Christian people of America, inviting their co-operation in the work of training and equipping young men and women as Gospel workers among the thirty million non-churchgoing people in these States, it was with the confident expectation that the call to duty, sounded forth by this illustrious servant of God would not pass unheeded. Nor has that hope been disappointed, for already the hearts of our friends have been stirred and their letters and offerings are coming in by every mail for the Moody Gospel Fund. With characteristic fidelity to all that pertains to the service of the Master, these pledges of Christian fellowship are sent accompanied with fervent prayers for the success of the great evangelical movement—prayers that will sooner or later bring their meed of blessing on the work.

We wish it were possible to devote all the space to these letters they deserve. Most of the writers, doubtless representing many thousands of others, who like themselves, have been brought to the joy and peace of believing through Mr. Moody's ministrations, or by reading his wonderful sermons, accept as a blessed privilege this opportunity of showing their gratitude for what has taken place in their own lives. One gentleman in a Western State writes:

"I owe to God's blessing on Mr. Moody's preaching all I am in this life and my hope of heaven. If I gave every dollar I have to help him in what he is trying to do, I should still be in his debt. God bless him and may he live to send out thousands like himself to preach the Gospel of Christ."

A lady in New Jersey ($3) writes:

"I want to share in the blessing that must come of the work in which Mr. Moody is engaged and I esteem it one of the greatest privileges of my life to help in it. What a grand servant of Christ he is! It is as though the voice of a Paul had summoned the followers of the Nazarene to this duty—a duty which none who love him and who pray for man's redemption, can refuse to perform. If every one who has been spiritually benefited by Mr. Moody's influence and labors were to respond, even with a dime apiece, you would have such a glorious Gospel Fund that there would be no lack hereafter of the means to equip an army of Christian workers for duty among our churchless multitudes."

With a gift of $5, an aged Christian in Kansas City, Mo., writes:

"The Moody Bible Institute, rightly viewed and properly sustained, may yet be the instrument under God's hands for the spiritual inbringing of the home masses. How else are we to reach them unless we send out just such workers as Mr. Moody is training? It's a crusade to which, were I thirty years younger, I would gladly consecrate my life. I trust our churches and church-going people will look at it in the right light, and see what an opportunity it affords for work that cannot be reached by the regular channels, but which must be done and done while it is yet day."

"I wish to add, for the encouragement of both young and old, that all my life I have found that consecrated giving, at the right time and in the right direction, is one of the very best tests of a man or woman's Christianity. In my sixty-eight years, nothing recurs to me as having been productive of so much soul-satisfaction as those offerings of self-sacrifice—whether in the form of personal effort or simple gift—that I have been permitted to lay upon the Gospel altar.

Truly I can say with the old Christian philosopher: 'What I spent, I had; what I kept, I lost; what I gave, I have.' Our true wealth hereafter is the good we have done in this world to our fellowmen, and the highest good we can do them is to help set their feet in the path that leads to immortal life."

Almost all the letters received invoke God's blessing on the work of the Bible Institute. Some of the contributors, though poor in worldly goods, yet send forward their gifts cheerfully.

An invalid, M. A. F., Philadelphia ($5), writes: "Please pray for me, as I am passing through great nervous prostration and weakness, fearing the loss of my mind. I wish to aid you in your heartfelt and noble work." "It gives me pleasure," writes Mr. Jos. E. Callinson, of South River, Md., ($25) "to contribute my mite to the Moody Gospel Fund." A "Philadelphia Reader," ($1) writes: "Having seen Mr. Moody's appeal for help in the good work he is doing for our Lord, I send a widow's mite. I wish it were more." Mr. Crozer, Va., ($1) says: "My mite, cheerfully sent to aid your noble work." G. W. D. N., Quincy, Ill., ($2) writes:

"Poor as I am, I enclose my offering for the great work, and God bless Bro. Moody and all his co-laborers. That is what I should have been doing, too, these many years, preaching ical field. Upon them is laid the burden of lifting up these churchless masses to the light and joy of the Gospel; with them lies the responsibility of sending out or holding back the Lord's messengers of love and mercy. No leader in the Gospel army is so well qualified to sound this call as he; none has done more yeoman service in the field for the cause for which he is now pleading. And it is cheering to know that the summons has brought responses, ere the echoes have died away, that afford encouragement to those who have the cause most warmly at heart.

Mr. Moody was confronted with a problem that perplexed him greatly. As he went from city to city on his evangelizing work, he found that large numbers were outside the churches and were not being reached. Men who had been in contact with Christianity all their lives were, under his preaching, brought into the church. He was strongly impressed with the conviction that the time was opportune for the beginning of some work unidentified with the church, and yet thoroughly Christian. He saw that the children of Christian parents—the rising generation—were being fully reached by the churches; but on the other hand, he saw on every side thousands whose antecedents for generations back had been under worldly influences, and who were not attracted by the church and did not care to go to the church. They could only be reached by missionary effort, outside of the regular field occupied by the churches. At the same time, he felt keenly his own incapacity to meet this emergency. He accordingly founded the Moody Bible Institute from the same classes. As Christ found his disciples among the fishermen of Galilee, so the evangelist now found his co-workers chiefly among the poor of his own land. There were, however, two courses open to him—first, to establish a great Training Institute for the special purpose of meeting this new development of affairs; or, second, to develop the Institute previously founded and which had already done excellent service. He has now chosen the latter course, and his plans for the enlargement of the Bible Institute's work and his appeal for the co-operation of the Lord's people throughout this country, have been fully presented in these columns.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, are familiar, to some extent, with the work performed in the past by the Moody Bible Institute. It is an active, aggressive work for Christ, among a vast population who have no church relations and who are, therefore, outside of church influences. The desire for extending the Gospel to the non-church going millions was never so generally felt as now, when it is stirring up good men and women everywhere. Mr. Moody should have their co-operation in this work on a wide and generous scale that shall reach from New York to California and which will include every Christian Church from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

On this page we present the portraits of three workers who have labored most devotedly and effectively, under Mr. Moody's direction, in the training of the young men and women at the Bible Institute in Chicago. It is now about six years since Mr. Moody conceived the plan of founding this school where men and women could be educated in practical Christian work. It was two years before this plan could be carried into successful effect. Three roomy buildings on La Salle Avenue, immediately north of the Chicago Avenue Church, constitute what is known as the Women's Home, and just back of those, facing what was formerly called Pearson Street, but is now known as Institute Place, is the Men's Department of the Bible Institute. Rev. R. A. Torrey is the superintendent, and is assisted by D. Baines-Griffiths. When the Institute was first opened, Miss Gertrude Hulbert was put in charge of the Ladies' Department. This position was soon afterwards assumed the Gospel—as I believe I was called to the work; but I let Satan talk me out of it. I, too, would wish to enter the Bible Institute for the purpose of fitting me for work among the masses."

"As they do not come to the church, the church must send the Gospel to them," is the language employed by Mr. Moody in his appeal in behalf of the unevangelized millions of our American cities. And this is the field for which 300 young men and women are now training at the Bible Institute in Chicago at the present time. But the inadequacy of the work and the urgent needs of its immediate enlargement must be apparent to all who give the matter a moment's serious consideration. THREE HUNDRED WORKERS TO THIRTY MILLION SOULS! When all are tested and placed in their several fields, the proportion would be less than one messenger of the Gospel to every 100,000. Such a proportion would be amazingly small even were the work in a foreign land; but at home, and at our very doors, in every large city in America, it seems an almost unimaginable condition of things. These good, easy-going Christians, who sit cozily in their pews or by the fireside and sing:

Shall we, whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high—
Shall we to men benighted,
The Lamp of Life deny?

yet rarely give a passing thought to the thousands who may live within a few minutes' walk of their homes, and who never enter a church, read the Bible or hear the sacred name of Jesus, except in profanity.

But the true Christian, having the love of the Master and the furtherance of his Kingdom at heart above all else, does not hesitate when service is to be performed. And Mr. Moody has shown, to every son and daughter of the King, the urgent need of their co-operation in this great evangel-to train young men and women for this special work. Soon he realized that the field was far larger than he supposed, and the numbers of consecrated applicants who were ready to devote their lives to the work were also legion. All he could do in the Institute was as a drop in the ocean by contrast with the necessity itself. There came to him an avalanche of applications from men and women who were ready to take up this burden of work, and go out into this special field as his co-adjutors. So many eager souls, burning for service, gladdened his heart, for they wished to come to his assistance in the very way he most needed them. They were inspired with his own spirit and example, but beyond all, with the love of Christ. They asked him to point the way, to fit them more fully for the work, and to give them the training needed for effective service in this special field—training that he has thoroughly studied and in which he is himself a master. They do not ask to be trained on classical lines; they do not need either Greek or Hebrew. The particular and special training which Mr. Moody himself has proved to be essential to successful Christian work is widely different from that of the mere scholar; it is a training of the heart and hands, teaching them how to work in unison together for the inbringing of souls to the Kingdom.

The result of these applications was that the Institute was flooded, and there was a lack of the means, necessary to support such a number of students as desired to come. Many of these needed to be supported and there were others who could put only a part of the $100 a year which is the individual cost of each student to the Institute. Mr. Moody found also that the principal support came not from the rich, but from the poor and people of moderate means, and also that the majority of the applications for enrolment as students came however, by Mrs. S. B. Capron, who for thirty years has been a missionary in India. Miss Emily S. Strong is Mrs. Capron's assistant and Mrs. Harper is the housekeeper of the Home. The name of Mr. McGranahan, Musical Director, is almost a household word, and his beautiful sacred songs are sung in thousands of homes and a large number of churches throughout the Union.

ABOUT WEDDINGS.

THE past month has been full of tintinabulation of wedding bells. Orange blossoms in a thousand homes and churches, north, south, east and west. Our hotels, our railroads, our places of amusement thronged with the newly married, and our congratulations go after them. Long life to all those who during the month have united their destinies, and may their cup of earthly experience have no more bitter or sour drops than will just answer to keep it from becoming insipid. God-honored institution of marriage! How it marches on from age to age, and the better society becomes the more the institution is honored. Not a mere civil contract, as infidel and atheistic men would have us believe, for it had a divine starting in Paradise. What a morning that was of the world's first wedding! Sky without a cloud. Atmosphere without a chill. Foliage without a crumpled leaf. Meadows without a thorn. It shall take place in church, the great temple of a world, sky domed, mountain pillared, sapphire roofed. The sparkling waters of the Gihon and the Hiddekel will make the front of the temple. Larks, robins and goldfinches will chant the wedding march. Violet, lily and rose burning incense in the morning sun. Luxuriant vines sweeping their long opulence through the forest aisle. Upholstery of the spring morning. Wild beasts standing outside the circle looking on like family servants from the back door gazing upon the nuptials. The eagle, king of beasts; the locust, king of insects; the lion, king of beasts, waiting. Carpets of grass like emerald, for the human pair to walk on. Hum of excitement as there always is before a ceremony. Grass blades and leaves whispering and the birds a-chatter each one to his mate. Hush! all the winds. Hush! all the birds. Hush! the waters. For the king of the human race advances with his bride—a perfect man leading to the altar a perfect woman. God, her father, gives away the bride, and angels are the witnesses, and tears of morning dew stand in the blue eyes of the violets, and Adam takes the smiloth hand that had never been worn with work or stung with pain into his own stout grasp as he says: "This is now bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh." Tumults of joy break forth and all the trees of the wood clap their hands, and all the galleries of the forest sound with carol, clasp and chant, and the circle of Edenic happiness is complete. For while every quail hath a swerving quail, and every fish answering fish, and every owl answering owl, and every beast of the forest appropriate companion, at last, man the immortal has for mate woman the immortal. Married in June of the year one, Adam, first man to Eve, first woman, high heaven officiating.

Away, then, with the coarse notion that marriage is a mere civil contract. It is a Paradisaical six thousand year old divine institution, and all the laws since Blackstone or before Blackstone cannot properly marry two hearts unless God Almighty has first married them. All this makes sensible people look upon marriage as an important step. Instead of being lassoed by a curl, or trading hearts in a philopena, they realize that between cradle and grave the most tremendous place is the marriage altar, and that while before that altar the twain stand with joined hands, between them stands unseen either the white angel of blessing or the horned and hooved and fire nostriled gorgon of despair. Applaud, therefore, all honest marriages, and frown upon everything that would put them to ridicule. Have nothing to do with those slushy pamphlets and books which tell how impossible men meet impossible women and get into impossible difficulties, and with impossible results, and villainy went unwhipped and virtue fell dead. The fact is that many of the young married people of this day get their heads so filled with talse and sentimental notions in regard to the plain, serious, old-fashioned institution of marriage they are unfit for the common duties of life. There she goes lounging around the house with a twenty-five cent novel over her arm, her slippers run down at heel, the furniture undusted and the socks undarned, and everything from cellar to garret a domestic chaos. Go home and gather up all the Frenchy stuff and pitch it into the kitchen grate.

The best way for us to honor the marriage institution which has been so often celebrated lately, is for us who are now in that relation to faithfully perform all our duties, not taking easy offense from each other, remembering that hasty words and hasty actions sometimes are not a matter of the heart, but merely a matter of the nerves. Husbands at the store worn out with anxiety, wives at home worn out with household cares sometimes have their equipoise of spirits unbalanced. There are but few American men or women who have any nerves worth speaking of. These delicate telegraphic wires of the human body get damaged in the storm and lightnings of temper run over them very irregularly. Quit all the slights and be economical with censure, for there will before long be a hearse standing at your door that will take away out of your presence the best friend you have on earth, and the rich boon God in his omnipotence and infinity has capacity to bestow, a good wife.

BE YE READY!

WE must not be morbid or lachrymose or out of accord with the hilarities of this life. I would have more banquets instead of less banquets—commercial banquets, artists' banquets, holiday banquets, birthday banquets, banquets at the parting, banquets at the return. The most solemn ordinance of our holy religion is a banquet and heaven is a great feast called "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb." It all depends upon what we celebrate and the spirit in which we celebrate it. From the useful festivities of earth we can go without shock into the festivities of heaven. And what a mercy if we can go up right from the post of duty here to scenes of reward there.

I like the religion of the farmer in a New England legislature many years ago on what was called the dark day, a day so dark that the people thought the judgment day had come, and some one proposed they adjourn the legislature. "No," said the farmer member, "I move that we have candles brought in and, if this is the last day, let it find us at our post of duty." A protracted scene of languishing days and nights is not desirable; long rows of medicine bottles on the shelf; dim tapers at midnight; watchers struggling to keep awake until the dawn; elaborate guesses as to how long you can last. It one is ready to go, the quicker the better; the mother while rocking the cradle, the clerk while adding up a column of figures, the farmer while following his plow, the banker while seated at his desk, the carpenter while shoving a plane, the orator as he closes his speech. As for myself, I choose not. If I could decide by turning my hand this way or that, I would not turn it. God knows best. I have only one wish, that is, thorough readiness. Whether in the bright morning of the dark night; whether while the spring flowers are white as snow or the snow of winter lies in wreaths like the flowers; whether through a gradual and slow decadence or instantaneous physical eclipse, may we have Christian and triumphant release.

But though we are gone, that will not decrease our interest in the world's welfare. Wellington visited the battle of Waterloo many years after the struggle. He was there incognito and on horseback, the guide not knowing that he had been there before, pointing out the places of interest, when the stranger could have told the guide more than he ever dreamed of about all the places. So after we have passed off from this scene we may go back again to see the places of our earthly struggle and earthly victory. And, though we shall be incognito and unrecognized, we can tell of scenes of thrilling interest in which we once participated. Happy will it be for us if we can find on such return that the world was advantaged by our present residence.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

T. Wheeler, Moscow, Vt. Would you kindly give the original meaning of the word Adam? I am told that it means Error?

It means "red earth" or "the ground," referring to the ruddiness of countenance which is believed to have characterized our first parent.

Kate M. Loomis, 20 Centenary Street, Binghamton, N. Y. Will some one kindly send me the words to an old song, the last line of each verse running, "All of self and none of thee, some of self and some of thee."

H. D. Scholters, Chicago. I ink J. C. Randall's, of Des Moines, Iowa, idea for a Christian badge a splendid one. It might often remind us of our duty as children of the King just as a soldier's uniform does of his duty toward his country.

Jessie Petrie, Kenosha, Wis. Do you know of any course of study on general missionary work? If so, what is it and where can I get it?

Write to Rev. A. B. Simpson, 692 Eighth avenue, New York City.

Mrs. H. B. Ring, Agnew, Neb. 1. How wide was the Red Sea when it crossed by the Hebrews? 2. Who wrote a poem on this narrative, that was an eye-witness?

1. About five miles, assuming that they crossed at Ras Atakah. 2. Moses and Miriam composed songs of deliverance on that occasion. (See Exodus 15.)

Subscriber, Nokesville, Va. What is meant in 1 Cor. 13:15, by a man's work being destroyed while he is saved?

That a man who is a real believer in Christ may be saved and yet miss the reward that is to be given for faithful service if he has worked in a wrong spirit, or with wrong motives, or in an unscriptural manner.

J. S. Machin, Laurins, S. C. 1. How long after the death of Joseph in Egypt until the birth of Moses? 2. If the number of Israelites that passed out of Egypt under Moses was two millions, how many crossed the Jordan and entered the Promised Land?

1. Joseph died B. C. 1635; Moses was born B. C. 1571 or 64 years later. 2. The number of males over 20 was 601,730. (See Numbers 26:51.) This enumeration was made about a year before they entered the Promised Land and showed that although 40 years had passed and all who had left Egypt had died except two, the number of the host, women and children included, was almost the same as when it crossed the Red Sea.

Subscriber, Oakland, Iowa. Is it right for a church member to start for Chicago with fat cattle on Saturday afternoon, so as to gain the best market on Monday morning, knowing he will have to travel and care for the stock all the Sabbath day?

"Thy man servant, nor thy maid servant, nor thy cattle," are the words of the commandment relative to Sabbath-keeping, which has never been abrogated. We have repeatedly stated in "The Mail-Bag" that no Sabbath work is justifiable save that which is of necessity or of mercy, and the case in point does not come within this category. It is working on the Sabbath just as much as though he were to sit at his books in his counting-house on that day. Write to Baker & Taylor Co., publishers, New York, for book entitled, "The Sabbath for Man," which treats the whole question very fully.

A. Cutter, Princeton, Cal. In the Mail-Bag in answer to the question, "Of what tribe was Christ?" you say that Mary his mother, descended from David, and was therefore of the tribe of Judah. How is it proved that Mary was of the tribe of Judah?

It is not proved, except inferentially. The Jews, in constructing their genealogical tables, reckoned wholly by males. Some of the best modern authorities, however, observing all the rules followed by the Hebrews in genealogies, have reached the conclusion that in Zerobabel the lines of Solomon and Nathan unite, and that Joseph and Mary are therefore of the same tribe and family, being both descendants of David in the line of Solomon and that both have in them the blood of Nathan. David's son, Joseph, has descent from Abiud (Matt. 1:13) and Mary from Rhesa (Luke 3:27), sons of Zerobabel. The genealogies of Matthew and Luke are parts of one perfect whole; the former bearing the descent of Mary and Joseph from Solomon—the latter the descent of both from Nathan.

Riley O. Schieb, Valley View, Pa. Do you think that children dying in infancy and unbaptized are lost and if so, why?

We do not think they are lost in the sense of being consigned to perdition, it is that is what you mean. Such treatment of them would be inconsistent with our ideas of the Divine character. There is one passage of Scripture that appears pertinent to the question. It occurs in Paul's argument as to the effects and remedy of the Fall. He says (Rom. 5:18), that "as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all unto justification of life." His argument appears to be that whatever "penal" consequences resulted from the Fall were removed by Christ's atonement and the one was as universal in its application as the other. Of course, the infant could be in danger only through inheriting a fallen nature, as it does not commit actual sin. If, therefore, by Christ's atonement the penal effects of the Fall are nullified, the infant, though incapable of faith, is saved through Christ. We do not think the passage you quote from John 3, applies to the case of infants, but only to persons who have come to years of discretion and are guilty of actual sin.

A. E. Eureka, Mich. Does a minister of the Gospel who uses an oath or takes a glass of whiskey commit a greater sin in doing so than would a member of his church in doing the same thing?

The intrinsic sin, would, of course, be the same in both cases. The minister's responsibility, however, is greater and by so much his guilt is increased. He is bound to do nothing that would impair his influence or weaken his power as a servant of Christ. If he commits any act that does this he commits another sin which renders the other more heinous, as it may do more harm to others.

Constant Reader, Chambersburg, Pa. 1. In this Dispensation is man required to seek Christ or is he sought by Christ by the Holy Spirit through the preached word? 2. Does God forgive the believer's sins when he accepts Christ, or has Christ paid the whole debt on the Cross? 3. Is Christ interceding for the sins of believers only? 4. Whose advocate is he? 5. Can a regenerate man ever be lost?

1. Man is certainly required to seek salvation through Christ, not to sit indifferent or careless waiting for the Holy Spirit to lead him to Christ, although the Holy Spirit may do that, and has done so in some conspicuous cases. (See Heb. 2:3 and Rom. 10:20). 2. We are assured that God does forgive the sins of all who believe (see Acts 10:43), and we are also assured that Christ bore the penalty of sin. (See 1 Peter 2:24.) The two doctrines are not inconsistent. 3. He does intercede for the sins of believers. We do not know that his intercession is limited to them. He certainly must desire the conversion of unbelievers. It is not likely that he intercedes for them in the sense of their being forgiven in their unbelief. 4. See 1 John 2:1. 5. No regenerate man, we think, would be willing to so put God's forbearance to the test. He would come back and entreat forgiveness, however far he had wandered, if he had once been a child of God.

THE DEVASTATION IN GREECE.

WHEN the reports of disasters caused by the earthquakes in Greece were published three months ago, the full extent of the calamity was not realized. An artist who has just visited the scene of devastation, has sent home several sketches, one of which is reproduced on this page, which show how terrific was the force of the shocks and how complete was the destruction they worked. The locality represented is the region around Atlante, a town which was little injured by the first shock, but was overwhelmed by the second. Huge fissures of great depth mark the ground, showing the course of the disturbance, as if the earth had been struck with a gigantic axe. Between and around them are heaps of ruins and fragments of walls, showing where houses and public buildings once stood and among them are gigantic boulders, torn by the earthquake from the mountain side and rolled down until arrested by some obstacle. The town is now entirely deserted, its three thousand inhabitants being too poor to rebuild it have scattered among adjacent villages. Eight towns in the same district suffered similar destruction. They are in the ancient Phocis and Boeotia on the borders of the channel which separates the island of Negroponte, the ancient Eubœa, from the main land. One of them was Thebes, the modern town which occupied the site of the ancient city that contested for the supremacy of ancient Greece. Its destruction was complete, not a house being left standing. In former times such a catastrophe would have been regarded as a direct judgment from God and a mark of his displeasure. In our day it is explained on scientific principles and is proved to be the effect of natural causes; but like other natural phenomena, which were formerly regarded as supernatural, the earthquake is under God's control. We are too apt to forget that in discovering a natural cause we are only finding the means God uses for accomplishing his purposes and that all nature and its laws are but an expression of his will. "His kingdom ruleth over all." (Ps. 103: 19.)

Why the Piano was Silent.

A lady living at Utica, N. Y., was deeply mortified recently by the stupidity of a carpenter. In removing from one part of the city to another, her handsome square piano was injured. Its cover was cracked across. The piano-tuner told the lady that it could be easily repaired and he could send an expert who would do it so well that the crack would never be seen. The lady, fearing that an expert would charge a high price, declined the offer and trusted the work to a carpenter, who was doing other work in the house. She did not superintend the job, but saw that it had been done neatly. A few days afterward she entertained a party of musical friends and invited one of them to play. But she was unable to open the piano. She tried the lock but found that it was not locked, yet she could not raise the cover and her friends had to leave without music. Her husband tried his strength upon it afterwards, but without avail. Examining it closely, he found that the carpenter had labored under the idea that the cover should not be movable and had accordingly glued it down and fastened it securely and neatly with some long, strong nails. The lady was deeply chagrined and could find no words strong enough to characterize the carpenter's stupidity. Yet the man had done very effectually the thing he was instructed to do. He did not know that his employer would prefer a piano from which sweet music could be drawn, even if its cover was split, to one with an immaculate cover that must be silent. He was evidently not familiar with pianos, otherwise he would have been aware that he was doing a worse injury than he was curing, inasmuch as he was defeating the primary use and purpose of the instrument. Parents have been known to make a similar mistake in dealing with a child. Thinking that its social attractiveness would be marred by youthful piety, they have stifled its spiritual impressions and defeated the chief object for which it was sent into the world. (Matt. 16: 26.)

A Horse in a Church.

The Presbyterian Church of Islip, N. Y., had a novel and unexpected visitor on June 21. A New York firm had occasion to send its delivery wagon to the town on that day. The man in charge of it fastened the horse to a hitching post in front of a store while he did his business, but something frightened the animal and it tugged at the fastening until it yielded, and then it began a mad race along the sidewalk. People ran out of its way and the horse dexterously avoiding obstacles, reached the corner of the street, where in turning the corner sharply the wagon was overturned and the shafts broken. It continued its way, with the broken fragments of the vehicle trailing behind and adding to its fright, until it reached the Presbyterian Church. The door of the edifice stood open, and the horse turned suddenly and entered. The remains of the vehicle became entangled in the seats, and the horse, after vainly struggling to force itself free, fell in a heap in the aisle and lay there panting and exhausted. The work of extricating it was a difficult one, the aisle being narrow and the horse being excited and particularly active with its hoofs. It injured itself badly, but was finally removed. It chose a bad place for refuge, but in its terror-stricken condition would probably have entered any door that stood open. A man in like condition might have been helped there. Many a one has found safety and peace in God's house when all other refuges failed. (Ps. 73: 17.)

THE EARTHQUAKES IN GREECE—THE DEVASTATION NEAR ATLANTE.

In Collision with an Iceberg.

A narrow escape from shipwreck was experienced by the "Ethiopia" of the Anchor line, on its recent voyage from New York to Glasgow. The steamer was proceeding cautiously in a dense fog, when suddenly an enormous iceberg loomed up out of the haze right ahead. It was too close to be avoided and the "Ethiopia" struck it with a force that stove in her bows. As the passengers saw the forward part of the steamer settling a panic spread among them. Women clasped their children in their arms and wept and the men ran hither and thither asking questions and seeking life-preservers. The Captain ordered the boats lowered and preparations were made for leaving the ship. But an examination below deck showed that, thanks to the prompt closing of the water-tight bulkheads, very little water had entered the hold and measures were at once taken to save the ship. Bags of flour were taken from the cargo and securely fastened in the breaches in the bow and the crew were set to work shifting the cargo aft so as to raise the bows above the water line. In a short time the Captain was able to assure the passengers that the danger was past and the steamer proceeded on her voyage. Happily the weather was calm during the remainder of the trip and the "Ethiopia" reached Glasgow in safety. The dock people who saw her steam in with her bows high in air marvelled that she had been kept afloat. So will it be when after the voyage of life, some storm-tossed human bark enters the heavenly haven. Battered by trials and temptations and the assaults of the enemy and often in danger of sinking, yet preserved by the strength of the Great Captain of Salvation it reaches home at last. (Ps. 107: 30.)

The Murdered President.

All the world was shocked on June 25 when the news was published that the President of the French Republic had been statesmanlike. It is believed that his murderer was the agent of some anarchistic society, and had no personal ill feeling toward him. The anarchists have been unusually active of late, and appear to have as much antipathy to the President of a Republic as to the Czar of Russia. What they expect to gain by such a foul crime as this does not appear, but it is likely to lead to still more severe measures being taken against them. No cause was ever advanced by crime, and the cause of anarchy will be no exception. France has been the seat and centre of anarchy, and has done more than any other nation to foster it. That the head of her government should have fallen a victim to it is a remarkable fulfilment of the warning of the inspired Preacher. Eccles. 10: 8, 9.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The American Bible Society has received news of valuable work being done by Mr. F. Penzoni and his helpers in Costa Rica.

A memorial window in honor of John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, has been dedicated in the parish church at Midford, near Hertford, England. In that church he was baptized. Mr. Bayard, the ambassador of the United States to England, was present at the dedication and made an address.

The First Congregational Church of Springfield, Mass., having to choose a successor to Dr. Burnham, decided to commit the duty of choosing to a committee. The church considered that the custom of hearing candidates was derogatory to the dignity of pastors and did not always secure the object desired.

In Uganda Bishop Tucker says that where a few years ago the people were sunk in the lowest heathenism he has seen 5,000 at one time worshipping the true God in a noble building erected by their own hands. He says, too, that he never saw more order or reverence in an English Cathedral than at these Sunday services.

According to the Baptist Year Book for 1894, the number of persons baptized in 1893 was 175,077. The increase by baptism, by letter, by experience and by restoration amounted to 303,704, and the decrease by letter, exclusion 47,650, erasure and death amounted to 182,454, leaving a net gain of 121,250 for the Northern, Southern and colored Baptists.

Miss Lilly M. Duryee, daughter of Professor Duryee of Rutgers' College, has personally responded to the call for missionaries from the Missionary Society of Japan. She will go out under the auspices of the Dutch Reformed Church but at her own expense. Dr. Isaac M. Dodd and Mrs. Dodd go out by the same steamer to labor as medical missionaries.

Taylor University, Indiana, has this year conferred the following honorary degrees: Gov. William McKinley, of Ohio, LL.D.; G. H. Sandison, Ph.D., and B. J. Fernie, Ph.D., the two last named being associate editors of this journal. At commencements in former years, Taylor University conferred the degrees of LL.D. upon Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, the editor, and Ph.D. on Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Canadian Evangelists, Messrs. Crossley and Hunter, have been conducting a series of United Evangelistic meetings at Belleville, Ont. They continued six weeks, during which time over eight hundred persons entered the enquiry-room as seekers for salvation. The Earl of Aberdeen, the Governor-General of Canada, attended the last of the meetings and spoke of the gratification it afforded him to see the various denominations uniting in Christian work.

The Annual Convention of Christian Workers will be held in Toronto, Oct. 25 and will continue for eight days. The meetings will be held in the Massey Music Hall, which will accommodate audiences of 3,600 persons. These conventions, which have been greatly blessed in former years, have become events of national importance and we give this early notice so that our readers may arrange to attend. The programme for this year is more than usually attractive. Among the speakers will be Mr. Jacob Riis, the distinguished philanthropist of New York; Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, and Rev. R. A. Torrey, of the Moody Bible Institute. At the close of the Convention, Messrs. Moody and Sankey will commence a series of Evangelistic meetings. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

assassinated on the previous day. M. Carnot was visiting Lyons to see the Exposition of Arts, Sciences and Industries in that city, and had been entertained at a banquet in the building. He entered his carriage about nine in the evening and bowed to the crowd of people who were cheering him. He had scarcely taken his seat when a young man with a newspaper in his hand made his way to the carriage and springing on the step drew a dagger from the folds of the newspaper and stabbed the President. He was at once seized by the crowd and narrowly escaped being lynched by the indignant people. The wounded President was taken to the Prefecture, where the physicians did all that was possible to save his life. Their efforts, however, were futile. M. Carnot lingered three hours in great agony and died soon after midnight. He had been President six and a half years, and was nearing the end of his term. His administration had been remarkably successful, and his conduct in office dignified and

"The City of the Great King."

Our Traveler looks out upon Jerusalem
—David's Tower and Mount Moriah—
A Picturesque Population.

OR a close, comprehensive view of the present city of Jerusalem and the encompassing hills, there is no better standing-point than that to which we have ascended within fifteen minutes after our arrival. The hour is close upon sunset, and this "loggia" upon the roof of the Grand New Hotel is an incomparable observatory from which to enjoy the rising and going down of the sun.

M. Antoine Gelat, the prince of hotel-managers, in kindly regard for the comfort of his guests, and a sort of intuition that anticipates desires and suits circumstances to their tastes, is our conductor. He says just enough to accustom us to our environment, then stands aside, ready to answer further questions, but volunteering no comment.

We lean upon the railing, our souls in our eyes, and gaze toward the Mount of Olives. What pilgrim does not first turn in that direction? The west is crimson behind it; the white road leading around it to Bethany is partly in the shadow creeping up the city-ward slope to the tall tower upon the top, said to mark the spot of the Ascension.

"Which cannot be," our host suggests, "since we read that 'He led them out as far as Bethany.'"

The intervening roofs and the outer wall of the city conceal Gethsemane from us. The evening light folds warmly about the dome of the Mosque of Omar, standing all these centuries as a type of the abomination of desolation, above the most Holy Place.

"Mount Moriah!" has been said in our ears "and over there, Calvary, and where we stand, Mount Zion. Across the street is what is known as David's Tower. The foundation-stones belong to the original structure. You can see where the more modern masonry begins."

Creeping plants grow rankly in the crevices between the massive stones; upon the flag-pole on the top, the crescent-and-star flap feebly in the sunset breeze; the shrill sweetness of bugle-notes winds upwards above the noises of the street. A Turkish garrison occupies the ancient fortress, for long the citadel of the "city which David built."

"It is a little city now," we murmur, voicing the disappointment inevitable to those whose imaginations have drunk in since infancy, stories of Jerusalem the Golden.

"Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion on the sides of the north, the city of the Great King."

The words roll like a majestic chant through the memory. The mountains are around about her still, but where are the towers we are bidden to count? Are her bulwarks worth marking? and her palaces—where are they?

"It was smaller still when David had reigned here thirty years," says one, "for Moriah was the Jebusite's threshing-floor."

Reluctant to admit what is making our hearts sink, we ask for the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and it is shown to us, almost beneath our feet. The Jaffa gate is close to the hotel; the street conducting from it is the narrow artery of city-life. Against a wall where passers-by must stumble over their feet, sit three men in attitudes of intense fatigue, or dejection.

every variety of shabbiness possible to the striped robe of cheap camel's hair, that is graceful or ungainly according to the wearer's station and bearing; Syrian women in white izzars and colored mendeels, jostle Jewish women with shawls over their heads, and uncovered faces; donkey-boys, fruit-selling boys, camel-boys trudging beside, the ugly beasts lunging right through the heart of the crowd, their great spongy hoofs spattering the mud right and left from the sunken middle of the paved way; beggar-boys—even—and here we laugh,—newsboys, crying what look like evening papers,—are everywhere conspicuous. Some of the urchins sport the loyal tarboosh, most of them are bare-headed, and so far as we can judge at this height, not one has so much as a personal acquaintance with a comb, or ever heard of a brush. It rained this morning, and from the mire and dirt the many feet stir up evil odors.

"The joy of the whole earth!" Ah! The lower rim of the sun kisses the hilly horizon, and through the mingling and nameless clamor of the lower world, a wild, alien cry reaches our outlook, and turns us toward a square minaret, high unto the church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Once heard, it is forever recognizable—that tremulous wail of the Muezzin, sent out five times daily to the faithful, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear.

"Allah, hu akbar!
La illah illah Allah!
Siadnah Mohammed Rasoul Allah, Hayah Allah Il Salah!
Hayah Allah Il Fahah!"

many a's, (as broad as circumflex accents can make them) are shaken and quavered and trilled over the red tarbooshed heads of the faithful, we seek in vain for tokens of the profound impression we have been told is invariably produced by the solemn summons.

Between the machicolations of the venerable tower opposite, are visible soldierly figures, lounging and smoking and evidently off-guard. So far from kneeling with their faces toward Mecca and going through the form of prayer, they continue to saunter, to chat and idly survey the street passengers, who for their part, are as deaf to the worse than vain repetitions agitating the air about them as if there were not a minaret within ten miles of Jerusalem.

The beggars pull themselves up and shuffle out of sight, the sunshine having left them in chill shadow; camel-drivers hold on their heedless way in the middle of the street; the driver of a muddy hack drawn up in a corner near the Jaffa gate, eyes with more sense of humor than one usually detects among this saturnine people, a lively tussle between two donkey-boys in front of a huckster's booth: the lordly "kervasse" (orderly) of a foreign consul—gorgeous in gold lace, portentous as to sword, official baton and ultra-official frown—awaits his chief's return from the photograph and olive wood bazaar across the street. Nobody prays that we can discover, unless it be a white-bearded man upon a neighboring house-top, sitting motionless with his back toward us—but, as we now perceive, with his face turned away from Mecca.

We are unaffectedly sorry to take the pith out of an illustration so potent in stirring up Christian listeners to emulate the devotion prevalent in "lands benighted"—but the facts are precisely as I state them. Four minarets rear balconied heads heaven-wards within range of attentive ears, and a good glass shows us as many muezzins popping out of inner chambers, like cuckoos when the clocks strike the hour, and uttering, still cuckoo-like, their "wobbling" cry.

"We expected to see every man fall upon his face and go through his prayers," we complain. "It must cost a great deal to build all these minarets—(there must be at least a dozen in this little city)—and to employ the muezzins, yet nobody pays any attention to them. Is it so everywhere?"

A Jerusalem Roman Catholic comes forward to reply:

"Even in the East, people are too busy in towns to pray so many times a day, unless they are very religious. Most Moslems here content themselves with morning and evening exercises. In the country it is different."

We face the ruddy glory of the west, and without the exchange of a word or glance, each knows that the other recalls "The Angelus," and the bowed peasants in the foreground, the prayerful stillness that may be felt of the fields at eventide.

Drawn darkly against the sky that pal-

THE TOWER OF DAVID IN JERUSALEM, AS IT NOW APPEARS.
(From a Photograph secured in the Holy Land for "The Christian Herald.")

"Professional beggars!" Mr. Gelat remarks. "Picturesque? Yes! picturesque is a branch of their business."

Nobody notices them, while we are looking on. This is the busiest thoroughfare in Jerusalem. We had not known that there were so many donkeys in the world as we see driven or ridden by here in one hour of the day. (In some parts of Europe, the ass is known as the "Jerusalem pony.") Some carry burdens bigger than themselves of faggots, bales of merchandise, crockery, green vegetables—whatever supplies shops and private houses. Some are bestridden by turbaned countrymen, sitting so far back upon the hind quarters that the bulging abiehs conceal the animals' tails; upon others are women muffled up to the forehead, with children upon their laps, and paupers dependent from both sides. Red tarbooshes make spots of color everywhere, some of the wearers are in native costume, many in European; peasants are here in (God is great!

There is but one God:
Our Lord Mohammed is his apostle (or prophet).
Come to prayers!
Come to worship!")

Each phrase is said twice before passing to the next; at the conclusion of the call, the whole formula is repeated from first to last, faster than before, and to a different tune, if tune there be.

This is the famous call to prayer of which such capital is made by writers of travels and oriental tales. It is, as I have said, peculiar. To be frank, it is not musical, and except when heard from a distance on a still evening, not even pleasant. As to the devoutness with which it is enunciated and heard, candor compels the admission that the whole performance is perfunctory to the last degree, and that the effect upon the listener is very unlike what we have been led to expect from the use made of the "much speaking" of Moslems by Sunday School orators and returned missionaries. As the pitates with fervid color, is a wind-mill solitary upon a distant hill: pale stone buildings, some large and all new, start into prominence in middle distance and foreground. The city without the gates is growing fast, and will soon exceed in dimensions, as in neatness and stability, the old town with its strait, steep alleys and irregular lines of houses.

There are no gas-works and no water-works. After night-fall, if one would venture abroad, he must have an attendant with a lantern. The water supply is drawn from cisterns of vast depth, some of which never go dry. In a drizzling rain the streets are foul with semi-liquid filth; when the showers fall heavily, much of this is swept down to lower levels. One does not care to calculate what proportion of noxious matter percolates through the soil to the mighty honey-comb of cisterns underlying the town.

Old Jerusalem is buried many feet below the surface of modern by the rubbish of seventeen overthrows of the City of the Great King. All her pleasant places, often restored, were laid waste beyond the hope of rehabilitation, when the plough-share of Titus rurtowed the hill of Moriah before the generation had passed away that heard the Galilean Teacher's lament over the "Jerusalem that killed the prophets." The Jerusalem who in three days' time would hound to a malefactor's death the Greatest of them all. To our left, between us and the long, straight brow of Scopus and rising above the city wall, low tomb-stones crown another hill. Our eyes never leave it for long, however they may stray as convent, hospice, asylum and church are named to us. The horizontal sun-rays strike and linger upon it, while we take one final look before going below, and the light brings out the tender hues of verdure that always clothe it, even in winter.

"The green hill far away, Without a city wall"— is what, after all, we have come out to see in this far land—a veritable wilderness to him whose happiness depends upon the luxuries of the nineteenth century civilization.

Voces—a heavy bass and a light treble—clash together between the walls shutting in the stairway by which we have climbed to the roof. A dumpty woman pants to the upper floor, followed by a thin man. We know the smooth, round face of one and the sharpened red beard of the other. They are not staring in the Grand, and have only come to get the view. Mr. Gelat advances unobtrusively; Dr. Sharpe introduces, first himself, and then his wife, and "hopes there is no intrusion."

The hospitable manager sets his mind at rest in some fitly chosen words.

"You are well known to me by reputation, Dr. Sharpe, and I shall be honored by any use you can make of my house or my poor services. The view is, as you see, extensive. You are, I presume, familiar with the several points of interest visible from here?"

Mrs. Sharpe utters a little cry. She has waited to the farthest end of the "loggia," and clasps her hand ecstatically:

"I had no idea you were so neat that dear, dear Church of the Holy Sepulchre! How lovely!"

"A misnomer, which perpetuates the wildest fable of the hundreds the Middle Ages have bequeathed to us!" we hear her husband begin—and hasten down the steps.

MARION HARLAND.

THE WORK NOT THROWN AWAY.

Two friends were discussing one stormy night in London, whether or not it was worth while to hold the meeting to which they were going. The night was very dark and the rain fell in torrents. The meeting of the English Missionary Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was held, in spite of the elements, in a chapel in Covent Garden. One man passing by took refuge from the storm, and made up half the audience that listened to a powerful plea for the Indians in British Columbia. Was it worth thrown away? The passer-by who had stepped in lay on his couch all night, thinking of the heathenism of which he had heard that night for the first time. In a month he had sold out his business, and was on his way to mission work among the British Columbian Indians, under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society. Thirty-five years afterward surrounded by "his children," as he loved to call them, he was the centre and head of the model mission station of the Northwest coast.

A Shelter in the Time of Storm

"My God is the Rock of my refuge."—Ps. 94: 22

Words arr.

IRA D. SANKEY.

1. The Lord's our Rock, in Him we hide, A shelter in the time of storm;
2. A shade by day defence by night, A shelter in the time of storm;
3. The rag-ing storms may round us beat, A shelter in the time of storm;
4. O Rock di-vine, O Ref-uge dear, A shelter in the time of storm;

- Se-cure what-ev-er ill be-tide, A shelter in the time of storm.
No fears a-larm, no foes af-fright, A shelter in the time of storm.
We'll nev-er leave our safe re-treat, A shelter in the time of storm.
Be Thou our help-er ev-er near, A shelter in the time of storm.

CHORUS.

- Oh, Je-sus is a Rock in a wea-ry land, A wea-ry land, a wea-ry land; Oh,

- Je-sus is a Rock in a wea-ry land, A shelter in the time of storm.

RECOMPENSE.

ALL have their recompense,
Labor its guerdon,
Strength with the carrier
Comes with the burden.
After rain sunshine,
So run's life's story,
Sorrow and strain
Are preludes to glory.
Clear eyes some gain
In a loss can discover,
All the world over.
That which is loveliest
Comes to the loving,
All that is strongest
The strong have for proving,
Gifts comes the surest
To those who love giving.
They have life's best
Who have made it worth living.
Love gives its gold of love
Aye to the lover
All the world over.
Sad heart, be hopeful,
Despairing no longer,

Wrong is the weaker,
The Right is the stronger;
Trust and go forward,
On God's help relying,
That which is best lives,
Though all else be dying.
God rules forever,
As good will discover,
All the world over.

NO PAINS NO GAINS.

DEPEND where there is no pruning,
No branches cut away;
There will be no fruit to gather,
When comes the harvest day.
Depend where there is no climbing,
No struggling up the way;
There'll be no heavenly heights attained,
When comes the dying day.
Where there is no cross to bear,
No narrow thorny way;
There will be crown of glory,
When comes the final day.

THE VISION OF THE SUPPER.

Events to Precede and Accompany the Call to the Supper of the Lamb.

BY REV. CAPEL MOLYNEUX.

BRETHREN, "the day of the Lord cometh." Time runs on. "He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." Yet a little while, and the bright rising of the sun will be seen on the horizon; every hour that passes brings it nearer; every soul that is added to the church aids the accomplishment of the number of the elect; every incident in providence is the gathering together of God's purposes, in order to the final conclusion. Nation rises up against nation; there are wars and rumors of wars—these are the beginning of the end. Yet a little while, and signs may be clearer, tokens may be brighter. Yet a little while, and it may be said—"Behold, the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him!"

The Lord pronounces in Rev. 19: 9, a blessing of no ordinary character. It is emphatically said—"Blessed are they." And no wonder; because we have here the consummation; here is the end of the matter; this is the winding-up, the conclusion of the whole; this is "the time of the restitution of all things." Our Lord is now in heaven. Heaven received him back again where he had once been in the eternal sonship—received him back in his glorified humanity, "until the time of the restitution of all things"—the time when the number of his elect shall be accomplished. He shall then come, and cause his bride, the church, to be with him, to enter into the same glory with himself. That is the time and the point referred to. It is the marriage—the marriage supper.

The marriage of the Lamb and the marriage supper of the Lamb have not yet taken place: the Lamb is wooing and winning. That is the work of the present dispensation; that is the history of the Gospel. It is not the marriage: it is only the winning of the bride, step by step, one by one, soul by soul; not the whole together—we wait for that. Hence you observe, in that beautiful parable of the marriage supper, the servants were commissioned to go forth and to say, "All things are ready: come to the marriage." And observe, it runs on. Some we know, did not come; and other servants are sent. At last, what happens? The king comes to the guest-chamber, to see the guests. This is before the marriage is celebrated. He finds a man unprepared. But you perceive that the marriage is not come. And notice another striking thing in proof of that. Observe the blessedness is positive—"Blessed are they which are called." The blessedness is identified with the very fact of being called. This is not the case now; for many are not blessed to whom that call comes. But here all are blessed who are called: "Blessed are they who are called." It is not, then, the call to faith, it is the call to sight; it is not the call to take on us the yoke of Christ, it is the call to wear the crown; it is not the call to be uplifted by a spiritual principle merely to sit by faith with Christ, it is the call to be uplifted in glorified bodies, that we may occupy as pillars the temple of the Lord, and go no more out forever; it is that remarkable call—"Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." There are two calls. "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden"—that is one call: "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom" that is the other call. The first call goes forth—all are not blessed that hear it; the second call will go forth, and all shall be blessed to whom it is addressed, for here it is so said. "Blessed are they which are called." That, then, is the call: and it determines the time.

Then you have the shout of praise and thanksgiving: "Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God." There is an "Alleluia" in heavenly places and the shout of those who are about to be attendants at the marriage supper—a shout of joy. Then we have the announcement of the nuptials themselves: "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come." Then we have the beautiful and royal raiment put upon her: "To her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." All this precedes and is preliminary and preparatory to the great event. Then comes the text: "Blessed are they which are," now "called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb."

THE GREAT QUEST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning July 15. Eccles. 1: 12-18; 2: 1-11; Matt. 7: 7-11.

LIFE is a quest wherever there is intelligence. The more highly endowed a man is with mental, moral and spiritual gifts, the more he is conscious of a plane above him which by every power of his nature he will try to reach. The noble nature must climb. It is the penalty of true greatness that it refuses to be content. So it results that great men are seldom, if ever, happy men. The good they seek is never in their possession, but always somewhere beyond them. And they are the victims of recurrent disappointments. In attaining the object of their efforts, they discover that the good they sought is not in them. Success and achievement are thus indissolubly linked with pain and sorrow. The years of struggle have been wasted. "What seemed afar so grand, turns to ashes in the hand." The good attained is found to be fraudulent; it is empty and satiety proves it to be unsatisfying. The "Preacher," whose discourse furnishes two bases for the Topic, had an experience which is duplicated in greater or less degree, according to the means available, by intelligent men in every generation. He is very sad: for with every opportunity for securing the best thing possible to man, he fails, and with every new achievement he says sorrowfully, "This also is vanity." It is a common experience. Lacordaire says in effect that the man who declares himself an optimist writes himself down a man of small penetration: for in acknowledging himself satisfied, he shows that he is incapable of probing things to the bottom. Nevertheless, life would be, from beginning to end, as a great author has said, "like a crazy dream without plan or sequence," if there were no real good attainable. The Preacher sought his good in wisdom, in pleasure, in business, in beneficence and men are still seeking them in the same ways undeterred by the failure of those who have gone before them. But there is a real good and to that Jesus points and indicates the way of attaining it. Surely he who came from God could render humanity no better service. And there was sound philosophy in his declaration and injunction. Man has been perpetually "stretching out lame hands to grope and has been gathering dust and chaff." Why will he not call upon God? From him who made the universe and controls all human life light may be expected. If we can conceive of God's grieving, he must grieve at seeing his creatures persistently blundering and perpetually deploring the results of their blunders. "Ask," Jesus said, "and it shall be given you. . . . Your Father who is in heaven will give good things to them that ask him." So then we learn from the Divine Teacher, as the Preacher at the end of his quest only dimly indicated, that the real good in life is in the hands of God. It is a gift and the way to attain it is by a teachable disposition, by seeking to put ourselves in God's school, to be in harmony with his plans, to be his children, having faith in him, trying to ascertain his will and to do his work in the world. It is humiliating to human pride but it is the only way to the chief good of life.

JUBILEE DAY IN LONDON.

A letter from our friend, Mr. Secretary Cree, gives an enthusiastic report of the reception accorded to the American visitors in London, at the Jubilee of Young Men's Christian Associations. Speaking of Jubilee day, he says: But what can be said in a letter of the great jubilee day, the 6th of June? In the morning, at Exeter Hall, Hon. John Wanamaker presided and made an admirable address. He was followed by Rev. Henry Gibson, formerly of Chicago, now at London, by Rev. Canon McCormick, D.D., and Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler.

The latter address was one of the happiest of Dr. Cuyler's well-known efforts, and the audience was tumultuous in its applause. Brief addresses were also made by Morris K. Jesup and James Stokes. In the afternoon address, gift and telegram poured in from the four quarters of the globe, and from societies of all kinds. The American associations presented an illuminated address, handsomely bound, and signed in autograph by members and secretaries of the American International and State Committees. In the evening a reception was held in Royal Albert Hall. Its seating capacity of ten thousand was fully tested, yet there was no confusion. Sir George Williams presided. There was music by a choir of five hundred voices, by the Upsala student choir of sixty voices, and by Madame Antoinette Stirling. There was a gymnastic exhibition, and stereopticon views of Association buildings and leaders from all parts of the world. A bust of Sir George Williams, presented by the French associations, was unveiled by Lord Kinnaird. Addresses were delivered by Sir George, by Rev. Canon Fleming, Prince Oscar Bernadotte of Sweden, Hon. John Wanamaker of Philadelphia, and Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D. The addresses were all excellent.

THE COMING C. E. CONVENTION.

The great International Christian Endeavor Convention, which assembles next Wednesday (July 11) in Cleveland, Ohio, has been a matter of long deliberation, earnest prayer and hard work for several months past. On the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week are the portraits of the committee who have had charge of the arrangements, and on this page a picture of the Convention Hall where the chief meetings will be held. In a letter to this journal, Mr. Secretary Baer says: "The Christian Endeavor Societies of Cleveland are ready to entertain 40,000 young people if they should come to the International Christian Endeavor Convention to be held in Cleveland, July 11 to 15. It is confidently expected that at least half that number will be present at the convention. The opening meetings, Wednesday night, will be held in sixteen churches of Cleveland. After the opening meetings, the sessions, beginning on Thursday morning, will be held in the immense Sangertest Building, which seats 10,000, and in a large tent which also seats 10,000. The programme is now complete, and is even more extensive and attractive than heretofore. Gov. McKinley makes one of the addresses of welcome. Among the speakers that will be heard will be Dr. P. S. Henson, of Chicago; Bishop Thoburn, of India; Dr. J. H. Barrows, of Chicago; Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of Minneapolis; Dr. George Dana Boardman, of Philadelphia; Rev. Pleasant Hunter, Jr., of Minneapolis; Rev. Maltbie D. Babcock, of Baltimore; Dr. A. C. Dixon, of Brooklyn; Dr. M. Rhodes, of St. Louis; Mr. Anthony Comstock, of New York; Bishop Samuel Fallows, D.D., of Chicago; Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, of New York; Dr. W. H. McMillan, of Allegheny City; Rev. Chas. A. Dickinson, of Boston; Dr. David J. Burrell, of New York; Rev. H. B. Grace, of Chicago; Dr. J. T. Beckley, of Philadelphia; Dr. Smith Baker, of East Boston, and Dr. E. B. Chappell, of St. Louis. The Indian societies will be represented by Jonas Spotted Bear, of the Sante Agency."

A. Y. M. C. A. KNIGHTHOOD.

The distinguished honor of being made a Knight of the Legion of Honor of France, has been conferred on Mr. James Stokes of New York, whose portrait appears on this page. It was given as "a recognition of distinguished services in philanthropic and religious work," chiefly in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association of Paris.

Mr. James Stokes has devoted a large portion of his great estate to philanthropic and religious work, and it was his deep and active interest in the Young Men's Christian Association that led to the conferring upon him of the present high honor by the French government. For twenty-five years, ending a year ago, Mr. Stokes was a member of the American Industrial Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, and for many years he was its representa-entrance states that Mr. Stokes took the initiative in the movement in favor of the building and its success is largely due to him. Mr. Stokes, in accepting the order of the Legion of Honor, said that it was not only an honor to himself, but a high compliment to the work of the Y. M. C. A.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

On Decoration Day the C. E. Society at Salisbury, Vt., gave a reception to old soldiers and their friends, furnishing refreshments and a patriotic programme.

The B. Y. P. U. of Northern and Central California, have raised this year $372.48 for Foreign Missions.

There is an Epworth League to every charge in the San Francisco District, and sixteen Junior Leagues in the district.

The Epworth League of Grace Church, Washington, has a membership of sixty-eight, of which nearly all are active. The members are helping to pay off the church debt by pledging one per cent of their income.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Endeavorers of Texas are to build a mission church, the Southern Presbyterians will support one of their missionaries in China, and the "Christians" will support one of their State evangelists.

After the evening sessions of the California C. E. Convention, prayer meetings of remarkable interest were held at the hotels where the delegates were staying. A pleasant service, too, was the open air meeting on Sunday afternoon.

Delegates to the Baptist Young People's Union at Toronto should provide themselves with credentials signed by an officer of the local Union or by the pastor of the church, otherwise, though welcome at the meetings, they will be unable to vote.

A Young Women's Christian Association at Belfast, Ireland, is enabled to make the following statement in its annual report: "Four members are now in the foreign field, representing us in China, India and Africa; four engaged in home mission work; five in training; and two in treaty for service."

Epworth Leagues are increasing in number in Italy, drawing and interesting the young people. The "Evangelista" has a note from the secretary of the Junior League in Milan, saying that they had just held a "testa" on the occasion of opening their new hall. From the sale of articles made by members of the League and church they realized a considerable sum for evangelistic work.

At the recent Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of the Manitoba district, Secretary T. Gordon Russell reported the formation of thirty-eight new societies and a total number of societies of one hundred and twenty-eight. He classified the work being done by these various societies under the heads of personal work in soul-saving, Bible study and especially work among the Northwest Indians.

Our Children's Sunday School.

A Delightful Feature of the Week at Mont Lawn—Bright Little Folks Ready With Apt Answers.

TO many children, Sunday is by no means the most enjoyable of days, but the experience of the little folks at our Children's Home, at Nyack, has thus far proved the Lord's Day to be the crown of the week and the most delightful day of the seven. To most of them, the Sabbath has opened a new field of enjoyment, such as they had not dreamed of. On that day, the neat little chapel is transformed into a Sunday School, where our children gather in the afternoon and join their sweet voices in the hymn-singing, the music being led by a small but powerful organ. They also take a hearty part in the simple Bible exercises which Dr. Klopsch has arranged specially for their benefit. Only a few visitors were present last Sunday. The answers showed the children to be wonderfully bright. Their attention was directed by Dr. Klopsch to the Proverb that "even a child is known by his doings," and he illustrated the different ways in which this knowledge is gathered, in language easily understood by his young auditors. Thus, the character of one man was known by the name the world had given him, of another by his works, of still another by hearing the description of the individual or of something he had said or done.

"Who was the father of his country?" he asked, and the response came quickly from a dozen children: "Washington." "Who led the Jews out of Egypt?" "Moses," was the equally prompt answer. "Who betrayed his country?" was the next inquiry and the reply that shot out, straight as a bullet, from several pairs of lips—"Benedict Arnold!"—showed that the little public school education the children had received had not been neglectful of history.

There were, in all, 101 of our children present at the Sunday School gathering in the Chapel. When the exercises were ended, they were taken to the lawn in front of the Home and there gathered round the flag, they sang, with a fine display of childish enthusiasm: "My Country 'tis of Thee."

Saturday is a great day with the little folks, as it has come to be known as "Bathing day." Not in the river—although the boys would like it ever so much—but in a commodious bath, made expressly for the Home, are these ablutions performed, two children bathing at a time, and relays of twenty being prepared together for this agreeable duty. After their bath, our youngsters are as spry as kittens and cut up all sorts of antics indoors and out. The boys, to keep them out of mischief, have been organized into two baseball nines and with the finest of bats, and balls that are safe to handle, they play against each other and mark up their score like regular veterans. The girls like to go driving or playing about on the lawn, or flower-picking on the hillside. Some are being trained to do certain light home duties, sweeping floors, dusting rooms or helping set the table, etc., and these happy ones are full of bustle and self-importance. There is nothing a girl loves more than to be entrusted with some responsibility by the Superintendent and the little women go about their dainty tasks like ancient housewives, with proud, satisfied faces, that tell of their pleasure at being permitted to "help out."

Amusing incidents are continually occurring. "Please'm," said one of a group of wee maids, addressing Miss Faulhaber, the Superintendent, "can't we take our beds home wiv' us when we goes back?" They had fallen in love with the little white-painted iron bedsteads, and their snowy coverings. Besides, life to them was all play as yet, and why shouldn't they ask whatever they wished of this "fairy god-mother," who gave them milk and fruit and apple-pie and other good things. "And it's bully," said one little roguish chap of nine years as he held out his mug for another dipper-full. "This ain't none o' yer duce an impression in the lives of these dear little tender lambs, which may help them hereafter? No kindness, however small, is done in vain, and the seeds dropped in those young hearts at Mont Lawn may yet bear some beautiful blossoms in the days that are to come.

How Our Fruits are Named.

The names of many of our fruits at once suggest their foreign origin. Corinth was the sponsor for "currants," and Damascus of "damsons;" we have borrowed the word "gooseberry" from the French "groseille," "apricot" is derived from Arabic, "peach" from the French or Italian, and "tomato" from the Mexican Aztec. "tomotel;" while the word "cauliflower" is almost comically close in its derivation from the Spanish "col-y-flor," cabbage and flower.

The Folly of Overwork.

Some of us do too much sewing, writes Margaret Sangster. Why spend so much time, for instance, in refashioning clothes that are in order and nice, simply because they are not precisely in the latest mode? A tired little woman showed me the other day a gown which it had taken her a steady week, with two late night sittings and a fierce attack of headache, to change. Sew we must and sew we will, my sisters; but don't let us expend too much time and effort on the endeavor to be always up to date in our dress. Why not be independent enough to adopt our own styles, to a certain extent?

We might be less tired if we learned not to feel in haste. People talk of being wearied by worry. Hurry wears upon one quite as much as her twin-fiend, worry, and both are task-mistresses carrying whips. To

THE CHILDREN'S ROOM.

HOW peaceful at night
The sleeping children lie.
Each gentle breath so light!
Escaping like a sigh!
How tranquil seems the room, how fair
To one who softly enters there!

Whose hands are there unseen,
That smooth each little bed?
Whose locks are those that lean
Over each pillowed head?
Whose lips caress the boys and girls?
Whose fingers stroke the golden curls?

Whose are the yearning eyes,
And whose the trembling tear?
Whose heart is this that cries,
Beseeching God to hear?
Whose but the mother's in whose face
Love shows its sweetest dwelling place?

Her hopes in beauty bloom,
And heaven sends down its light,
Which lingers in the room
Where mother says, "Good night."
Soft treading by the sleepers there,
Her very presence seems a prayer!

LEADING THE CHILDREN.

THE sight of any of the marks of childish piety, should make those round about the little one more than usually careful in their conduct and conversation, writes Rev. Wm. M. Taylor, lest they should come within the sweep of the Master's words: "Who-so shall cause one of these little ones to stumble, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depths of the sea." We must beware of doing or saying anything that would make light of their experience. We must not bid them "Go lie down again." We must not say to them that they are as yet too young to think or speak of such sacred things, and that they had better take no more heed to them until they are older. Above all, we must not ridicule their sentiments, or laugh at their modes of expressing themselves. We must not hold them back in any of these ways from the Saviour, but rather gladly suffer them to go unto him, that they may learn of him. Nor is this mere negative treatment enough. We ought in every possible way to encourage them to open their hearts and minds to the teachings of the Lord Jesus in his Word. We

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME AT NYACK—DR. KLOPSCH ADDRESSING THE SUNDAY SCHOOL IN THE CHAPEL.

New York milk, this ain't." He knew too well what New York milk was, to be deceived about it.

A novel pleasure, which fairly made our young folks shriek with delight when they first heard it, is the phonograph which Dr. Klopsch sent up to the Home, together with a selection of musical cylinders, including band pieces, marches, banjo pieces and swelling choruses. There is nothing to which they look forward with keener or more joyous anticipation than the evening half hour with the "funnygram," which the boys, with emphatic appreciation, have already declared to be "better'n a hull lot of dem Eytalian norgans."

Health, happiness and comfort, with plenty of innocent amusement, make the days pass swiftly at Mont Lawn. The first relays of children to be returned to their homes in the city, after their ten days had expired, left with real regret, and the little eyes in a number of cases were suffused with tears, as they bade farewell to the kindly superintendent and her missionary aids.

Who shall say that the memory of those ten short, sweet, sunny days may not pro-worry and to hurry are to grow old in youth, to lose the sense of the elastic nerve and the buoyant spirit. If we can shut the door on these demons, we shall be less tired by far than if we gave them entrance. Fretting over the inevitable distresses and annoyances of our situation has much to do with tiring us. Fretting seldom does any good. It frequently does harm. Foreboding is as idle and as surely fraught with evil.

A Simple Barometer.

About the simplest barometer that one can have—and, it is said, one of the most efficient—is made of two bottles and some water. One of them should be an ordinary wide mouth pickle jar, filled with water to near the top. The other should a long, slim flask, which will go into the neck of the jar. This should be inverted and plunged under the neck of the jar, so that it will not reach the bottom. This arrangement gives a complete barometer. In fine weather the water will rise into the neck of the flask higher than the mouth of the pickle-bottle. In wet or windy weather it will fall to within an inch of the mouth of the flask.

should endeavor to bring them to say to him. "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." For all this the responsibility primarily rests on the parents.

It is sad to think that often the father and mother are those who know least about their children, and the reason of that is because they are very seldom with them. They see little or nothing of them. They rarely speak to them except in the most casual way about anything, much less about Christ and his salvation, and they excuse themselves by pleading the claims of business and the demands of society. But what is a parent's business if not to look after the training of his children? If Christian parents would only realize that more, they would be more frequently gladdened by the sight of the piety of their children. But either they keep themselves so engaged that they see nothing of their children, or they send the children away from home altogether; and so they become virtual strangers to each other, and drift away apart through life in opposite directions. When you see that God has called them, you ought to go with them into the closet, and say with them and for them. "Speak, Lord, for thy servants hear."

CHAPTER I. IN THE ORIENT.

QUIET evening in Palestine; twilight, with only a few stars shining in the sky and streaks of color, still golden and glowing, lingering in the west. Darkness would soon settle over the land, and already the shadows were beginning to creep across Nazareth, and to pass into a deeper shade. At one end of an olive grove stood a large building of the Egyptian style of architecture. It was the season of blossoms, and all around the grove were gardens of purple lilies and bushes laden with roses of various hues; and upon them, in the breeze, white olive flowers were dropping like a shower of soft, warm rain.

Near the edge of one of these gardens stood a young man engaged in conversation with a strikingly handsome maiden—evidently a Jewess. The two seemed to be on the most friendly terms. They had walked amid the gardens, and now that darkness was coming down, it was time to turn their faces westward.

"Come," said Thaeon, taking his companion's hand, "we must be going now, Zerola."

"Yes," laughed the young girl in reply, "for these flowers are scattering their petals in my hair, and I doubt not making me look quite venerable."

"And, of course, the locks of every maid of Nazareth should be the color of—"

"A white swan?" she suggested, smiling.

"No," said Thaeon, shaking his head good-humoredly.

"A golden—pheasant?" she persisted.

"That would be too like your sisters of the north," he rejoined gravely.

"Then a flock of ravens," continued Zerola, shaking the blossoms from her hair as she spoke.

"Yes, dark as their plumes. But listen, listen," and he stood still a moment.

"What was it, Thaeon?" asked the girl.

"I fancied I heard some one walking over there by the grove."

"It must have just been the rustling of the trees," said Zerola. "Let us go on."

"Probably so," replied Thaeon.

Still he lingered and looked back to where, had the shadows been less deep, he might have seen a swarthy face concealed behind some of the olive trees, near the building already mentioned, intently watching them.

The two walked rapidly for a few minutes. It was growing steadily dark; night comes quickly in Eastern lands. They were now nearly beyond the grove.

"I may be hurrying you too fast," said Thaeon gently. "Shall we rest a little?" And they walked more slowly. "Zerola," he continued, "they tell me that you are going away after next Sabbath. Is it so?"

"Yes, I go on a visit to friends in Jerusalem."

Thaeon's eyes sought the ground, and he walked awhile in silence, and then he turned to the girl, and in a voice that showed some emotion, said:

"Zerola, I cannot keep back my thoughts any more, now that you are going. I have been waiting a long time, and many times have had the words on my lips, but have been afraid to utter them, and am so still; yet I cannot keep it back, for I love you, Zerola. Can I hope?"

A moment of silence, and then came the low answer, in a monosyllable, from the girl's lips, "No."

Thaeon's face expressed the deep sorrow of his heart; yet, had he seen the light in Zerola's eyes, he might not have been quite so downcast. There was a smile about her lips, too, that might have cheered him. But he saw it not.

"Then we must part," he said at length, with a deep sigh. "We have been good friends, Zerola, from earliest youth, and since that time—every month and every year—I have learned to love you more. I was a boy then; and now with all my heart and manhood's strength I love you. But, pardon me—I shall speak of it no more."

They were still walking on slowly. For a time neither spoke. At last Thaeon extending his hand, and with a voice whose trembling was but ill-suppressed said, "This is the last time we shall meet. Farewell then, Zerola, farewell."

"No, Thaeon, you shall not leave me," was the soft response, as she still held his hand timidly.

"But why should I stay?" he asked in a voice of surprise. "You have said you cared nothing for me."

"How do you know?" she inquired, shyly. "I said you may not hope; but you may do more—you may know—for, Thaeon, where there is certainty there is no need of hope."

The young man halted, and facing the girl, seemed for a moment to be deprived of the power of speech.

"Do you then care aught for me, Zerola?" he asked tremblingly, not quite sure that he had understood aright. He heard the sweet voice answering softly, "Yes."

Never before had the road homeward seemed so short as it did to these two that evening, when they walked together under the shining stars, with open hearts and beaming eyes. As they neared the dwelling of Zerola's mother, two figures crossed their path; one that of a tall, stalwart man, and the other a dwarf, little larger than a mere lad.

"Karmes and Sati," muttered Thaeon, "the Egyptian and the Imp. It is strange that we should meet these two."

The elder went on. The younger waited. As Thaeon and Zerola approached, he said, performing an obsequious salaam:

"My master, Karmes, the noble Egyptian, whose vast riches are hidden in the treasure pyramids along the banks of his native Nile, bids me ask the gracious Zerola to speak with him. He awaits her pleasure."

A dash of indignation gleamed in the girl's eyes. But she answered simply and calmly:

"Zerola will not come."

As the boy turned and walked quickly away Karmes met him.

"What message?" he queried, "what message?"

In a moment he knew the reply. The next the dwarf was running along the path again.

"Zerola!" he called.

No answer.

"Zerola!"

The two heard him and they walked more slowly. Coming up, the dwarf stepped beside the girl and muttered: "My master says let her remember this hour. He swears that thou wilt yet be his unspiced slave; and when he is tired of thy beauty, so corrupt shall be thy blackened soul that compared with it my Ethiopian skin shall be white as Indian pearls, and thou shalt be glad to crouch in some dark hiding-place amongst the outcast and the vile, and die accursed. 'Ay!' says my master: 'Let her remember this hour years to come!'"

Thaeon would have stopped this impetuous torrent, but the girl put up her hand and checked the impulse. They walked onward, the Imp following. At length, Zerola said:

"Sati, go tell your master Zerola neither likes nor fears him. Go!"

The dwarf sped back and soon was ascending the steps of the old house in the palm-grove, where Karmes awaited him. A few questions were asked, and he knew all.

What would he do next? It was no secret in the village that Karmes was a man of cunning and intricate ways; no principle of ethics or religion ever restrained his desire or his danger.

"Let her remember this hour years to come!" "What could he mean?" Thaeon asked himself. Only the future would reveal the mystery of these ominous words. As they crossed the threshold of Zerola's home in Nazareth, that night, both Thaeon and the girl felt that a shadow had come over their lives—the shadow of the Egyptian.

CHAPTER II.

SETTING THE NETS.

Four days went by, days of happiness. Again it was evening. At the house of Zerola's father, all was music and light and joy, for it was the night of the betrothal feast.

In the East, especially in ancient times, betrothal was a ceremony of nearly as much gladness and solemnity and almost as sacredly binding in its obligations and vows as marriage. Among the Hebrews, this relation was usually determined by the parents or brothers, without consulting the parties until they came to be betrothed, and often while the youth and maiden were mere children. The formal betrothal was usually performed a year before marriage, either in writing, or by a piece of silver given to the espoused in the presence of witnesses, as a pledge of their mutual engagements. It sometimes happened that a regular contract was made in which the bridegroom was bound to provide a certain sum of money as his bride's portion. From the time of espousal, the woman was considered as the lawful wife of him to whom she was betrothed.

At the same hour in which the betrothal rejoicings were taking place in Zerola's home, a very different scene was in progress at the mansion of the Egyptian. Karmes had learned of the proposed departure of Zerola for Jerusalem, and had matured a scheme which he felt certain would result in the girl being delivered into his hands. He was now engaged in writing instructions for the guidance of his chief steward during his absence. Looking up a moment, he said to his attendant:

"Sati, go to the stables and see how soon the caravan will be ready to start."

Then he hurriedly resumed his writing on the wax tablet. He had determined to send a swift messenger on before, thinking that certain matters would thereby be expedited. Looking up again, he enquired where the man was. Just then the messenger entered, equipped for the journey.

"You start to-night!" asked Karmes.

"In an hour," was the respectful answer.

"This letter," and he handed the messenger a small scroll, "take at once to Saul of Tarsus. He lives not far from the palace of Joseph Calaphas, the High Priest, which is near the Temple."

"I will obey your wishes."

"This to Corbulo, general of the legions. You will easily ascertain his place of residence; he is visiting at the house of Pilate."

"I will."

"And this to my sister in Rome. Give it, with that," and he tossed the man a small bag of shekels, "to the captain of the first Egyptian ship bound for the Imperial City."

The listener bowed submissively.

"And now, off with all speed!"

The messenger disappeared, and almost at the same moment Sati entered the chamber.

"The camel driver bids me tell our master that they are ready to start at his command."

"That is well."

"What is Karmes' pleasure?" asks the dwarf.

The Egyptian thought a moment, then responded: "We start for Jerusalem in the morning at sunrise."

About two days after this, the camels and their riders arrived at their destination in the Holy City, and immediately Karmes began setting the nets, as the Fowler sets his snare for the unsuspecting bird.

To a house close to the palace of Herod the Great he first took his way.

"Good-morrow, Karmes," was the salutation of the master of the mansion.

"The noble Arni is well, I hope."

"Excellent well, I thank you."

"I am indeed glad," was the Egyptian's urbane reply.

"You have just arrived?"

"Our caravan came into the city last night."

"No doubt after wandering through an exceedingly pleasant wilderness."

The room in which they sat was adorned most luxuriously with all that the East could furnish to please the eye and charm the imagination.

"Well, Arni, how hums our Jewish hive to-day?"

"Most noisily. I have not heard such buzzing since that day you caught the Imp tending his bees on the mountains of Ethiopia."

"They are fond of honey."

"And of blood."

"But leave their stings in the wound."

"Therefore by each encounter they are the more unarmed."

"And the more prepared for us crocodiles of the Nile to eat them up."

"Ha, ha, Karmes, well said! And we will snap our huge and hungry jaws at the very smell of such a banquet. Wherever the carcass is, there will the crocodiles be gathered!"

"But we must be indeed watchful."

"Your reason?"

"Lest the Roman eagles may swoop down before us."

"An eagle's wing may be quicker than a crocodile's claw, but a crocodile's belly is larger than an eagle's body."

"Ha, ha! at your old game," laughed Arni.

The door of the chamber opened, and a servant entered bearing a letter addressed to Karmes. The Egyptian took it, broke open the seal hastily, and read:

"Saul to Karmes: Most noble friend, greeting. The Sanhedrim meets to-day at the ninth hour in the sacred court southeast of the Temple. Fail not to be within call. Farewell. Saul."

Crumpling up this letter in his hand, the Egyptian explained to his fellow-countryman with greater detail his desire and plans to obtain possession of Zerola. The two men had been companions in many a plot, and usually galloped their horses—or donkeys—to success. Now they glanced at each other, and smiled very knowingly. An acorn looks little, but it may contain a whole forest. Such a smile meant much.

"I suppose," continued Arni, "this Zerola must be fair to look upon?"

"Most pleasant, indeed," responded Karmes.

"Rivaling even the little black-eyed nymphs of Egypt?"

"Surpassing them."

"Oh, Karmes!"

"Too true, Arni."

"What a flame the Jewess has lighted in thy heart."

"Also true, Arni. Whether in the temples of the Nile, in the bazaars of the Euphrates, or in the palaces of the Tiber, I have never beheld a girl, woman or goddess of such wondrous beauty as this daughter of Nazareth."

"Ho! Karmes," laughed Arni, "I fear this flame of thine will out-fire the conflagration of Troy."

"Or of Alexandria when Anthony was there," suggested Karmes. "But enough of jest, Arni. Let us to another subject."

"First, however, let me say: beware, lest you pay too many pearls for your torch."

"What do you mean?"

"This Saul would exalt the priest at the expense of the prince. Though I regard both these as foes—twin vultures hatched from the same egg—yet I am not forgetful that Karmes is of royal lineage."

"Yes."

"And your royal sister an exile in Rome."

"What then?"

"Well, Saul is a Jew; so are his masters. Tiberius is a Roman, so are his minions. And Egypt's true dynasty is a tree which will grow only when watered by the blood of Jews and Romans!"

Knock—knock.

The attendant appeared in the door-way and announced that a scholar of Tarsus requested entrance. In a moment more he was ushered in.

"Welcome, Saul," said Karmes, extending his hand.

"Welcome," repeated Arni, cordially.

"Good-morrow, noble friends," responded their distinguished visitor.

Immediately they proceeded to discuss the business in hand, which on the Egyptian's part concerned Zerola, and on the Hebrew's, the suppressing of Christianity. Widely different purposes these, yet the aim and end of both was the same, the destruction of life and honor.

It was now Karmes' self-imposed and not very difficult task to persuade Saul that it would be advantageous to dispose of the youth Thaeon. Arni saw that they would prefer to be alone; so he arose, muttering cynically as he went out: "Suppress Christianity! Well, I will now go over to Olivet and stop that stream from running down hill."

When he returned, Saul was just taking leave. "You promise," he was saying to Karmes, "you promise that to-morrow, soon after the rising of the sun, Thaeon will be in the vicinity of the Damascus gate."

*THE LIFE OF A "SHUT-IN."

THE life of a "shut-in" is necessarily self-centered, and one must use every effort to escape becoming selfish and utterly spoiled by it. Even the comfort and peace which are given us may be as jealously guarded and kept to ourselves as the treasure over which a miser gloats. But this is not the Master's thought for us. "Freely ye have received, freely give," he says; so as fast as the light comes to us we must pass it on, and, if possible, bring a ray into other darkened lives. "What do we live for, if it is not to make life easier to others?" And in helping and comforting them we shall forget ourselves and our own lives will grow fuller and sweeter.

It is imperative that we get out of self; don't dwell on yourself, but think of others whose lives are also saddened, and reach out a helping hand to them. "But," you say, "my heart is so sad and my own burden so heavy, I have neither strength nor cheer to give to others!" Ah! then you will lose much blessing. "Oh, when we turn away from some duty or some fellow-creature, saying that our hearts are too sick and sore with some great yearning of our own, we may often sever the line on which a divine message was coming to us. We shut out the man, and we shut out the angel who had sent him to open the door." Oh, the blessedness of comforting sore hearts! It is the sweetest mission in the world, and brings us directly in touch with the Master, in whose dear footsteps we are thus truly following.

It is not possible for one to fully sympathize with suffering of any kind unless he has himself suffered. The bleeding heart is little touched by the sympathy, however genuine, of the one who is yet "outside the veil." We must be able to enter into others' hearts, and then we can strive, ever so tenderly, to pour oil on the wounds and touch the hurt places. It is to prepare us for this sweet privilege that we must first ourselves suffer and be comforted; not until then shall we be able to "comfort them which are in any trouble." How! "By the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God!" "God has a few of us whom he whispers in the ear," says Browning, and only we know how blessed and comforting these softly whispered words are; they are especially for us, our own little secrets with him, not for other ears. When you have once enjoyed this close companionship with God, and have felt the joy of ministering to sad souls, you will be glad to have suffered and grown, though the discipline has been severe indeed. Life is so much broader and richer than before!

THE FALL OF GRANADA.

There is a French account of the transference of the keys of the city which differs in some respects from that commonly believed. It is in substance as follows: "Upon this day (January 2, 1492) every arrangement was perfected for proceeding to the city and taking possession of the Alhambra. It was at that time possible, by passing around to the right of the city from Santa Fe, to reach the fortress by a narrow way, which was rough and steep. Toward evening the king, the queen, and their suite traversed this narrow road. They were followed by an escort of certain nobles of the realm, principal officers of the army, and a considerable body of troops. As they approached the gates of the city which led to the fortress, they met, mounted and accompanied by fifty Moorish cavaliers, the King of Granada himself, Boabdil, who had come out to present to the sovereigns the keys of the fortress. Boabdil, as soon as he saw the queen, dismounted and moved quickly toward her to kiss the hand of the sovereign; whereupon she, gently drawing back her hand, from sympathy for him, declined to receive this humble act of submission. Boabdil then put the keys into the hands of the king as he said to him, 'We surrender to you the city and the realm. Both now belong to you; make use of them with clemency and moderation.'"

Ferdinand took the keys, gave them to the Count of Tenadilla, who had already been designated as Governor of the Alhambra, passed, still mounted, into the court of the fortress. The Castilian flag was immediately raised upon the great tower, which the army, drawn up in the plains, at once caught sight of and saluted with enthusiastic cheering.

Ferdinand, leaving Tenadilla all the guard he could spare, led the queen and the rest back by the same route to the "vega," and returned to Santa Fe to make preparations for his triumphal entry into the city. This entrance was to be made on the evening of January 6th, 1492, by quite another way—through the Gate of Triumph.

Boabdil did not return to the Alhambra; but after a courteous adieu, painful enough to him, passed on to join his wife, mother, and a few faithful followers at a village not far distant, where they were waiting for him. The hill from which he took his last sorrowful look at the beautiful city is still pointed out and named "El ultimo suspiro del Moro—the last sigh of the Moor."

Like his uncle, El Zagal, Boabdil, troubled with remorse and surrounded by enemies on every hand, soon sold out to Isabella all the possessions which were left to him for 80,000 ducats (about $183,200), and retired to Africa, where, at last, thirty-four years after the surrender of Granada, he fell in battle while leading a division of the King of Fez in a civil war.

WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?

The crucial question for each one of us in our every-day life is just this, "What think ye of Christ?" To some the question may seem to require a doctrinal answer, and I do not at all say that there is no idea of doctrines involved in it. But to my mind the doctrinal answer, valuable as it may be, is not the one of most importance for every day. The vital answer is the one that would contain our own personal knowledge of the character of Christ; not what he is doctrinally, but what he is intrinsically, in himself. For, after all, our salvation does not depend on the doctrines concerning Christ, but upon the person of Christ himself, upon what he is and upon what he does. It is Phillips Brooks, I think, who says, "There are two distinct ideas of Christianity. One of them magnifies doctrine, and its great sin is heresy. The other magnifies loyalty, and its great sin is disloyalty. The first enthrones a creed. The second enthrones a person." The first is like a carefully collated botanical manual, the second is like a living and growing plant. A manual may do for a Sunday religion; nothing but life will do for week-days. Christ always says, Believe in me, not, believe this or that about me; but, believe in me.

To "know his name" does not mean to know that he was called Christ or Jesus, but it means to know his character. God's namings always mean character. They are never arbitrary, as our namings are, having no connection with the work or character of the one named. They are always revelations. They tell us what the person is or what he does. "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins;" Jesus meaning a Saviour.

It is of no use for us to call him "Master and Lord," while we are refusing to do the things he commands. Our words may hide our thoughts, but our actions reveal them. If we really think he is our Lord, we will not fail to obey him. It is his thoughts, not his words, that control a man's actions.

No one can possibly have come to know Christ, as he really is, without entering into absolute rest for ever. It is like the rest and peace of the little child in the presence of its mother. The child knows instinctively that its mother will not let anything harm it; therefore it has no fears. And Christians, who know the Lord, know, intelligently that he will not let harm come to them; and therefore they can have no fears either. Where there is a perfect care-taker there can be no cares; where there is an invincible protector there can be no anxieties. What is needed then is for Christians to find out that they have just such a Care-taker and Protector in Christ; and this is why Paul could say, and we can all unite with him, that all things are to be counted as loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ.

But some may ask, "How can I acquire this knowledge? It seems all so vague and mystical to me that I do not know where to begin." To all such I would reply, that there is nothing mystical about it. Begin by making yourself acquainted with him in a common-sense way, as you would with any historical character you wanted to know. Study his life. Ponder on his words and actions. Find out from the Bible what sort of a person he is, and teach yourself to learn of him as being just what the Bible reveals. And then, counting everything else as loss, accept him in his fulness as your all-sufficient portion for every day and every hour of your lives."

A CHIEF'S PROPOSAL.

THE curious custom of the blood covenant prevails at Cisamba in West Africa. Two persons desirous of forming a lifelong friendship, cut open a vein in their arms and allow the blood from one to mingle with that of the other. This is supposed to bring the two into closer brotherhood than the tie of nature. One of the missionaries there is Mr. Currie, whose portrait we published while he was qualifying as a physician last year in Dr. Dowkontt's Medical College in New York. Mr. Currie writes: "A chief who lives about a day's journey from this place, who knew me before I went to New York, has paid me a visit three times since my return, and each time has brought a gift with him. He seems anxious to have me form a 'blood brotherhood' with him. In a mysterious way, and always in private, he inquires whether I love him sufficiently to cut myself with him as we do abroad. I tell him I do not understand exactly what he wants, but he declares I do, and urges me to think of the matter and to talk with my friends. He evidently has the idea of some binding covenant of friendship into which he wishes me to enter with him and seal by the letting of blood."

QUIET CORPSES.

In Bailundi, in West Central Africa, where Mr. Stover is laboring, a strange superstition prevails. One of the men, who though not a church member, is an avowed believer in Christianity, suffered a bereavement in the death of his child and desired that it should have Christian burial. This father also expressed the willingness to conform to the native custom by having a funeral at which the old men should satisfy themselves as to his being the cause of the child's death, by "questioning the corpse." But the old men said: "We don't care to do that, for we have learned that when once these words (the teachings of the missionaries) have been heard, the corpse will not listen to us."

IN HIS IMAGE.

WE who are not of the earth need not be earthly;
 God made our nature like his own—divine;
 Nothing but selfishness can be unworthy
 Of his pure image, meant through us to shine.
 The death of deaths it is, ourselves to smother
 In our own pleasuring his honored gift;
 And life—eternal life—to love each other;
 Our souls with Christ in sacrifice to lift.
 This is the beauty of our new-born morning;
 In Him humanity may now arise
 Out of the grave of self, all baseness scorning;
 The holy radiance of his glorious eyes
 Illumines everywhere uplifted faces;
 Touches the earthly with a heavenly glow;
 And in that blessed light all human graces Unto divine beatitudes must grow.
 —LUCY LARCOM.

JEWISH LONGINGS.

The condition of the Jews in Southern Europe presents a rare opportunity for Christian work. Rev. David Baron who has been traveling in Austria and the Tyrol, writes: "During my six days' stay in Vienna, I spoke to many groups and individual Jews, and met with some interesting cases. Beneath the superficial rationalism of many I found a longing, a vacant place in the heart, which only God in Christ can fill. Some thankfully accepted German New Testaments; Hebrew is known by very few in these parts. Two days I spent in Baden, a fashionable bathing-place near Vienna, with many well-to-do Jews from all parts, who are there for the 'Cur.' A venerable Jew from Roumania seemed to have his heart prepared for the message of God's love. Unlike so many Jews at the present time, he seemed to feel the burden of sin. 'I pray every day,' he said, 'but God does not hear me. I would give half of my possessions to a righteous man who would intercede for me.' A fellow-worker and myself told him of Christ, who is himself the great sacrifice and the great High Priest, who ever liveth to make intercession for us.

"From Baden I went to Pressburg, the ancient capital of Hungary, and a stronghold of modern Judaism. Here is a famous college, at which several hundred Jewish young men study the Talmud and the traditions of men—preparing to be blind leaders of the blind. It was my privilege to tell many of all classes that Jesus Christ is all our salvation and righteousness. From Pressburg I came by Danube steamer to Budapest. Among others on board was a very intelligent Jewish journalist from Vienna, who, with his young wife, was making a tour in the Orient. I gave him, by way of introduction, one of Rabbi Lichtenstein's last pamphlets. After reading the whole aloud to his wife, he came to me, quite enthusiastic about it, saying, 'Oh! it only a few more rabbis in these parts had the courage to speak out in the same manner as this man!' A Jewish author on board, to whom I gave a New Testament, after reading awhile, came to ask me if he might quote from it in a work which he is writing. I told him that this Book is the gift of God to all men, and nobody's private property. He was quite delighted. Although a great Talmudist, a man of nearly sixty, he had never in his life read the New Testament!"

MISS TAYLOR IN THIBET.

News of the arrival in Thibet of Miss Annie Taylor, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on November 8, has been received. Miss Taylor writes: "We are comfortably settled down to study the language, and some of the brethren are able to speak a few words, and to sing 'Jesus loves me,' and other hymns. The Thibetans gave me a hearty welcome when I arrived at the station, especially at Jorebunglow. The teacher of Mrs. McKenzie and myself comes from Mongolia. He lived in Thibet a number of years, and there learned the language, which he speaks very clearly. He seems much interested in the Scriptures, as also is another of the teachers. We have a Thibetan service every Sabbath evening from four to five o'clock, and our time on week days is fully occupied. Will you pray that we may see God's guiding hand leading us forward, so that no mistake may be made. We thank the Lord for supplying all our needs. At first we were a little taken aback in finding that we had customs dues to pay; although we did not reckon on this, the Lord did. We praise him for keeping us in health and strength."

Mr. McKenzie writes: "We are not a bit shaken in our confidence by the attempt made by the Government to stop us. Our Master has all power! Miss Taylor has a very interesting meeting every Sunday afternoon for Thibetans. The attendance is not large as yet, but we feel sure it will increase. It is amusing to be with Miss Taylor going along the streets. If any Thibetans meet her they always salute her, and pass some remarks, while the children cry, 'Annie la, Annie la.'"

A FRIEND'S REPROACH.

A singular interview occurred in a large warehouse in a great city not long ago and one of the two men who talked together relates the circumstance, that others may be warned by it. The two men had been friends from boyhood. One of them went into business and the other went into the ministry. The business man after a time saw less of the minister than formerly. He prospered and was more and more absorbed in his business. The minister settled in another town and the separation caused him to see less than ever of his friend. Many years passed and the two old friends had passed middle life when they met again in the city of their early friendship. "Come and see my new store," said the business man, "and then we will drive out to my home. I have a lovely place in the country." Both properties were examined and admired and the minister congratulated his friend on his prosperity. "I hope," he said, "your soul has prospered too. After all, that is the chief thing." The business man looked at his friend in surprise. "Why," he asked, "did you not say so twenty years ago? I was at a halting place then, and before I launched on a new speculation, that same thought crossed my mind, and I hesitated. I saw you, but you said nothing of the kind then. I firmly believe, had you then and there spoken, and said to me, 'Play the man, take a brave stand,' I should have done it, and conquered. But other voices spoke, and I heard, and there's no standing still, and now I've had my run, and got my desires, but it will all end in that, one day. Now I have a full hand and an empty soul." The minister's face grew pale. "God forgive me," he said, "I meant to have said it." It seemed to him now that his brother's blood cried to him from the ground. But the opportunity had passed beyond recall.

SYRIANS IN CHICAGO.

A large Syrian settlement is to be established in Chicago. There are 10,000 natives of the Holy Land in this country, and an effort is being made by the clergy to make that city their Mecca. The plan is to make a nucleus of the fifteen to eighteen hundred Syrians now in Chicago, induce them to manufacture the unique loom goods of their own country, and start other oriental industries, in which the promoters of the project will try to get the public interested. By a concerted effort, the missionaries at home and abroad hope to bring all together in Chicago, where they can be given lucrative employment, and at the same time receive the combined attention of all the missionaries at home who will initiate them into the wonders of modern civilization, then help them to return to Syria as teachers of the less fortunate. During the Fair there were fully 2,500 Syrians in Chicago. There is a settlement in St. Louis and another in St. Paul.

A Missionary Family.

The Beautiful Story of Lai Soon's Household and its Work for Christ—How he Won his Wife.

THE Rev. Arthur Folsom, a missionary to China, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, giving some interesting incidents connected with the career of Lai Soon, the native convert, whose story was recently published in these columns. Mr. Folsom writes:

"He was the first man to call upon us the morning after reaching Canton. It was a happy surprise to myself and wife, as we stood in the veranda, looking upon the swarm of small boats on the river, to see one of them stop at our landing, and a tall, handsome Chinaman, in long white 'sham'—the teacher's costume—bound up through the yard to greet us in perfect English, and shortly to say: 'Let us sing, Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' himself leading on the organ."

"As he told us his story, we learned that he was one of three Chinese who had been sent by the Canton Mission of the A. B. C. F. M. to America to be educated. All of them had returned as Missionaries to their own country. We were also surprised and pained to learn that they were not employed as Missionaries and that not through any fault of their own; the reason was that there was found, or thought to exist in incompatibility in these three educated and cultivated men—either on one hand to take a place on a social level with the less educated native preachers and helpers, whose wages were eight dollars a month, or, on the other hand, to be placed on a par with the foreign missionaries, whose tastes and health required a much higher salary. Therefore they were advised to go into mercantile or other service of their own choice. One of the three young men was Dr. Wong, who took his medical course in Scotland, and settled in Canton, where he enjoyed largely the patronage of foreigners and natives. The other, Mr. Ah Wing, became a merchant in Shanghai, and was, after a time, joined by Mr. Lai Soon. At the time of the Tien Sien massacre, which occurred, if I remember rightly, in 1870 or 1871, they were invited by the Chinese government to assist in settling the numerous diplomatic difficulties arising among the different foreign governments concerned in the insurrection. After this was accomplished, upon the advice of these helpers, the Chinese government resolved to send three hundred of their most promising youths to the United States to be educated, in divisions of one hundred each in successive years, and our three young men were appointed to have direction and supervision over them. I think the first division was sent in 1872."

"In Mr. Lai Soon's family, as was shown in the picture in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there were three sons and two daughters. Their mother had a history worthy of note. She was a pupil of the first English lady sent as a teacher and missionary to the Chinese—Miss Auldin. She was sent out to Java before the Chinese ports were open for the admission of foreigners. One little girl was so desirous of accompanying her teacher to China after the ports were opened, that she made herself a stowaway in the ship until she was too far away to be sent back. Of course Miss Auldin could not do otherwise than keep her as a pupil, after arriving in Ning-po, China. After her graduation she became the wife of Mr. Lai Soon, who having heard of her, went to Ningpo, and made love to her after a sensible and Christian fashion, quite unlike the heathen custom of buying their wives often 'unsight, unseen.' Mr. Lai Soon was his country's Ambassador to our government. I think during President Hayes' administration. I recollect reading about the presence of Mrs. Lai Soon and her daughters, in Chinese costume, as the centre of admiration at one of the receptions at the White House, and that they were regarded as the peers of any present, in point of education and culture. I also remember of reading of one of the sons, whose name was Elijah, when sophomore in Yale College, as taking the first prize for original English declamation, and when Senior, as being elected Class poet. I regret never having seen any of them since 1864. Their consistent and lovely characters as individuals and as a Christian family secured for them a permanent place in memory and sincere affection.

A CONGO INCIDENT.

"The traders along the west coast of Africa sometimes ask me the question," writes a missionary, "why do you not go for civilization more?" I said to one of these men, I presume that you imagine the work you are doing is a civilizing one? 'Certainly,' was the reply, 'we do far more to civilize the people than any missionary society along the coast.' I then pointed out a steamer that stopped at various ports along the coast, about twenty in all, and the cargo that it landed at every one of those ports included green cases containing gin, rum, muskets and powder. Those are the traders' civilizing agencies. I once gave a poor boy who had been starving, two francs to go and buy some fish with, but he could not purchase the fish until he had first gone to the Trading House to buy gin, and afterwards into the market-place to buy the fish with the gin. He also said that he had been working three years in Bobobo, where the Society's steamer, 'Peace,' and also the new steamer 'Goodwill,' lay. He said that when the 'Goodwill' was put together, the piston was the only part that went amissing, but this had, however, been replaced by one made on the spot, which was constructed by what the traders called a poor, uncivilized African."

TATNE ON CHRISTIANITY.

Although Taine was a deeply learned man, he was very meek in spirit and often read the Bible in his family circle. According to his wish Rev. Holland officiated at his funeral. In all his writings Taine professed the highest respect for Christianity. In our days many think it shows a great and free mind, when a person speaks contemptuously of God and his word. It will therefore not be superfluous to hear what Taine said of the worth of Christianity. His observations are based on history.

"To-day, after eighteen hundred years," he says in an article, "The Gospel has the same effect in both continents of the globe as it had in Palestine. In the place of self-love it puts love for our fellow-men. Neither in substance nor in practice has it changed: in its Greek, Catholic or Protestant shape it is still for more than four hundred millions of people, the great wings with which man lifts himself above this world. Through patience and hope man becomes content with his lot. Wherever these great wings have been injured during the last eighteen hundred years the morals of public and private life have disappeared. No philosophy, no art, no government, no law can effect what Christianity has done for the world. The old Gospel is to-day the best means of culture for all classes."

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aural Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE
AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.
Discovered by Accident.—In Comprossing, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SURROUNDED BY ELECTROLYTIC. Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. 077 Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (Ask your merchant your country and this address.) * "THE FOURTH" AT MONT LAWN. *

Our Young Folks Have a Merry Time on the National Holiday—Song, Festival and Illumination at "The Christian Herald" Children's Home.

EVERY American boy and girl hails with delight the return of the "Glorious Fourth," and to the happy little guests at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack on the Hudson it was an occasion of very special jubilation. For a week in advance, preparations had been going on at Home for the suitable celebration of the day. Those who were there during the preceding week, and whose ten-day sojourn expired just before the holiday, were loth to leave, but their places were the trees overhead or carolled in the bushes on the hillside a melodious welcome to the great day, and the hearts and voices of our children responded in unison. Visions of a feast of unheard-of dainties, and hints of a patriotic display of fireworks that would dazzle the beholders, were discussed in whispers. In the forenoon, the young folks had their usual romp on the lawn, and when the dinner-bell sounded, they sat down with happy faces and sharpened appetites to tables that were laden with good things. In the afternoon the lawn was strung with Chinese lanterns. At five o'clock, the entire party of children, together with the Superintendent, the missionaries, and a number of guests, assembled around the Liberty-pole, atop of which floated the old flag, and the stirring strains of "Hail Columbia" and "My Country, 'tis of Thee," awoke the echoes across the deepen along the hillside. Ice cream and cake were served to the children at supper at 7 o'clock, the guests also being invited to the table, and a few short talks, suited to the patriotic character of the day, followed. These the children greatly appreciated; indeed the genuine ardor of the young folks over the "glorious Fourth" was far more marked than that of their elders, and any patriotic reference was greeted with lusty shouts of enthusiasm. But they were impatient for the fireworks, and when they finally trooped out on the lawn once more and saw the entire front alight with brilliant-hued Chinese lanterns, their delight was irrepressible. Then came the pyrotechnic show. Red, blue and green lights were set off, brilliantly illuminating the hillside, the valley below, and even lighting up the Hudson. Roman candles shot their balls of fire skywards, rockets mounted far over the tree-tops to burst in mid-air into a thousand vari-colored fragments, fire-wheels sputtered and circled on their wooden perches at a safe distance, mines shot a shower of fiery balls upward, turning the darkness into daylight, and the "whistling boys" number of spectators were attracted from the near neighborhood, and joined the gathering. The illumination was visible for miles, and many people on boats and in trains along the Hudson enjoyed the sight. But all things have an end, and when the last spark of powder had been exploded, our children, standing under the light of the lanterns, sang a closing hymn and then went inside for the night, one and all declaring they had spent the merriest Fourth they had ever known. The day passed without a single accident to mar its perfect enjoyment. Long before 10 p. m. the dormitories at Mont Lawn were full and our tired young patriots were sound asleep.

A lady, who has taken a deep interest in our children at Mont Lawn, has written these verses for the little ones to be sung to the tune of "Greenland's Icy Mountains":

HYMN OF THANKS.

We thank Thee, Heavenly Father,
For this dear Summer Home;
Its teachings and its pleasures,
Will go where e'er we roam.
We never will forget Thee,
But strive to do Thy will.

THE FOURTH OF JULY DINNER, AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" CHILDRENS' HOME, NYACK-ON-THE-HUDSON, N. Y.

needed for new arrivals. The lucky ones who were to stay over the holiday, full of the knowledge of what was going on, told the fresh arrivals of the preparations, and the whole hundred and odd youngsters were in a tumult of excitement.

The morning of the Fourth dawned at last, and the little community at Mont Lawn was early astir. Birds chirruped in woodlands far and near. A pretty phase of the celebration was the reciting of several patriotic pieces by some of the children, who spoke very cleverly and did credit to their coaching. Between songs and recitations there was a fusillade of firecrackers.

But the principal features of the celebration were reserved for the evening hours, when the twilight shadows had begun to screamed like locomotives as they darted off the stick with a resounding report, and were lost in the darkness down-hill. Every new piece was greeted with a chorus of "ahs!" and "ohs!" and such exclamations as "My! wasn't it just splendid!" "See it go up! See, see!" as some particularly bright rocket soared cloudward.

As the display proceeded, a considerable

THE RUSTIC IN THE PALACE.

Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Gen. 45: 28, "I will go and see him before I die."

JACOB had long since passed the hundred year mile-stone. In those times people were distinguished for longevity. In the centuries afterward persons lived to great age.

Galen, the most celebrated physician of his time, took so little of his own medicine that he lived to one hundred and forty years. A man of undoubted veracity on the witness-stand in England swore that he remembered an event one hundred and fifty years before. Lord Bacon speaks of a countess who had cut three sets of teeth, and died at one hundred and forty years. Joseph Crele, of Pennsylvania, lived one hundred and forty years. In 1857 a book was printed containing the names of thirty-seven persons who lived one hundred and forty years, and the names of eleven persons who lived one hundred and fifty years.

Among the grand old people of whom we have record was Jacob, the shepherd of the text. But he had a bad lot of boys. They were jealous and ambitious and every way unprincipled. Joseph, however, seemed to be an exception; but he had been gone many years, and the probability was that he was dead. As sometimes now in a house you will find kept at the table a vacant chair, a plate, a knife, a fork, for some deceased member of the family, so Jacob kept in his heart a place for his beloved Joseph. There sits the old man, the flock of one hundred and forty years in their flight having alighted long enough to leave the marks of their claw on forehead and cheek and temple. His long beard snows down over his chest. His eyes are somewhat dim, and he can see farther when they are closed than when they are open, for he can see clear back into the time when beautiful Rachel, his wife, was living, and his children shook the Oriental abode with their merriment.

The centenarian is sitting dreaming over the past when he hears a wagon rumbling to the front door. He gets up and goes to the door to see who has arrived, and his long-absent sons from Egypt come in and announce to him that Joseph instead of being dead is living in an Egyptian palace, with all the investiture of prime minister, next to the king in the mightiest empire of all the world! The news was too sudden and too glad for the old man, and his cheeks whiten, and he has a dazed look, and his staff falls out of his hand, and he would have dropped had not the sons caught him and led him to a lounge and put cold water on his face, and fanned him a little.

In that half delirium the old man mumbles something about his son Joseph. He says: "You don't mean Joseph, do you? my dear son who has been dead so long. You don't mean Joseph, do you?" But after they had fully resuscitated him, and the news was confirmed, the tears begin their winding way down the crossroads of the wrinkles, and the sunken lips of the old man quiver, and he brings his bent fingers together as he says: "Joseph is yet alive. I will go and see him before I die."

It did not take the old man a great while to get ready, I warrant you. He put on the best clothes that the shepherd's wardrobe could afford. He got into the wagon, and though the aged are cautious and like to ride slow, the wagon did not get along fast enough for this old man; and when the wagon with the old man met Joseph's chariot coming down to meet him, and Joseph got out of the chariot and got into the wagon and threw his arms around his father's neck, it was an antithesis of royalty and rusticity, of simplicity and pomp, of filial affection and paternal love, which leaves us so much in doubt about whether we had better laugh or cry, that we do both. So Jacob kept the resolution of the text—"I will go and see him before I die."

What a strong and unflinching thing is parental attachment! Was it not almost time for Jacob to forget Joseph? The hot suns of many summers had blazed on the heath; the river Nile had overflowed and receded, overflowed and receded again and again; the seed had been sown and the harvest reaped; stars rose and set; years of plenty and years of famine had passed on; but the love of Jacob for Joseph in my text is overwhelmingly dramatic. Oh, that is a cord that is not snapped, though pulled on by many decades! Though when the little child expired the parents may not have been more than twenty-five years of age, and now they are seventy-five, yet the vision of the cradle, and the childish face, and the first utterances of the infantile lips are fresh to-day, in spite of the passage of a half century. Joseph was as fresh in Jacob's memory as ever, though at seventeen years of age the boy had disappeared from the old homestead. I found in our family record the story of an infant that had died fifty years before, and I said to my parents: "What is this record, and what does it mean?" Their chief answer was a long, deep sigh. It was yet to them a very tender sorrow. What does that all mean? Why, it means our children departed are ours yet, and that cord of attachment reaching across the years will hold us until it brings us together in the palace, as Jacob and Joseph were brought together. That is one thing that makes old people die happy. They realize it is reunion with those from whom they have long been separated.

I am often asked as pastor—and every pastor is asked the question—"Will my children be children in heaven and forever children?" Well, there was no doubt a great change in Joseph from the time Jacob lost him and the time when Jacob found him—between the boy seventeen years of age and the man in mid-life, his forehead developed with the great business of state; but Jacob was glad to get back Joseph anyhow, and it did not make much difference to the old man whether the boy looked older or looked younger. And it will be enough joy for that parent if he can get back that son, that daughter, at the gate of heaven, whether the departed loved one shall come a cherub or in full-grown angelhood. There must be a change wrought by that celestial climate and by those supernal years, but it will only be from loveliness to more loveliness, and from health to more radiant health. O parent, as you think of the darling panting and white in membraneous croup, I want you to know it will be gloriously bettered in that land where there has never been a death and where all the inhabitants will live on in the great future as long as God! Joseph was Joseph notwithstanding the palace, and your child will be your child notwithstanding all the raining splendors of everlasting noon. What a thrilling visit was that of the old shepherd to the prime-minister Joseph! I see the old countryman seated in the palace looking around at the mirrors and the tountains and the carved pillars, and oh! how he wishes that Rachel, his wife, was alive and she could have come there with him to see their son in his great house. "Oh," says the old man within himself, "I do wish Rachel could be here to see all this!" I visited at the farm-house of the father of Millard Fillmore when the son was President of the United States, and the octogenarian farmer entertained me until eleven o'clock at night telling me what great things he saw in his son's house at Washington, and what Daniel Webster said to him, and how grandly Millard treated his father in the White House. The old man's face was illumined with the story until almost the midnight. He had just been visiting his son at the Capitol. And I suppose it was something of the same joy that thrilled the heart of the old shepherd as he stood in the palace of the prime-minister. It is a great day with you when your old parents come to visit you. Your little children stand around with great wide-open eyes. The parents cannot stay many days, for they are a little restless, and especially at nightfall, because they sleep better in their own bed; but while they tarry you somehow feel there is a benediction in every room in the house. They are a little feeble, and you make it as easy as you can for them, and you realize they will probably not visit you very often—perhaps never again. You go to their room after they have retired at night to see if the lights are properly put out, for the old people understand candle and lamp better than the modern apparatus for illumination. In the morning, with real interest in their health, you ask them how they rested last night. Joseph, in the historical scene of the text, did not think any more of his father than you do of your parents. The probability is, before they leave your house they half spoil your children with kindness. Grandfather and grandmother are more lenient and indulgent to your children than they ever were with you. And what wonders of revelation in the bombazine pocket of the one and the sleeve of the other! Blessed is that home where Christian parents come to visit! Whatever may have been the style of the architecture when they came, it is a palace before they leave. If they visit you fifty times, the two most memorable visits will be the first and the last. Those two pictures will hang in the hall of your memory while memory lasts, and you will remember just how they looked, and where they sat, and what they said, and at what figure of the carpet, and at what door sill they parted with you, giving you the final good-by. Do not be embarrassed if your father come to town and he have the manners of the shepherd, and if your mother come to town and there be in her hat no sign of costly millinery. The wife of the Emperor Theodosius said a wise thing when she said: "Husbands, remember what you lately were, and remember what you are, and be thankful."

By this time you all notice what kindly provision Joseph made for his father Jacob. Joseph did not say: "I can't have the old man around this place. How clumsy he would look climbing up these marble stairs, and walking over these mosaics! Then he would be putting his hands upon some of these frescoes. People would wonder where that old greenhorn came from. He would shock all the Egyptian court with his manners at table. Besides that, he might get sick on my hands, and he might be querulous, and he might talk to me as though I were only a boy, when I am the second man in all the realm. Of course, he must not suffer, and if there is famine in his country—and I hear there is—I will send him some provisions; but I can't take a man from Padanaram and introduce him into this polite Egyptian court. What a nuisance it is to have poor relations!"

Joseph did not say that, but he rushed out to meet his father with perfect abandon of affection, and brought him up to the palace, and introduced him to the emperor, and provided for all the rest of the father's days, and nothing was too good for the old man while living; and when he was dead, Joseph, with military escort, took his father's remains to the family cemetery. Would God all children were as kind to their parents.

If the father have large property, and he be wise enough to keep it in his own name, he will be respected by the heirs; but how often it is when the son finds his father in famine, as Joseph found Jacob in famine, the young people make it very hard for the old man. They are so surprised he eats with a knife instead of a fork. They are chagrined at his antediluvian habits. They are provoked because he cannot hear as well as he used to, and when he asks it over again, and the son has to repeat it, he bawls in the old man's ear: "I hope you hear that!" How long he must wear the old coat or the old hat before they get him a new one! How chagrined they are at his independence of the English grammar! How long he hangs on! Seventy years and not gone yet! Seventy-five years and not gone yet! Eighty years and not gone yet! Will he ever go? They think it of no use to have a doctor in his last sickness, and go up to the drug store and get a dose of something that makes him worse, and economize on a coffin, and beat the undertaker down to the last point, giving a note for the reduced amount, which they never pay. I have officiated at obsequies of aged people where the family have been so inordinately resigned to Providence that I felt like taking my text from Proverbs: "The eye that mocketh at its father, and refuseth to obey its mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." In other words, such an ingrate ought to have a flock of crows for pall-bearers! I congratulate you if you have the honor of providing for aged parents. The blessing of the Lord God of Joseph and Jacob will be on you.

I rejoice to remember that though my father lived in a plain house the most of his days, he died in a mansion provided by the filial piety of a son who had achieved a fortune. There the octogenarian sat, and the servants waited on him, and there were plenty of horses and plenty of carriages to convey him, and a bower in which to sit on long summer afternoons, dreaming over the past; and there was not a room in the house where he was not welcome, and there were musical instruments of all sorts to regale him; and when life had passed, the neighbors came out and expressed all honor possible and carried him to the village Machpelah, and put him down beside the Rachel with whom he had lived more than half a century. Share your successes with the old people. The probability is that the principles they inculcated achieved your fortune. Give them a Christian percentage of kindly consideration. Let Joseph divide with Jacob the pasture fields of Goshen and the glories of the Egyptian court.

And here I would like to sing the praises of the sisterhood who remain unmarried that they might administer to aged parents. The brutal world calls these self-sacrificing ones peculiar or angular; but if you had had as many annoyances as they have had, Xantippe would have been an angel compared to you. It is easier to take care of five rollicking, romping children, than of one childish old man. Among the best women are those who allowed the bloom of life to pass away while they were caring for their parents. While other maidens were sound asleep, they were soaking the old man's feet, or tucking up the covers around the invalid mother. While other maidens were in the cotillion, they were dancing attendance upon rheumatism, and spreading plasters for the lame back of the septuagenarian, and heating catnip tea for insomnia.

In almost every circle of our kindred there has been some queen of self-sacrifice to whom jewelled hand after jewelled hand was offered in marriage, but who stayed on the old place because of the sense of filial obligation, until the health was gone and the attractiveness of personal presence had vanished. Brutal society may call such a one by a nickname. God calls her daughter, and heaven calls her saint, and I call her domestic martyr.

As if to disgust us with unfilial conduct, the Bible presents us the story of Micah, who stole the eleven hundred shekels from his mother, and the story of Absalom, who tried to dethrone his father. But all history is beautiful with stories of filial fidelity. Epaminondas, the warrior, found his chief delight in reciting to his parents his victories. "There goes Aeneas from burning Troy, on his shoulders Anchises, his father." The Athenians punished with death any unfilial conduct. There goes beautiful Ruth escorting venerable Naomi across the desert amid the howling of the wolves and the barking of the jackals. Jacob kept his resolution, "I will go and see him before I die," and a little while after we find them walking the tessellated floor of the palace, Jacob and Joseph, the prime-minister proud of the shepherd.

I may say in regard to the most of you that your parents have probably visited you for the last time, or will soon pay you such a visit, and I have wondered if they will ever visit you in the King's palace. "Oh," you say, "I am in the pit of sin!" Joseph was in the pit. "Oh," you say, "I am in the prison of mine iniquity!" Joseph was once in prison. "Oh," you say, "I didn't have a fair chance; I was denied maternal kindness!" Joseph was denied maternal attendance. "Oh," you say, "I am far away from the land of my nativity!" Joseph was far from home. "Oh," you say, "I have been betrayed and exasperated!" Did not Joseph's brethren sell him to a passing Ishmaelitic caravan? Yet God brought him to that emblazoned residence; and if you will trust his grace in Jesus Christ, you, too, will be empalaced.

But oh, how changed the old folks will be! Their cheek smoothed into the flesh of a little child. Their stooped posture lifted into immortal symmetry. Their foot now so feeble, then with the sprightliness of a bounding roe, as they shall say to you: "A spirit passed this way from earth and told us that you were wayward and dissipated after, we left the world; but by God's grace you have repented, our prayer has been answered, and you are here; and as we used to visit you on earth before we died, now we visit you in your new home after our ascension." And father will say, "Mother, don't you see Joseph is yet alive?" and mother will say, "Yes, father, Joseph is yet alive."

And then they will talk over their earthly anxieties in regard to you, and the midnight supplications in your behalf, and they will recite to each other the old Scripture passage with which they used to cheer their staggering faith: "I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee." Oh, the palace, the palace, the palace! That is what Richard Baxter called "The Saints Everlasting Rest." That is what John Bunyan called the "Celestial City." That is Young's "Night Thoughts" turned into morning exultations. That is Gray's "Elegy in a Churchyard" turned to resurrection spectacle. That is the "Cotter's Saturday Night" exchanged for the Cotter's Sabbath morning. That is the shepherd of Salisbury Plains amid the flocks on the hills of heaven. That is the famine-struck Padan-aram turned into the rich pasture fields of Goshen. That is Jacob visiting Joseph at the emerald castle

THE MOODY GOSPEL FUND.

Preparations for a Munificent Offering—What the Institute has Done and is Doing—The Great Drill Camp of the Lord's Army—Hosts Waiting for Equipment.

OUR readers will rejoice to learn that the Moody Gospel Fund promises to attain larger proportions than, in these times of commercial depression, could have been reasonably anticipated. It is not alone in the money already contributed, but in the facts reported, that there is ground for congratulation. Mr. Moody's appeal has struck a sympathetic chord in thousands of hearts, and it has set people to work with enthusiasm. It is not surprising therefore that when he says "help me to send out bearers of the glad tidings," a prompt response should come from men and women who are moved by gratitude to him and love for souls. So we expect to hear from cities and villages, from churches and missions, from Christian Endeavor Societies, Baptist Unions, Epworth Leagues and Young Men's Christian Associations, that some

We give below extracts from a few of the letters received during the week:

Subscriber, Fairhaven, Vt., ($1): "I wish I could send a thousand: may God prosper the work abundantly is my constant prayer." "In the Master's Name," is the dedication with which a King's Daughter, Concord, N. H., sends her gift, ($1). "May the Lord bless this little offering ($2), to the salvation of souls. Since it is not my privilege to go out and labor in the cause, will not He accept the sacrifice of prayer and money instead?" writes M. E. H., Norwalk, Conn. Adam Peck, Lambert Point, Norfolk, Va. ($5), says: "I want to contribute my mite to help Mr. Moody in his great work." In the same spirit, James Lloyd, New Kensington, Pa. ($1), writes: "To assist in training up a class of efficient workers to carry the Gospel to those that do not feel inclined to

to church, so the Gospel must be carried to them. I hope God will accept my gift from a heart overflowing with love for him. May his blessing rest on your endeavor to raise fallen humanity."

Very touching, indeed, is a letter from L. G., which conveys a gift doubly consecrated. "Enclosed find $20 draft for your work," it says, "also a five dollar bill which we lately found where our mother (now dead over 13 years), must have placed it." "Please accept enclosed ($2) from one who writes and prays 'thy kingdom come,'" reaches us from Lansing, Ia. "I have read with much interest your most excellent article: 'Save the Churchless Millions,'" writes Mr. H. Kenner of Philadelphia. "Thankful that you have laid the matter so plainly before the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, thus affording them the privilege of aiding this great and good evangelist in his wonderful work. May God bless this movement and may it be successful in accomplishing much good. You shall have my prayers."

Many of the letters containing contributions are either unsigned or signed with simple initials. Mrs. A. P. D., Binghamton, N. Y. ($1), says: "With a fervent prayer for God's richest blessing on the labors of his honored servant, Dwight L. Moody." "Dedicated" (no name), sends soc. and writes: "I had been asking God what I should do to help him and I feel this is the sacrifice he calls me for." Similar anonymous contributions have been received from friends in Pittsboro, N. C., Brooklyn, N. Y., Hastings, Minn., Warren, Pa., and other places.

Grandly encouraging is the letter of Mrs. J. A. Minor of Columbus, O. ($100): "I take it as a great privilege," she explains, "to give a little toward that grand worker—I am glad to have the opportunity. I am also glad that again THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is called upon to take the lead in another benevolent work for the good of humanity. The Lord ever bless it."

THE CHICAGO AVENUE CHURCH, THE HALL OF THE BIBLE INSTITUTE.

grateful, earnest soul has presented this opportunity for service and has elicited a liberal response.

Few know how valuable is the work that the great evangelist is doing in the Institute, the privileges of which he wants to open to the crowd of eager applicants. "My purpose," he writes, "is to raise up men and women who will be willing to lay their lives alongside the laboring classes and bring the Gospel to bear on their lives." Preparation is sought by hundreds and the number is now growing to thousands. Shall their petition be granted? It depends largely on the response to Mr. Moody's appeal. The Lord needs the soldiers; the recruits are offering themselves; the men qualified to train them are ready; shall the work halt because there is no money for equipment? We will not believe it. The Lord, who has called the men to his service, will incline the hearts of his people to provide the means. All honor to those who help, by great or small gifts, in this work. God will reward them with his blessing and throughout eternity their joy will be intensified by the fellowship of glorified spirits who first heard the word of life from lips, which, but for their help, might have been silent. This privilege is offered to all. Let the gifts be sent without delay that precious time may not be lost. All contributions should be sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and they will be acknowledged in our columns and sent to Mr. Moody.

come to the Church and hear it." Mrs. Morris, Aubrey, — ($1): "It is the 'widow's mite.' How I do wish it were $100, instead of one hundred cents." Mrs. N. A. Mason, Normal, Ill. ($1): "I wish it were more, but my motto is, to 'sow beside all waters.'" R. M. Brand, New Frankford ave., Philadelphia ($1), writes: "I am sorry I cannot do more at present; but the beloved brother and all the workers in the vineyard have my prayers to the Almighty God that their efforts may be crowned with success." Dr. J. B. Burnett, Newark, N. J. ($5): "I wish sincerely it might be $5,000. May Almighty God speed and bless the glorious work!" "May God assist," is the fervent prayer that accompanies the contribution ($5), of J. W. Shaw, Yorktown, Va. W. Elliott, East Pepperell, Mass. ($10), devoutly and encouragingly closes his letter with "God will bless you and all workers in his vineyard."

Other letters contain expressions that show how much the writers have the cause at heart. "The Lord our Helper," writes Mr. T. C. Collins, of Florence, Cal., ($1.50) and he adds, "Let all help a little." "Apply this ($5) to the Fund, with best wishes and prayers for its success," writes B., of Welsh, La. Mrs. Rebecca Fletcher, of Fletcher, Ont., ($3) says: "The class of people which you are now, by the blessing of God, trying to lift up, have been neglected by the churches, and as you have said in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, they will not go

FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

S.S. Lesson for July 22. Matt. 2: 13-23. Golden Text, Ps. 121: 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lord shall preserve [keep, R.V.] thy going out, and thy coming in from this time forth even for evermore." (Ps. 121: 8.) Such is God's eternal promise, in his eternal Word, to him whose help cometh from the Lord, who made heaven and earth; whose keeper, the Lord himself, shall neither slumber nor sleep." Such a man is indeed blessed, and such a man was Joseph, the husband of Mary, who was the mother of the Lord Jesus. In Joseph a humble, reverent man of God, the Lord had provided a needful protector for Mary, and for her Holy Child, and a high honor was conferred upon this man by the position to which God called him. We cannot compare the special vocation to which God may call us individually; each has its special privilege, each its special trials; each needs its special education. It is not for us to say that one vocation is greater or more honorable than another. The wise men had departed into their own country, and a message from heaven was sent by a dream to Joseph. The angel of the Lord appeared to him, saying: "Arise, and take the young Child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word." Joseph was a poor man; it meant probably, the breaking up of his business in Nazareth; and of his humble little household, without having so much as the opportunity to go back and make arrangements—in fact the blighting of all his worldly prospects. It was for this man. The journey, too, was a long one, how should he obtain food? and then how should he find work when he got down into Egypt? All these practical questions had to be faced. But over against them, there was the clear, undoubted, unmistakable will of God. God was the God of his father Abraham, who had come out from his country and his kindred, and his father's house, and God had not deceived, nor abandoned his servant who had trusted in him. God was the God of Moses, who had provided for the whole people of Israel in the wilderness; could and would Joseph also trust him, now that he knew distinctly that it was his will for him to go with his little family down into Egypt? God's message came to him at night. Oh, how tender is our God, he knows so well the right time to speak to his children. A working man may be too occupied in the day to be able easily to consider an important matter. Joseph had the quiet night time to arrange his matters with God. Oh, how, during that night, the importance of his vocation, as the chosen protector of Mary and the Child Jesus, must have intensified in his mind, and how small, in comparison, must all the prospects of earth have looked! But do we realize how much we owe, under God, to the faithfulness of this man; and do we learn our lesson, to let the high calling of our God to us take precedence of every other consideration?

When he arose, he took the young Child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt." A few words, so read, and yet how much of faith in God, how much of endurance of self-denial and of faithfulness to his vocation is implied in them? Who among his friends or business connection would understand the action of Joseph? He could not publish his reasons for it: he was acting according to a hidden leading of God; sure indeed, but reserved for him alone. He knew something of "the secret of the Lord" which is with them that fear him. Joseph departed into Egypt and was there until the death of Herod:

That It Might Be Fulfilled

which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying: "Out of Egypt have I called my Son." (Hos. 11: 1.) Who would have discovered, had not the Holy Ghost thus revealed it in the Word, that this passage in Hosea referred to the Messiah? "When Israel was a child then I loved him and called my Son out of Egypt?" Anyone looking at the passage, simply intellectually would say that only Israel as a people was referred to by the prophet and that it could only mean the calling of Israel, his people out of Egypt. But the word of God is like a mine, in which vein after vein of interpretation of the same passage is struck by the Holy Spirit, the true Exponent of Scripture. We are dependent on him to lead us into all truth, to take of Christ and show unto us, and it is shortsighted ignorance to think that we have ever exhausted the meaning of any passage in God's Word. The more he teaches us of this holy Book, the more we see how much there is left for us yet to learn; it is ever "line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little."

While the holy family remained in Egypt, under the special protection of God, Herod showed himself in his true colors, he had said to the wise men: "When ye have found the young child, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also." But no such intention was in the king's heart, thoughts of murder, and not of worship were possessing him. "Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth." He thought to have an easy conquest of the new born Messiah, but the only clue he had to his whereabouts was through the wise men, and they had failed him. He was bent on destroying him whom he looked on as a possible usurper of his throne, and, at any cost, he would accomplish his purpose. The sacrifice of human life was nothing in the eyes of this wretched tyrant, and he conceived and carried out a destruction on such a scale, that it has taken its place in history as one of the most revolting acts of brutality and cruelty which the world has ever witnessed. He "sent forth and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men," and Herod thought he had gained his end. "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, In Ramah was there a voice heard lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children and would not be comforted, because they are not," and again, it is only the Holy Spirit Inspirer of the Word of God, who could have taught that this prophecy of Jer. 31: 15 could refer to the slaughter of the little ones in Bethlehem; for the prophecy goes on to speak of Rachel's children coming again to their own border, meaning distinctly the return of the children of Israel to their own land. But Herod did not know

Whom He Was Contending With

he had left a mark of infancy upon his own name, he had spread anguish and roused the deepest indignation in the hearts of his people; but his purpose to destroy the infant King of the Jews was no nearer its accomplishment. He did not know the might of him with whom he was contending, how the very nations before him are as nothing "and how much more should the kings of those nations be as nothing, and counted to him less than nothing and vanity? Herod's unenlightened eyes did not see that "it is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers . . . that bringeth the princes to nothing; he maketh the judges of the earth vanity." (Isa. 40: 17, 22, 23.) Miserable, deluded man, he fought with God, and in the very spirit of the future Antichrist, he set himself and took counsel against the Lord and against his anointed. (Ps. 2: 2.) Meanwhile the Scripture was being accomplished and the thoughts and purposes of God were developing. Herod died, and happy was the earth to be rid of such a tyrant; but his soul, his future? Oh, how unspeakably terrible must be the doom of such a man! But "when Herod was dead, behold the angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph in Egypt, saying: Arise, and take the young child and his mother and go into the land of Israel; for they are dead which sought the young child's life." Another move. But a man of God, who is at his disposal, has nothing to do with likes and dislikes, convenience or inconvenience, when the will of God is once made known to him. "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit which are his." (1 Cor. 6: 19, 20), is either a truth of God which has conquered us, and finds us ready to his will without question; or it is a truth to which we have never yielded ourselves.

THE FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

IF, as is probable, Joseph contemplated making Bethlehem his permanent residence, he speedily abandoned the purpose. Herod's hostility, and his dread of the divine child made it a place of peculiar danger. It, as is generally believed, Jesus was born in December, it could not have been much later than the following February, when Jesus was eight weeks old, that Joseph received warning of an impending attempt on the part of Herod to kill the Child. The warning came in a dream; and night as it was, Joseph rose and carried Mary and Jesus away. He set out for Egypt, that being the land nearest to Bethlehem that was outside the sphere of Herod's power. It was three hundred miles away and the journey probably occupied two weeks. Tradition says that the fugitives settled at Montariyeh, near Heliopolis, on the way to Cairo. They remained in Egypt not more than two or three months. During that time Herod, resolute in his enmity, gave the cruel command to kill every male child in Bethlehem under the age of two years. That limit of age would be determined for him by the time at which the wise men reported having seen the star. As the population of Bethlehem was about two thousand, probably the number slain would be from ten to twenty. Herod died shortly afterward, on April 1st. Joseph, on hearing the news, returned immediately. He seems to have started before the succession to the throne was finally determined, and to have heard only on reaching Judaea that Augustus Caesar had confirmed Herod's will by making his son Archelaus, king of that land. Knowing him to be a man as unscrupulous and cruel as his father, Joseph turned aside, skirted the sea coast and made his way to Galilee, the northern part of Palestine, which was separated from Judaea by the country of Samaria. In the general re-arrangement of government under Herod's will the country of Galilee fell to Antipater as Tetrarch, or Governor. Galilee was Joseph's own country and he settled in his own town of Nazareth. That he avoided doing so at the birth of Christ, was doubtless due to a very natural impression that one who had been hailed as the King of the Jews, the Son of David, should be brought up in David's own city. There was besides an odium attaching to Nazareth, for some cause that is not recorded. Nathanael who came from the neighboring town of Cana knew of it and referred to it. (John 1: 46.) Joseph would be sure to know of it, too, and might be anxious that Jesus should not be affected by it. But, in his difficulty about Bethlehem, his thoughts naturally turned to his own town.

Be thou there until I bring thee word. Some of the most affecting incidents on record are those of men who have remained faithful to death at some post where they have been placed, and have died rather than desert it. A remarkable story of similar fidelity is told by Phil. Robinson of an elephant in India. He was a fine animal and he carried the standard in a famous battle. At the beginning of the fight the elephant lost the mahout, his master. The mahout had just given the word to halt when the fatal bullet silenced him forever. The elephant obeying him stopped short. The battle raged hotly around him, but he would not budge. It passed on beyond him, but he would not advance. The voice he was accustomed to obey had bade him stand, and he would obey no other. The soldiery swept on in pursuit of the flying foe, but the elephant, like a rock, stood there with the dead and dying around and the ensign waving in its place. For three days and nights he stood where his master commanded him to halt. No bribe or threat could move him. At last they sent to a village a hundred miles away for the mahout's little son. The mahout had trained the boy, who was about ten years old, to give the word of command, and the elephant had seemed to understand that the child was his master's son. No sooner did the child speak, than immediately the huge animal turned, and with its bullet-torn trappings clinging as he went, paced slowly and majestically away.

Arise and go. During his campaigns in India the Duke of Wellington saw much of Hinduism and heathenism. On his return to England he was present when a clergyman was stating the then common opinion that missions to the heathen were a waste of men and money. The Duke listened with surprise. Another clergyman present spoke in favor of foreign missions and an argument ensued between the two. Finally the matter was referred to the Duke who was asked to say whether in his opinion from his own observation of the natives any success could be expected from the preaching of the Gospel to them. "Success!" exclaimed the famous general. "What have you to do with success? All that you have to do is to obey your marching orders. What are your marching orders? 'Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.' You are not responsible for success, but for doing your duty."

Being warned . . . he turned aside. Sometimes men are turned aside for their safety, without being warned, and that by an apparent accident. Augustine was going to preach in a distant town and engaged a guide to show him the way. The guide was inexperienced and mistaking one of the landmarks took the great divine along a by-path which indeed led them to the town, but by a circuitous route many miles longer than the highway. Augustine was angry at the man for wasting his time and strength and reproached him as severely as so good a man ever reproached anyone. But later, he discovered that he had reason for gratitude instead of regrets. A band of his enemies, the Donatists, had sworn to take his life and hearing that he was to preach in that town and concluding that he would surely travel by the highway had concealed themselves in ambush that they might murder him as he passed. Had he not been turned aside in the providence of God, his life would have been sacrificed.

Sent and slew the children. That is what the great enemy of souls tries to do and in more cruel fashion than Herod did. He slays their souls. Lord Shaftesbury, who labored hard to reform the criminals of London and who had a wide experience of law-breakers gave it as his opinion that of all the jailbirds in London not more than one in a hundred had lived an honest life up to the age of twenty. Almost every criminal with whom he had talked admitted that he had entered upon his career of crime between the ages of eight and sixteen. The sacrifice of the children is thus infinitely more appalling than that pathetic story in the Greek legends of the monster Minotaur who lived in the great labyrinth. It was said that Athens had at stated intervals to send a tribute of seven youths and seven maidens into the labyrinth to be devoured by the monster and that every time there was bitter weeping as the tribute went never to return. But once, Theseus, the son of the king, offered to be one of the seven youths and he went into the labyrinth and slew the monster. It is sad to think that although the enemy of our race has been overcome by the Son of the King of kings he still receives his tribute of children who are not compelled to become his prey but go to him voluntarily and too often after being warned.

"The Mount Called Olivet."

Our Traveler Ascends its Summit—A Stubborn Royal Equine—Sad Gethsemane—"The Breath of His Presence."

It is still made conspicuous among the mountain roads about Jerusalem by the olive groves clothing the sides and summit. In spring-time, the apparently barren reaches which are unshaded by trees will be mantled with verdure and flowers. In late autumn, and in the winter, the mighty slopes are a study in neutral tints, the silvery gray of the olives contrasting but faintly with the darker uniformity of color in soil and stones.

If we would ascend to the church and convent built upon the crown of the long hill, we must walk or ride. Driving in any kind of vehicle is out of the question. This has been set fairly before us, but we sallied forth from the Jaffa gate, with an inadequate conception of what lies before us on this bland December afternoon. Massoud, refreshed by a couple of days in the stable, curvets and prances ahead of the two donkeys ridden by David and his charge. Jamal's is a brisk brown beast, with an amiable, conscientious amble, a pigmy beside the dignified creature, white as wool, allotted to me.

Tradition tells us that the Queen of Sheba rode a white ass when she came to visit Solomon, madame," I hear, as we skirt the city wall and see upon our left the heights where Titus massed the Roman legions for the terrible siege begun at the Feast of the Passover, A. D. 70, to end five months later in the destruction of temple and citadel. "And kings' sons rode upon such. It is therefore counted a royal animal."

The royal animal beneath me is broad and stalwart and comely—of his kind. He is also so lazy as to require the jerk of Serkeese at his head, and the goad of a second boy upon his flanks when we begin to climb. The flesh may be strong, but the spirit it encases is at once unstable and rebellious.

I have not found this out when we pace down the long declivity, passing on one hand the "green hill," on the other the Damascus gate. The road is wide and smooth, and near the bottom bears away from the city wall to cross a bridge.

"The Brook Kidron!" says the guide.

We draw up to the side of the bridge and look down into the dry valley. It is not even a ravine now, which spring floods might fill. Olive trees grow upon the accumulated debris of eighteen centuries. If there be water in the ancient channel, it never makes its way to the surface. The so-called Tomb of the Virgin is on our left hand. In a few months, upon the day fixed by ecclesiastical dogma as the birthday of our Lord's mother, thousands of pilgrims will pitch tents and booths about tomb and chapel; brass bands will be in full blast all day and all night long; all manner of merchandise will be peddled along the road.

"Just like a picnic," says a Greek Christian whom we encounter on the bridge.

The monument with a square base and peaked tower in the deeper part of the valley upon our right, is known as the Tomb of Absalom.

"Where he was never buried," comes from the back of the brisk brown donkey. "If the Captain will look at Second Samuel, eighteenth chapter and seventeenth verse, he will read that the young man Absalom was cast into a pit in the wood of Ephraim, which is on the other side of Jordan. Learned men think that this may be the pillar alluded to in the eighteenth verse (if you please, sir!) which 'Absalom in his lifetime reared up for himself in the king's day.'"

At the name of the undutiful son a pathetic scene rises before us. We turn silently to another part of the sacred record and read how "all the country wept with a loud voice" as the deposed king and his followers passed over Kidron; then that:

"David went up by the ascent of Mount Olivet, and wept as he went up and had his head covered, and he went barefoot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head and they went up, weeping as they went up."

We are still reading when rasping voices smite our ears. Close to our stirrups is the vanguard of the forces drawn up on the sunny side of the walled way by which we are to make the ascent. The village of Siloam, the houses of which are scarcely distinguishable from the gray rocks to which they cling, lies a short half mile away. Above and beyond it, is the group of wretched huts tenanted by Jerusalem lepers, and this thoroughfare along the Kidron, and so on into the open country, is the pariah's stamping-ground. Old and young of both sexes haunt the spot on every moderately fine day. Some carry pails and baskets into which passing market-gardeners drop vegetables and fruit. One and all beg, and that continually, shamelessly making capital of mutilation and other disfigurement that sicken our souls and senses. David charges into the line closing across our way:

"We went this way this morning, and gave you backshish—and you know it!" he vociferates in stinging Arabic. "I am ashamed of you!"

At the admonition they slink back mute, if not abashed. That a party must not be bled twice in one day is a tenet in their unwritten code of honor and business.

The narrow roadway soon twists and contracts into a bridle-path. A path by

Here Hushai overtook David, and was sent back into Jerusalem by his master to defeat the counsels of Ahithophel. For aught that we, or any one now alive can know, it might have been upon this very spot that our Lord sat down to rest, after departing from the temple, and staying in the outer vestibule at his disciples' appeal, to look upon the great stones to be thrown down before the passing of the faithless generation. The leaves of our 'guide-book' do not flutter in the waveless air as we look for the story:

"And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying: 'Tell us, when shall these things be? And what shall be the sign of the coming?'"

If this be true, here, or near where we read these words, were given the parables of the Ten Virgins and the Ten Talents, and the awful picture was drawn of the division of the righteous from the wicked.

We visit Gethsemane on the way down. The inclosed "Garden," never large, has been subdivided into what may be called flower-plots, that Greek and Roman Cathothe trees of the Gethsemane he loved. He must have crossed the brook by some such route as we have taken, and the tinkle of the running water may have joined with the sigh of the night-wind in the olive-boughs to lull the overwrought disciples to slumber. We forget traditions and monkish superstition in pondering these things, our faces turned toward Jerusalem—that we never forget—held not back, after slaying the prophets, from denying the Holy One and Just, and killing the Prince of Life.

The muezzins are answering one another from minaret to minaret, the harsh cry mellowed in the passage across the river, when we withdrew our eyes from what our hearts and memories must ever hold. David stands without the gate, and the lay-brother comes up with a sprig of rosemary.

Seeing me examine the gift in the hope of finding a wooden stem, he goes back into the garden for a stouter spray, and breaks off a piece of lavender as well.

"Both will grow, if planted," the interpreter says for him to me.

"Would he give me earth in which to plant them?"

He not only will, but hastens to transfer a generous double-handful to a stout envelope David produces from his inexhaustible pockets, and furthermore insists upon my acceptance of marigold and princess feather seeds, pulled from dry stalks beside him.

David smiles, gravely indulgent to the simply uttered admonition accompanying the humble marigold.

"He warns you, madame, that the flower requires sun and a warm soil. He thinks you are from a far-off and a cold country, like Russia, from which hundreds of pilgrims come yearly to Gethsemane."

It falls upon our exalted mood like the touch of a warning hand that we will never return from our "far-off" home upon a second pilgrimage to the Garden of the Agony and Bloody Sweat. We have repeatedly remarked to one another that full appreciation and right feeling do not come to us until we review the moment or hour in thought—that warmth and thrill then are like the afterglow of the departed sun. We shall always be glad that the majestic Figure, never distant from our spiritual apprehension in our daily walks and rides about Jerusalem, has never been nearer than in the solemn shadows now gathering under the trees of the garden into which he entered that night with his disciples. "As he was wont." The breath of his presence, the calm, and the blessing of it may well abide here now and forevermore.

We ride a little way back up the Mount called Olivet, to possess ourselves of a glimpse we had awhile ago, over and between the rounded crowns of the olives, of a hill-top rising dimly through the gauzy haze "beyond the city wall."

"By thine Agony and Bloody Sweat, by thy Cross and Passion, good Lord, deliver us!"

courtesy only, for the rolling stones of all shapes and sizes are as plentiful under our feet as on both sides of the route. Sirkeese tugs hard at my royal beast's halter, the other boy applies a vigorous shoulder to the creature's haunches as we go up and up, tacking across the steep breast of the hill. Now and then, the efforts of both drivers are ineffectual to prevent the donkey from stopping short in an especially precipitous place, and drawing a long breath that heaves one high in the saddle, venting his emotion in what is surely the most ear-splitting and incredibly protracted bray that ever expanded asinine ribs. The experience is exasperating—but funny—up to the seventh repetition.

Still tacking, we gain an open space, a waste of loose stones—not far from the Church of the Ascension, and turn for a long look at the view. The day is very still; the sunlight is colorless; beyond gray hill-side and melancholy olive-trees, and across the valley where the Kidron flows no longer, and cool Siloam is choked by the heaps upon heaps of pleasant places laid waste—rise the hoary walls of Jerusalem.

lic may no longer disgrace the name and memory of a common Master by hideous wranglings. Each sect has its own paled-in territory. Having left our beasts of burden and our attendants at the end of the short lane leading to the main road, we have the place to ourselves, but for a lay-brother in a wide felt hat who is "pottering" with a hoe among the borders of old-fashioned cottage-flowers, under the most aged of the olive trees. Without so much as visiting the Grotto of the Agony, or the connecting subterranean chapel where are shown the tomb of St. Anna, the mother of Virgin Mary and that of Mary's husband, Joseph, or caring to measure the distance—"as it were a stone's cast"—dividing the Grotto of the Agony from the place without the garden—designated as that where Peter, James and John slept while their Lord wept and prayed—we bow to the solemn influences of the hallowed precincts. Somewhere on this sunny declivity was the retreat to which the Man of Sorrows so often resorted with his disciples, that the arch-traitor knew only too well where he was to be found after the Passover feast.

GOD'S HELPERS.

THE man who teaches a Sabbath class, the woman who is to some invalid a Bible reader, they who speak words of good cheer to the disheartened, they who by a consistent life, commend righteousness, all these are helping toward the grand consummation. And that day of the world's release is coming. Just read the papers of these days, and see how much the world needs a sedative. So much unhappiness, domestic unhappiness, social unhappiness and political unhappiness! Pistols, poisons and moral wreckage. Yes, the world needs not only a sedative, but a corrective. Prescriptions without number have been offered to a disordered world, and some of them have been an alleviation or a temporary assuagement of its sufferings. But what this sick world needs is a radical cure, and that the religion of the cross can effect and nothing else. That will make the individual right and society right and the world right. What, then, is the matter? We have the patient and we have the medicine. The thing to do is to bring them together. That is your business and mine and the business of all Christian workers. As no two individuals have exactly the same style of work, so no two churches have the same mission. Each one must find what God would have it to do and then do that thing, and do it thoroughly. Church property is not taxed by city, or state or nation, because it is supposed that every church is doing something for the public good, and a church that does not do something for the general welfare is a scandal and has no right to the place it occupies. I am happy in believing that while there may be here and there a church on the wrong side of everything, and its existence is a damage to society, the vast majority of churches, yea, out of a thousand, are set for the proclamation of good morals and productive of right living. Even in a worldly sense they are profitable to a community and add to the value of real estate in proximity, but more than all they are mental and moral elevation, they are so many armed batteries to assist in the bombardment of iniquity and the capture of the whole world for God. And we will do well to keep in mind the final result. I am so constituted that I cannot fight at Bull Run. It is only a question of time as to how soon we must retreat and the forces of righteousness be wildly overthrown, we would have no heart for the combat, but it is a certainty beyond dispute that this world is going to be taken possession of by paradisaic influences. For deserts, gardens; for ignorance, highest culture; for vice, virtue; for drunkenness, sobriety; for wounds, health; for grief wide as the world, happiness girdling all nations. Keep that result in mind and our work will be more energetic and our faith triumphant.

God did not build this world for a failure. Christ did not die for a cause that is going to be defeated. Having laid the plan for the rectification of all evil and the supremacy of all good, that plan he will carry out, and all the combined forces of human and satanic hate cannot hinder it. Having made the world at the start he surely can make it over again. If a machinist has formed a machine and it gets out of order, and its cogs are broken, and its bands slip, and its revolutions are irregular, if he be a skillful machinist he surely can put it in good repair, and the Lord who built this world, which has got so fearfully out of gear, can surely make it run smooth again, and all its disordered wheels resume their original motion. With the feeling of a husbandman who, on a clear summer morning, sickle over his shoulder, advances, singing as he goes, by the harvest field, golden and waving in the light, let us advance to our work, and may the Lord of the harvest help us while we bind the sheaves for a full garner. Oh, trust in the sickle for the harvest is ripe. "Instead of the thorns shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree, and it shall be to the Lord for a name, and for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

MONUMENTS.

NOTICE how rapidly the prominent men of this land are taking their places in what William C. Bryant, in his "Thanatopsis," calls "the silent halls of death." Immediately after their departure, the question arises about building them a monument. The hardest money to raise is for such cenotaphal commemoration. However eminent a man's services may have been, the subscription for his monument generally comes as hard as drawing teeth. The whole difficulty arises from a wrong notion as to what monument is most appropriate. If instead of spending so much money on a statue, or a sarcophagus, or graveyard architecture, the monument were to be built in the shape of a free library, or an art gallery, or an orphan asylum, or a church, or a school, a thousand dollars would pour in where now it is hard to get a hundred. What sculptured marble in the cemetery can so well keep fresh the memory of W. W. Corcoran, the philanthropist, as the Eloise Home for Aged Women, and the Corcoran Art Gallery? What chiseled epitaph for the family of the Astors like Astor Library? Though a marble pile should be reared in every graveyard in Christendom to the honor of George Peabody, it would not do so much to keep him in loving remembrance as the Peabody Institutes, and the Peabody Academies, and the Peabody Museums, and the Peabody Colleges, built by his bequests in all parts of this land and Great Britain.

Monuments are hard to raise money for, and will themselves in course of time perish. The obelisk in Central Park is only a big tombstone. It was built for all time to honor the Egyptian dead. But even that obelisk is now decaying. It is patched and plastered and mended, but it is a dying tombstone. The waves of eternity past strike against one side the cold column and the waves of eternity to come beat against the other side of the column. Time has a chisel with which he is obliterating every inscription and chipping away all symmetry, and the mandate which has left the Coliseum in ruins, and the Pantheon only a guess of what it was, is saving to the obelisk, "dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."

But there are monuments that never perish. The longer they stand the grander their proportions and the mightier and brighter their inscriptions. I mean the monuments built out of hearts comforted, out of sorrows appeased, out of hunger fed, out of tyrannies demolished. When the white and holy shaft is uncovered it will be amid a chorus of nations saved and the eulogy of him who will say: "I was hungry, and ye fed me; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it to me." Higher or lower we all have opportunity of building for ourselves such a monument. It will not have the coldness of granite, but the warmth of eternal sympathies. Ten thousand years, instead of erasing, will only augment its grandeur. The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance. But do not let us be discouraged because we cannot build our monuments of usefulness on a large scale. If, according to the divine announcement, he who gives a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple shall receive a disciple's reward; then every encouraging word uttered, every Gospel invitation given, every lift of the helpless over hard places, every prayer offered, every deed done, however insignificant to human sight, will be everlastingly honored and remembered by the Lord, long after the granite of the cemetery has fallen and the obelisks of antiquity shall have been swallowed up in the last earthquake of a foundering world. As far as I remember, God in the Bible wrote only two epitaphs, the one over a man who had lived for himself, "Thou fool;" the other over a plain woman, whose tribute of love to him offended his disciples: "she hath done what she could."

* *

I believe in the Bible from lid to lid inspired, not always as a precept but sometimes as a history, the sacred writers no more approving of some of the conduct described in the Bible than Macaulay approves of all the conduct in England described in his history, but a Bible from lid to lid inspired, not always as a precept, but sometimes as a history, yet the best book ever written by pen or printed by type, the foundation of happy homes and good governments.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

P. Dexter, Franklin, O. 1. At what depth of the ocean are the waves felt? 2. What is the pressure at great sea-depths?

1. It is stated by scientific observers that waves are appreciably felt at a depth of 3,000 feet. 2. At the depth of a mile, the pressure is equal to fully one ton to the square inch.

B. B. U., Oceana, Va. Does a person have to be conscious of sin, before he can sincerely repent?

Unquestionably. How else can he repent except he first is conscious that he has sinned? Conviction of sin, or the true spiritual consciousness of one's own shortcomings, is essential to that regret or godly sorrow that worketh repentance. (See II. Cor. 7: 10.) At the same time, one may be conscious of sin and yet, unfortunately, persist in it or be unable to abandon it. It is only by the power of the Spirit, working in the heart, that such consciousness can be made to lead to conviction and thence to repentance and the new life.

Fred. Miller, Hagerstown, Md. How did the Turks come to adopt the Crescent as their national and religious symbol?

It has nothing to do with their religious creed. It was the ancient ensign of Byzantium, now Constantinople, and was found on the coins of that city hundreds of years B. C., and nearly one thousand years before the rise of the Mohammedan power. When the Turks entered Constantinople, after its overthrow by Mohammed II., they found the badge of the Crescent and the Sultans adopted it as a good omen and as foreshadowing the increase of their power.

O. M. P., Leesburg, Pa., and other Inquirers. Why do we keep the first day of the week holy instead of the seventh?

Your question has been answered frequently in these columns and was answered fully in our issue of Jan. 3 (page 6), in reply to "Subscriber, Greenville, N. J." Briefly, we may say that as Christians we honor the first day, as the Lord's Day, because on it he rose from the dead and set the seal to the New Covenant which is of infinitely greater importance to us than the Mosaic covenant. That this custom is not a modern innovation, but was the custom of the early church, may be inferred from Acts 20: 7 and other passages.

W. Dean, San Diego, Cal. Your issue of June 6th with its picture of "Lai Soon and his family," awakens memories which have slept for half a century. Then I met Lai Soon, a young Chinese boy, taking Christian lessons of Dr. Ball of the American Board at Canton, China, for missionary work. Failing to find employment as Chinese interpreter for an English Consul at Bangkok, Siam. That Consul had for his wife a daughter of Dr. Medhurst, who, for forty years was one of the most efficient missionaries to the Malays and Chinese. Another event brought to mind by your picture is that his wife was a pupil of Miss Audissey and Miss Audissey was a fellow passenger with Theodosia Barker from England to Java, and Theodosia became my wife when she reached China. I heard much about Miss Audissey before she and her pupil came to China, and met the pupil before and after she became Mrs. Lai Soon. She was an excellent wife and mother. My memory still holds on to the manly form and generous character of your Editor's brother, with whom I spent many days at his happy home at Amoy in China, where he was a power for good.

J. C. Seneff, Wilmerding, Pa. By what system were the years kept about 3317 B. C., and how many months were there in a year?

The period referred to was about the time of Enoch. According to tradition, Enoch who "walked with God" was the best and wisest man of his generation, and the first who taught men astronomy, division of time, and the higher sciences. The early inhabitants were acquainted with the sun-dial for the division of the day and the hours, the lunar changes for the division of the months, and the solar changes for the procession of the seasons. Doubtless the early Hebrews had the divinely-ordained seventh day of rest to mark the close of the week, although the early Egyptians had no such chronological period, but divided their month of thirty days into three periods of ten days each. Scriptural evidence would indicate that the year, in the ages preceding the Flood, was 360 days in length, although of course this cannot be positively affirmed. It is certain, however, that the months were lunar, and the only longer divisions of time recognized in 3317 B. C. may have been "seasons" or "harvests," with the addition of a thirteenth month whenever the twelfth or last ended too early to correspond with the season or harvest then regularly falling due.

W. V., Langhorne, Pa. 1. What is the difference between "high" and "low" church in the Protestant Episcopal communion? 2. What was the trouble which led to the organization of the Reformed Episcopal Church?

1. The differences are too radical and numerous to be defined in a paragraph. Roughly and briefly it may be said that high churchmen approximate in doctrine, ceremony and practice to the Romish Church, believing that the bread and wine at the Lord's Supper are really changed into the body and blood of Christ, and holding other beliefs in common with the Church of Rome, although not acknowledging the authority of the Pope. The low churchmen hold Evangelical doctrines while maintaining the form of government and polity of the Protestant Episcopal Church. 2. The Reformed Episcopal Church originated in the failure of repeated efforts to obtain a revision of the Prayer Book. A party in the church desired to eliminate from the Prayer Book phrases implying a belief that infants were regenerated by baptism; that the Lord's Supper was a sacrifice in which the elements had been transformed into the body and blood of Christ; and that ministers were priests. As a majority of convocation were opposed to these phrases being withdrawn, their opponents in 1873 left the church and organized the Reformed Episcopal Church.

O. C. Dunreith, Ind. 1. It is believed that a legend precisely like the massacre by Herod, occurred 1200 years A. D., when a tyrant sought the life of the Child Krishna, the atoning Saviour of the Hindus. Please give in brief what is known of the event. 2. Is the celebrated passage in Josephus, "Antiquities of the Jews," book 18, chapter 3, paragraph 3, genuine, or as some claim interpolated? 3. Of what nationality was the ancient historian Macrobius, and when did he live?

1. Krishna (meaning "black"), is represented in Hindu theology as one of the most popular incarnations of Vishnu. His life is related in the "Vishnu Purana," one of the sacred books of the Hindus. He is especially the god of the lower orders, having been brought up among cowherds and peasants. One object of his incarnation was the destruction of Kansa, an oppressive monarch and an enemy of the gods. According to the Hindu myth, Kansa was informed by a prophet named Narada, that his own cousin would bear a son, who would kill him and overthrow his kingdom. The child was miraculously saved. When Kansa discovered that he had been foiled, he ordered the slaughter of all the male children in his kingdom. The life of Krishna, as depicted in the "Puranas," was one of unbridled licentiousness and utterly without moral purpose. He had a harem of 16,000 wives. His deeds were like those of some of the spirits and genii mentioned in Oriental fables. He died of an arrow wound in the foot. The whole story is a mass of legend, tradition and fable. 2. It is asserted by some writers that the passage is an interpolation, but the assertion has never been sustained. 3. Macrobius was a celebrated Roman writer and philosopher, who lived in the fifth century A. D.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

FRANCE'S NEW PRESIDENT.

UNDER the French constitution, the death or resignation of the President of the Republic must be followed promptly by the election of his successor. That duty devolves on the Senate and Chamber of Deputies sitting in joint session. They are required to meet at Versailles within three days of a vacancy occurring and there elect a President for the full term of seven years. In compliance with this law, no sooner was the assassination of President Carnot announced, than the President of the Senate issued a summons for a meeting of the National Assembly on Wednesday, June 27. The meeting was held and resulted in the election of M. Casimir-Perier, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, on the first ballot. A majority of all the votes cast is necessary to elect and in this instance 851 members voted. The number necessary for a valid election was therefore 426 and as M. Casimir-Perier received 451 votes, he was declared duly elected. As there were no nominations, the remainder of the votes were scattered among a number of prominent politicians. M. Casimir-Perier, whose portrait appears on this page, is forty-seven years of age. He has held many important offices and only in May last resigned the office of Premier. He is the son and grandson of distinguished statesmen. His election is popular with all classes, except the radicals and socialists who are opposed to him because he is a millionaire and is connected by birth and marriage with the aristocracy. The necessity of filling so quickly the vacancy in the Government caused by the atrocious crime of the anarchist, is easily understood by those who are acquainted with the condition of the country. The utmost excitement and indignation has been aroused by the murder of M. Carnot and a strong hand at the helm of affairs was required to enforce order. At Lyons where the murder was committed, especially the popular rage took a course which threatened to involve international complications. When it was found that the assassin was an Italian, there was a wild outburst of rage against everyone of that nationality in the city. Italian stores and restaurants were attacked, their contents flung into the street and burned, and their owners maltreated. Employers discharged their Italian workmen, who were obliged to fly for their lives. A strong military force was necessary to protect the Italian consulate. It was an unreasoning outbreak as there was no suspicion that the peaceable Italian residents of Lyons had any complicity in the crime of their fellow-countryman, but in all such movements justice is ignored and prejudice and passion exercise sway. Like the crime that provoked the outrage, they are blunders as well as crimes, for they defeat their own purpose and bring retribution on the perpetrators. (Matt. 26: 52.)

An Objectionable Fastening.

Formal protests have been lodged with the Trustees of the Naval Cemetery, in Brooklyn, against the fastening that has been placed on the gate of that last resting place of the dead. The cemetery is a small plot near the Naval Hospital, and belongs to the United States Government. Many sailors who have died in the hospital are buried there. The gate was formerly closed with an ordinary catch, but recently, owing to the intrusion of the boys of the neighborhood, it has been secured by a ring and padlock. Female relatives of the dead sailors, who went to visit the graves, raised no objection to the lock, as they were promptly admitted on application at the hospital office. Some sailors, however, who called on a recent day, were very indignant. They at once recognized it as a leg-iron such as is used on board ship to secure refractory prisoners, and they regarded its use on the cemetery gate as dishonoring to their comrades who are buried within. The women had not recognized the ring, and did not know its objectionable associations, but when they were told the purpose for which such things were used, they joined in the protest. The iron being a symbol of punishment, its use on the cemetery gate was, doubtless, regarded, not as an intimation that those within were prisoners of death, which would have been true, but as implying that they were undergoing punishment for their sins, which is not true of any who have put their trust in Him "whom God raised up, having loosed the pangs of death because it was not possible that he should be holden of it." (Acts 2: 24.)

A Strangled Elm.

How a stately tree is gradually losing its life is told by a correspondent of a daily python, mounting to its lower branches and climbing in concentric folds about them and the trunk. One strand has clasped the elm so tightly that it has almost buried itself in the tree. It has mounted to the top of the elm and its plumed crest is now waving above its crown. The elm is naturally strong but it shows signs of the force of the deadly grip in which the Wisteria holds it. The tips of its lower branches are dry and withered, and above, the foliage is sere and yellow. Before another year the noble tree will be dead, its life strangled out of it by the Wisteria. So it has been with some noble men and women. Some affection, or some treacherous habit has coiled itself about them, at first stopping their growth in grace, and checking development, and finally ending by killing all true life within them. (Prov. 7: 26.)

A Preacher Mocked.

The interruption of a church service in Washington, D. C., by the voracity of a parrot is reported by the "Post" of that city. It appears that among the guests at one of the chief hotels on a recent Sunday, was a gentleman who has just returned from a journey in Africa. He brought with him a parrot which, he boasts, has no equal in the marvellous rapidity with which it can better motive. They do not mimic the preacher, but they learn pious phrases which, repeated afterward, get them a reputation for piety. (Ezek. 33: 31.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Services in the Auditorium at Asbury Park, N. J., on July 22, will be conducted by Rev. B. Fay Mills, who will preach at each service.

The Peary Relief Expedition has arrived safely at St. John's, N.F. The expedition was to proceed northward on July 5. All the members are well.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church reports that the total receipts for the six months of the financial year were $579,669, against $500,893 for the corresponding period of last financial year.

Madame Carnot has received an Autograph letter from Queen Victoria, expressing sympathy with her in her bereavement. The Queen concludes with the words: May God give you the strength, courage and resignation so necessary to enable you to bear such misfortune.

Sir John Hall, who has been Premier of New Zealand, and an energetic supporter of woman suffrage, says: "Now, nobody has a word to say against woman's enfranchisement. Nobody dreams of going back, and many wonder why the change was not made before."

The Number of Christian churches and Jewish synagogues in New York City has increased from 340 in 1871 to 522 in 1894, and the seating capacity which in 1871 was 292,700 is now 400,000, or sufficient to accommodate about one of every four adults and children now living in the city.

Dr. William H. Park, the Surgeon in charge of the Methodist Episcopal hospital at Soo-Chow, has been created a Mandarin of the Fifth Class, in recognition of his services in saving the life of the Aide-Camp of a Chinese General, who had been severely wounded by a gang of robbers.

A New York Lady now in Europe, has notified her physician that her carriage and her pair of horses are at the service of the hospital with which he is connected, either to give the nurses an airing or for convalescent patients. The coachman is placed under the doctor's orders until the lady returns. As no other ladies have been so thoughtful, the example may be useful as a suggestion.

An English Newspaper Usually Well-Informed as to European affairs says that the Sultan of Turkey is sending at his own expense, missionaries to spread Islamism in Africa, with a view of checking the advance of Christian powers. This appears to indicate that if Christian people do not think Christian missions are making much progress in Africa, the Sultan and his Mohammedan advisers hold a different opinion.

A New Bible for the Blind has just been issued from the press of Louisville, Ky. It is printed with the "point" alphabet, which is said to be much more easily read by a blind person than the Roman letters. Like the Bible now in use, the letters are raised, so that a blind person can read it by touch. Each letter is represented by a different number of raised dots or points arranged in a certain position, the letters being recognized by the number and arrangement of the dots. The Bible covers 1,839 pages and is in eleven volumes.

journal. Near the Congregational Church of Norwich, Conn., is a fine elm, tall and straight and in the prime of vigorous life. In the garden of a mansion standing near the church, a Wisteria vine has been planted and has grown to unusual proportions. At its base it is nearly a foot in diameter. It was trained to cover the front of the mansion and a branch, leaving the trunk about a foot from the ground, has done that work. It is over a hundred feet long and its festoons are, in the season, rich with lovely blossoms. But the Wisteria did not expend all its life in that way. The trunk divided where the branch left it, and another fork consisting of three huge strands several inches thick was thrown out. The strands are held together by withe-like tendrils, which spring from them and have made them like a cable. Trailing twenty feet along the fence, they reached the trunk of the elm and twined around it, like a great

The weather being hot on Sunday morning, the windows were open both in the church and the hotel. No annoyance occurred at the beginning of the service, but when the sermon began, the congregation heard the preacher's words repeated in his own tones and emphasis, by a mocking voice. The short sentences he uttered were taken up and pronounced in imitation so faithful and so exact as to move all the people to laughter. The minister himself smiled, though the annoyance disturbed him. Finally he had to suspend preaching while one of his deacons went to the hotel with a request for the removal of the parrot to some other part of the hotel. The proprietor apologized and complied, and the service was resumed. It is not often

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

A HERO AND HIS ARMY.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Rev. R. S.

MacArthur, D.D. Text: Judges 7: 7, "And the Lord said unto Gideon, By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand: and let all the other people go every man unto his place," etc., etc.

BRAVE, dashing, and victorious were the soldiers of the heroic Gideon. They are worthy of immortality; and they have been immortalized on the page of sacred story. They lose nothing of their grandeur and glory even when compared with the "noble six hundred" who rode into the jaws of death," "into the mouth of hell," and whose praise is chanted in immortal verse by the laureate Tennyson. In giving praise to Gideon and "glory to the Lord of Hosts, from whom all glories are," we desire to detract nothing from the illustrious three hundred, whose heroic, patriotic piety gave them a unique place not only in the Bible, but in the history of brave men of every century and every clime.

Condition of the Country.

In order rightly to understand the events recorded in connection with the bravery and victory of Gideon we must have clearly in our minds the condition of the country at the time. Earlier in this history we had the account of the defeat of Sisera. His defeat marked the failure of the last attempt by the old inhabitants to overthrow the people of God. Now, however, enemies from new quarters afflict the children of Israel. They are the Midianites and the Amalekites; the Midianites had gradually spread northward from the peninsula of Sinai, and the Amalekites were the old enemies of Israel whom they had fought in the desert of Rephidim. These two peoples have now joined interests with some other tribes, "the children of the East," in order to overthrow Israel. They are accustomed to make incursions at harvest time when they carry off flocks, and destroy the harvests after the manner of the Bedouin Arabs of the present day. The Israelites were reduced to the sorest distress; many of them were obliged to dwell in dens in the mountains, in caves, and in strongholds. At this time they did not dare to reside in the open country, but were obliged to find protection in these retired and hidden caverns. Frequently still, whole neighborhoods are exposed to these ravages, and as a result whole villages have disappeared from the face of the earth. The peasants prefer to climb to a safe retreat in the hills rather than take the risk of living in the open fields. In Gideon's time these raids were on an especially gigantic scale. Cruel as is war always and everywhere, it was especially so in the midst of the terrible sufferings inflicted upon the helpless Israelites. Two chiefs, having the title of kings, are especially brought to our notice, Zebah and Zalmunna, "the pitiless." Their names indicate the power they exercised, and the terror they inspired. There were two inferior chiefs, named Oreb, "the raven," and Zeeb, "the wolf;" these latter bore the title of "princes." These four chiefs led their wild followers in battle array against the defenseless inhabitants. The picture of their army given in the narrative is striking and startling. They are represented in the Book of Judges as appearing like the Arab chiefs of modern days arrayed in gorgeous scarlet robes, whilst on their necks and the necks of their camels there were gold chains and crescent-shaped ornaments. All their women were dressed with ear and nose rings of gold, together with many other jewels. This is the picture given us in this ancient record of the dashing and heartless enemies of Israel, and of the sad condition of the people themselves.

When the night is darkest, the morning is near; when the knell of liberty is sounding, the deliverer is born. When the tale of bricks was doubled, then came Moses; when Israel was in despair and her enemies in triumph, then came Gideon, heroic deliverer, and triumphant soldier of God. Our thought must be fixed upon him for a little as we study this interesting narrative. "Words are things," said the fiery Mirabeau in the wild French Assembly. This statement is true of Gideon's name. It means "feller," "hewer," or "destroyer." He was chosen of God for his noble mission. He is of a small family, but of a proud tribe. Unexpectedly did this great champion of Israel arise in the midnight hour of Israel's hope. Already Gideon was known both to the Israelites and their enemies as a mighty hero. The "tree-feller" was also a man-feller; and many a Midianite had already felt the strength of the arm of this "mighty man of valor." His home and fields were at Ophar, and here the invaders encountered his strong arm and brave household. He was modestly at work, like many other truly great men, when he received his call to higher duties and nobler endeavors.

A Divine Call.

Gideon was threshing wheat with a flail in the winepress in order that he might the better conceal the grain from the tyrants. In the winepress he would be less exposed to the notice of the invaders, and the flail failing on the grain placed on the dead ground would make less noise than if it were on a boarded floor. There would be danger that the enemies might hear the belaboring of the oxen, if they had been used to thresh the grain. The angel of the Lord immediately said to him, "Jehovah is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." This address seemed not only startling but ironical to Gideon, when he considered the depressed state of his people. He therefore replied, "O, my Lord, if Jehovah be with us why then is all this evil befallen us, and where be all the miracles which our fathers told us of, saying: did not Jehovah bring us up from Egypt? but now Jehovah has forsaken us and delivered us into the hand of the Midianites." We can well understand how Gideon came to speak in a tone so despondent. The answer came: Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel, from the hands of the Midianites. Have not I sent thee? Gideon still expressed his doubt; but he is met with this divine promise: "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man." The assurance that God is with him is all that he needs. A miracle finally entirely removes his distrust, and inspires his heart with hope and assures him of God's presence and help in all his undertakings. This miracle is in itself deeply interesting. Gideon at once undertakes to present the angel with a kid and unleavened cakes. These he laid upon the rock, and the supernatural visitor touches the offering with the tip of his staff, and immediately a fire arose out of the rock and consumed them; the meal immediately became a sacrifice. The angel then departed and Gideon was filled with holy awe because he had seen an angel of the Lord face to face. The heavenly visitant gives him a word of benediction, and Gideon builds an altar calling it Jehovah-shalom.

Clothed With the Spirit of God.

A new era dawns upon Gideon and the people of God. Striking is the language employed to describe Gideon's preparation for this heroic and patriotic service; we are told that the spirit of Jehovah clothed him. This statement means that he was filled fully, possessed entirely, by the spirit of God. Being thus clothed "he waxed valiant in fight," and was thus enabled to "turn to flight the armies of the aliens." When the spirit of God comes in abundant measure upon men they are able to perform heroic deeds, and to achieve sublime results. We are not now surprised to read that Gideon blew the war trumpet through his own clan of Abiezer and also that messengers were sent through the northern tribes and they joyfully obeyed the patriotic summons. All is now ready for a great deliverance; but Gideon feels the need of a divine token to assure him of God's presence and blessing. God condescends to strengthen his faith by a double sign of the divine presence. One wonders at Gideon's demand that God should give him this token; his conduct seems presumptuous, after God had given a definite promise; but in passing judgment upon this demand of Gideon we must have constantly in view the necessities of his position. We now now see the gathering of the Clan, we hear the blast of the trumpets, and are ready for the approaching clash of arms. Gideon's career is a campaign rather than a battle, a campaign which divides itself into three parts. No fewer than 33,000 men have answered Gideon's call. He, however, proclaims through the host that all who were faint-hearted were free to depart, and to our astonishment, and, as we might well suppose, to his dismay, no fewer than 22,000 withdrew. But even the 11,000 still remaining were too many. A strange method does Gideon employ to test the spirit of his soldiers. Here is a brook flowing through the basin, and to it his soldiers are brought that he may once more test their wisdom and their self-restraint. Only those who lapped the water with their hands, as men do who are in haste, were considered worthy to be retained in the army, and all those who lay down and leisurely drank were excluded. These two modes of drinking are still common in the East. Orientals become amazingly dexterous in the use of the hands; they throw the water into the mouth before the hand is brought close to it, so that the hand brings a fresh supply before the preceding one has been swallowed. The entire number of soldiers is now reduced to three hundred. Is Gideon to be pitted? One might so affirm; but God had said: "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you and deliver the Midianites into thine hand." God cares for quality more than quantity. When God makes bare his arm, a few men become mightier than many thousands without God's immediate presence and benediction. But a slight difference marked the conduct of the rejected and the accepted soldiers; but that slight difference indicated an important distinction between these two classes. We may expect that Gideon soon will achieve victories for God's Israel and for Israel's God.

Another Encouragement.

At this critical moment Gideon needed and received another encouragement from God. At this moment the Midianites and Amalekites, and all the children of the East, lay sleeping in the valley like grasshoppers for multitude, and their camels, according to the Scripture narrative, were without number, as the sand by the seaside for multitude. How may Gideon attempt to overcome 120,000 of these dashing warriors with 300 men? God recognizes the necessity of interposing for the encouragement of his noble servant. Yonder in the valley beneath sleep the hosts of Midian: God commands Gideon to go down unto the host, taking his servant Phurah with him, and accompanied the command by the promise that he had delivered Midian into Gideon's power. We now see Gideon and Phurah going stealthily down to the sleeping host. The darkness of night has come down alike upon the invaders and the invaded. Under cover of the night Gideon and his armor-bearer reach the outskirts of the tents; deep silence reigns over the encampment. One of the sleeping Arabs awakes; a dream has startled him. He is telling that dream to one of his companions. How eagerly Gideon and Phurah listen. This dream meant much to Midian; it will mean much to Israel. A thin and round cake of barley bread is seen rolling into the camp. Mysterious cake! Marvelous wheel! And now it reaches the royal camp in the centre of the encampment, and headlong the camp falls upon the ground. So spake the awakened Arab; so heard the anxious and delighted Gideon. The Arab affirms that it meant nothing else save "the sword of Gideon, the son of Joash." Grateful Gideon, he bows himself in thankfulness to the ground, and then dashes off up the mountain side with a glad heart; he returns to his three companies at their posts. At midnight the signal is given. Never were stillness and darkness more suddenly disturbed. Three hundred pitchers crash, three hundred shout until the midnight air resounds as if hundreds of thousands instead of three hundred soldiers were making an onset. And the stirring war-cry, "for Jehovah and for Gideon," breaks upon the stillness of the midnight air. The Arabs break camp, rush hither and thither in the darkness and confusion, uttering the wild cries peculiar to their race. Every man drew his sword against his fellow. The vast multitude poured in hopeless confusion down the valley toward the ford of Jordan; their aim was to cross the river at Bethfara, but Gideon would not permit them to escape.

We now come to what was really a second battle, for the Ephraimites were now aroused, and that great tribe seized the ford and cut off the fugitives. The two greater chiefs had crossed the river before the Ephraimites arrived, but Oreb and Zeeb, the lesser chiefs, were caught and slain. "Faint, yet pursuing," dashed Gideon and his brave three hundred after the retreating enemy.

A Third Battle.

At Succoth and Penuel, Gideon found halting places. Although two battles had been gained, a third must be fought and a third victory won. Gideon now follows the course of Zebah and Zalmunna, the two chiefs who had been over all the host, with flying steps, and pursued them in their rapid flight. Shall he overtake them? Shall the victories won be followed by another triumph? On, on, far into the desert rush Gideon and his brave three hundred, and at distant Karkor he overtakes the flying Arab host. There the remnant of their army has encamped in fancied security; they are without the limits of Palestine. Gideon immediately resolves to surprise them by a rapid detour. In his plans he is eminently successful, and suddenly falling upon them from the East, he utterly routed them, and by sunrise he was marching in triumph on his way back to the Jordan. Never was a victory more complete. The day of Midian, "with its confused noise, and its garments rolled in blood," remained ever after as the emblem of complete destruction of the foes of Israel.

So magnificent was Gideon's triumph that he rose at once to the highest honors which the tribe could confer. It was their intention to crown him as king, but Gideon was humble as heroic; he was modest as brave. Few men could have been more fit for the honor of royal rank. His very appearance was kingly, but he earnestly refused the proffered crown.

Lessons.

God gives us at times opportunities for doing great things for him. Happy are we when we recognize our opportunity and discharge our obligation. Again, God can work with few as with many; he regards quality more than quantity. Unfortunately but a small percentage in all our churches now do the work of the churches; but few are ready to respond to the blast of the trumpet for battle against the devil and all form of evil. Many soldiers are heroic in sham battles and on parade day; but when war really comes, thousands are faint-hearted, and other thousands are self-indulgent. Many are skulking in the rear, some are sulking in their tents, while an undue proportion is in hospitals or in ambulances. If the test were applied to churches to-day, perhaps as great a proportion as in the army of Gideon would be unfit for battle.

Once more the trumpet sounds, summoning us to the conflict. Hosts of Midianites and Amalekites in the form of social, political and personal evils are all about us. Let us sound the cry, "For God and native land," and rouse ourselves for duty. Let us, here and now, consecrate ourselves afresh to Christ and to his church. Let us determine to undertake nothing in our own strength. We are unable to cope with our terrible foes. Let us also shrink from no duty to which we are clearly called of God. God will permit us to test him as Gideon tested him with the fleece; and God will give us encouragement by confessions of weakness from the foe, as Gideon was encouraged by the dream regarding the cake of barley-bread.

Let us doubt nothing when God promises us his help. Forward, O church of the living God! Let us no longer sing, "hold the fort," but let us shout, "storm the fort." And let us, when the victory is won, take no glory to ourselves, but give all the glory unto God. God must strip us of pride that he may use us for work. May the God of Gideon be our God, our portion, our all, henceforth and forevermore. Amen.

BRINGING THE CHILDREN IN.

Our Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest Organizes many new Sunday Schools—A Centenarian Christian.

WRITING from Kirksville, Mo., under a recent date, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, says:

"I organized a Sunday School last Lord's day, eighty-eight persons going into the organization. The place is a small village named Excello. It has an interesting population and the school begins with every encouraging prospect. While there I heard some interesting facts about Robert Gipson, who was reputed to be over 118 years and who died recently. I had known 'Uncle Robbie' as he was familiarly and affectionately called, when I was a youth, and he seemed to be quite old the first time I ever saw him. In 1879 I dined with him at the house of one of his sons, he being then, as estimated, over his 100th year. He was able to attend a meeting in which I was laboring. He was in good health. In the course of our conversation on that occasion I asked him what his prospects were as a Christian. I was struck with the beauty, force and simplicity of the answer made by this aged and unlearned disciple. He said: 'My strength fails me, my sight fails me, but my faith does not fail me.' It was probably more than two years afterward that I preached in a small school house in a country district where I had organized a Sunday School. Mr. Gipson was stopping with another of his sons who lived close to the school house, and, notwithstanding the day was chilly, he attended the preaching. The text was the dying words of our blessed Lord, 'It is finished.' At the close of the discourse all present who were trusting in Christ for salvation were requested to rise. Immediately 'Uncle Robbie' began to reach out for his crutches (or canes), and with the aid of friends he arose, and 'stood up for Jesus.'

"The following is a summary of missionary work from June 1, 1893, to June 1, 1894. 'Schools Re-organized,' refers not to 'living' schools reconstructed, but to 'dead' schools revived. Sometimes the second organization succeeds splendidly, and is therefore very necessary.

"I had organized three flourishing Sunday Schools in May, and preached to a crowded audience the first sermon ever delivered in what is called Boomer Schoolhouse. I organized nine schools during that month in the Grand River country, and addressed or otherwise aided five others in the counties of Chariton, Linn, Grundy and Livingston, the fourteen schools having 63 teachers and 557 scholars traveled 673 miles, closing a tour of 57 days May 28, during which I had only been at home a few hours from April 6. I left home again the 2d of June on another tour, to last till the latter part of the month."

A SINGING HINDOO CONVERT.

At a recent meeting in England, Mr. Robert Spurgeon related the following of a Hindoo convert: "Boden is one of the gentlest and happiest and best of our native brethren. He is greatly beloved everywhere. And to all classes he is ever ready to sing for Jesus. Two or three hymn-books, wrapped in a piece of cloth, are always with him. Hindoos and Mohammedans and Christians alike invite him to sing; and he has a hymn that suits almost every subject. This aged saint has gone through many trials. When a false lawsuit resulted in his imprisonment he said to the magistrate, 'You sentence me unjustly. But there is one who will judge you.' In prison he was allowed his hymn-book through Mr. Anderson's intercession, and the prisoners listened daily to his gentle voice as he sang of the Saviour. A short time ago a number of our people had taken up land where some heathen had desired to secure it, and in revenge the Hindoos came down upon them in a body one Sunday morning while they were at prayer. Boden was present, his left arm was broken, and he had to spend weeks in the hospital at Piroj-pore. While there he did more for Christ by his quiet, uncomplaining and gentle spirit, as well as by his perpetual singing, than much bazaar preaching could accomplish."

CELESTIAL SIGHT.

"Lord! lift Thou up the light of thy countenance."
Psalm 4: 6.

FATHER! as other faces fade,
As earthly lights decline,
More brightly on this darkened heart
Bid thy soft radiance shine.

As in its lamp; life's keenest sense,
Burns lower, still more low,
Oh, bid my inner sight increase,
Its holier visions grow.

Give me a clearer, brighter faith
To see, my sun and shield;
Thy glory and thy righteousness
In Jesus' face revealed.

A stronger faith, to mark how fast
How close on every hand,
The great hills of thy faithfulness,
Eternal bulwarks stand.

A purer faith to read my want,
My nothingness, and need.
And boldly for thy latest gift,
Thy Gift of Gifts to plead.

Jesus! my hope, is all from thee
Draw nearer, still more near;

And show me of thyself as much
Of Heaven, as earth can bear.
Till waking in thy likeness, there,
And strengthened by thy grace,
In love's most blissful hour of prayer
I see Thee face to face.

HEAVEN NEAR.

SURELY yon Heaven, where angels see God's face
Is not so distant as we deem
From this low earth! 'Tis but a little space,
The narrow crossing of a slender stream;
'Tis but a veil which winds might blow aside,
Yes, these are all that us of earth divide
From the bright dwelling of the glorified,
The Land of which we dream.
Those peaks are nearer Heaven than earth below,
Those hills are higher than they seem;
'Tis not the clouds they touch, nor the soft brow
Of the o'erbending azure, as we deem.
'Tis the blue floor of Heaven that they up-bear;
And, like some old and wildly-rugged stair,
They lift us to the Land, where all is fair,
The Land of which we dream.

THE COMING REGENERATION.

The Golden Age of the Poets and the Millennium of the Prophets to be Realized after the Saviour's Second Advent.

BY REV. CHARLES K. IMBRIE, D.D.

THE anticipation of some sort of blissful change to come upon this sad and sinful earth after its long-continued storms and sorrows is, in one form or another, very general. Even those who despise God's word and rely on human prognostications or scientific researches for their date, prophecy with greater or less distinctness of meaning a future Millennium. This belief is indeed so general that the coming of the Millennium has even passed into a current newspaper phrase. With all those who take God's Word for their guide, the expectation of such a time of coming blessedness, in some form, is universal.

But what is to be the character of the change? How far is it to affect this earth and the race? What are its attendants and its time? On these points there is the greatest diversity of belief. And yet every one must see that there can be but one true view of the case. For God's thoughts and plan in this matter are fixed and not changeable or doubtful; and all things are shaping, in the hands of the King, to bring in just the result he has all along intended and none other. Let no one suppose from the great diversity of views that the Scripture expressions concerning this event are meagre or doubtful. On the contrary, they are very striking and comprehensive. They arrest attention at once. To say nothing just now of the vivid pictures of that bright future day drawn in the Old Testament, and in which the various features of the time are grouped together; the terms used in the New Testament are very strong.

It is called first a "Regeneration" a new creation, a second birth—Palingenesia. Surely this implies a vast and comprehensive and thorough change, and a change on the earth.

Again, it is so vast and comprehensive that the whole creation is depicted as groaning and travelling in pain, waiting to be admitted into "the glorious liberty of the children of God." (Rom. 8: 21, 22). And it is represented as so glorious, that even believers also with the first-fruits of the Spirit are groaning and waiting for this day; the day of the redemption of the body; when they shall be "manifested to be the sons of God." (Rom. 8: 19-23).

It is called by the Apostle Peter a "Restitution of all things," (Acts 3: 21), implying that there is no department of creation that has been impaired which shall not feel the influence of the restitution.

It is represented both by the Old Testament prophets (Isa. 65: 17-66-22) and New Testament apostles (II Pet. 3: 13; Rev. 21: 1) as "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness;" a complete, all-pervading, blessed, abiding change.

And to close all: In the prophecy which foreshadows it as accomplished, the change is represented as total as it is glorious; and we hear the voice of the King on the throne saying, "Behold I make all things new." (Rev. 21: 5).

And yet, strange to say, comprehensive and glorious as these Scripture expressions are, the results derived from them by different minds differ greatly. If we are asked what that Regeneration is which the Scriptures foreshadow, it seems we must be "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken" of the glory to follow the sufferings of Christ, if we receive not certain things as truth:

1. That there is to be a thorough renewing, physical and spiritual, of the earth and the race; "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness;" "a kingdom of God under the whole heaven that shall abide forever." For so the Prophets Isaiah and Daniel distinctly declare, and the Apostle John sets it forth in symbol just as plainly.

2. That this kingdom of God, promised from the beginning, is identified with, and must not be expected independently of, this earth on which we tread. For Isaiah and all the prophets, in every prophecy, speak of Israel when restored, as abiding here forever. They testify that all the nations of the earth from generation to generation are to worship the Lord in this renewed earth, and the apostle John in Revelation makes no note of any other condition of things up to the very last chapter.

CHRIST'S LOWLINESS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning July 22. Isaiah 53.

DIFFERENCES in condition and rank among men must have seemed very trivial to the Deity. If the Word was to become incarnate it must have appeared a minor consideration what condition the divine man should occupy. Yet we know that those thirty-three years of life might have been spent in circumstances less painful than they were. Christ endured physical hardships which had he chosen, he might have avoided. It was a lowly lot that he selected. We often speak slightingly of poverty, yet it is a very real evil. Those who endure it patiently and cheerfully deserve more honor than they ever get. Christ bore it. He had not where to lay his head. The fact endears him to every poor man who realizes it. It assures him of sympathy. And how majestic is the figure that shines in the historical page from the background of poverty. The petty cares, the distressing apprehensions, the wearing anxieties of the poor man's lot, never moved him. They fell away from him as the waves strike the rock and fall helplessly away. He had meat to eat that men knew not of; treasure in heaven that satisfied him; a life of God that rendered him impervious to human ills. All these he offered to his followers. He would have them live as he lived, so near to the Father as to be indifferent to the conditions of physical and social life. The idea of Christ endowed with a fortune would be inconceivable. We can imagine him distributing it among the poor, but we cannot imagine him spending it, or keeping it. Even we, with our inordinate respect for wealth, cannot conceive of a millionaire Christ. He must be poor and lowly to have the majesty which we attach to our conception of him. Thus in spite of our reverence for the man of millions, we feel instinctively that the true Christ-like life must be a lowly life. Still more remarkable was his lowliness of spirit. The patience he had with the ignorance of the disciples, his toleration of their sordid ideas of himself and his kingdom, his avoidance of all earthly honors save that one triumphal entry into Jerusalem in the last days of his life and his sublime behavior under contumely and insult during his arraignment and trial, all show the unselfishness and humility of his divine soul. There is no self-assertion, though he claims divinity for his teaching; no sensitiveness under contempt and vituperation; no resentment of insult; no irritation under provocation; no impatience with the weak and erring—nothing but infinite love, compassion and helpfulness. The Evangelists who tell the story of his life omit many things that we would have been glad to know, but the facts they have recorded are sufficient for guidance for anyone who desires to live the Christ life on earth.

Y. M. C. A. DELEGATES.

At the recent Jubilee celebration of Young Men's Christian Associations in London, which has been described in former issues of this journal, none received a warmer welcome from the English hosts than the foreign visitors whose portraits appear on this page. They represented the work in other countries and were enthusiastic in their acknowledgement of the benefits derived in their respective lands from the movement, the origin of which they were celebrating.

Prince Oscar who represented the Swedish Associations, is the second son of Oscar II.

King of Sweden and Norway. He is thirty-five years of age and is the President of the Association of Stockholm. It is by no means a mere formal and nominal function that the presidency is in his hands. He presides at the meetings, is active in arranging the plans of the Association and takes a deep interest in its welfare.

Superintendent Krummacher went as one of the delegates from Germany. He is sixty-four years old, and has been thirty-eight years in the ministry. He was formerly a professor in one of the universities, but has since 1863 occupied the pulpit at Elberfeld, and has won distinction as preacher and author.

Three years

religious and philanthropic enterprises, and for the strong common-sense and clear business penetration which he brings to the many councils and boards of directors of which he is a member. He is an enthusiast in Y. M. C. A. work, and has done much to promote its advance in Wales.

Mr. E. M. Denny is senior partner in the firm of Denny Brothers of Belfast, Ireland. He has been one of the warmest friends of the Y. M. C. A. in Ireland and in England, and has given liberally to the cause. When an effort was made in 1881 to purchase Exeter Hall, in London, for the headquarters of the Association, Mr. Denny gave $25,000 toward the required sum and during the recent celebrations, he, with two friends, bore the entire expense of providing the entertainment in the tent on the Thames Embankment, where two meals a day were served to all delegates.

Count Andreas von Bernstorff is the Vice-President of the Y. M. C. A. in Berlin. He is the eldest son of the eminent diplomatist who for many years was one of Germany's most valued and efficient representative at foreign courts. The present Count was formerly attached to the German Legation at Washington. He is now chief of the Department of Public Works and Instruction of Prussia. He is also Lord ago he was made Superintendent, an office corresponding to that of Bishop in Episcopal churches. Superintendent Krummacher has been identified with Y. M. C. A. work for thirty-seven years, and is now President of the local Association and of the West German District Council.

Mr. R. C. Morse is the well-known American Y. M. C. A. worker, one of the Secretaries of the International Committee. He is a nephew of the famous electrician of the same name. Mr. Morse has been connected with the International Committee for twenty-five years. He was at first the editor of the "Association Monthly," but after two years, the need of his services in visiting the Associations and in attending Conventions led to his giving up editorial work and devoting all his time to secretarial duties. The general superintendence has gradually drifted into his hands and on him, probably more than on any one else, has devolved the labor of securing the affiliation of the Associations of the world.

Mr. John Cory is a member of the firm of Cory Brothers, the noted coal dealers and ship-owners of Cardiff, in Wales. Mr. Cory is famous for his munificent gifts to Chamberlain to the Emperor and a member of the Reichstag. The Count takes a deep interest in religious work of all kinds, and is President of the German Sunday School Union, the Book and Tract Society, the German Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and many other societies. Not long ago he organized a Noonday Prayer Meeting in Berlin. In 1884 he was President of the World's Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations which in that year was held in Berlin.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN INDIA.

Some interesting reports from various chapters of the Epworth League in India, which are sent to the "Epworth Herald," show how heartily the Christian people of that land, both white and native, have taken hold of the Epworth idea and are using it. A member of the Bombay conference writes: "We labor under the disadvantage of having to carry on our work in four distinct languages—English, Hindustani, Marathi and Gujarati. We have, however, eleven Senior chapters and five Junior branches of the Epworth League. Six of the Senior chapters are in English, two in Hindustani, two in Marathi, and one in Gujarati. Altogether there are 550 members." Karach Chapter, Rev. F. N. Shaw, pastor, writes: "Many of our soldier brethren have been converted and brought into the church through the league. It is of real use to them." Nardindpur Chapter (native), Rev. J. O. Denning, writes: "Nearly all of our members preach in the bazaars, teach in Sunday Schools, visit zenanas, or do some other form of mission work." Rev. W. H. Grenon, of the Nagpur Chapter, says: "Our Senior League is doing a good work for the Master in the weekly meetings held regularly from bungalow to bungalow. Once a month we have a grand musical and literary effort."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Since the first of May the Christian Endeavor Societies in Rochester, N. Y., have been holding prayer meetings early on Sunday morning in a pavilion in the park.

The Epworth League rendered very valuable aid in the great revival in Centerville, Ia., in which 450 made profession of faith. It has also assumed the support of a pastor teacher in India.

The Sedalia District (Mo.), of the Epworth League has now twenty-four chapters, all energetic and well organized. At its recent Convention at Knob Noster, Mo., 113 delegates were present.

The Baptist Young People's Union at Marinette, Wis., is the first Union in the United States to have a memorial window bearing the emblem of the Union, the shield, open Bible and motto, "Loyalty to Christ."

At the Colorado State Convention of Epworth Leagues, the Secretary reported that there are 100 chapters in the State, 70 Chapters, 5 Christian Endeavor Societies, 31 Junior Leagues, 3,000 members of the Senior Chapters, 1,640 Juniors; total, 4,640. Total increase last year 2,151.

The National Council of English Christian Endeavor Societies, has under consideration the plan for the organization of a United Society of Christian Endeavor in that country, somewhat similar to the bodies which guide and promote the movement in America, China, Japan, and Australia.

Kansas is to have five new Christian Endeavor superintendents, representing the departments of Bible study, missions, work in rural districts, temperance and good citizenship. At the recent State Convention there were four simultaneous meetings on Sunday afternoon, separate gospel services for young men and for young women, a meeting for juniors, and one for students.

Mr. J. O. Staples, Treasurer of the Baptist Young People's Union, has issued an open letter correcting a statement which has had wide circulation. It relates to the question of women having seats on the Managing Board of the Union. He says that it is not true as has been published that there was a formal decision at the Detroit Convention to exclude women from the Board. The Convention simply deferred to the plea of Dr. Wilkins that in the situation at that time the advocates of the admission of women would consent to forego their claims. There was, Mr. Staples says, no decision and no vote taken, but the question was simply postponed or deferred. It is likely to come up at Toronto with some force.

An enthusiastic State Convention of the Epworth League of Minnesota was recently held at Red Wing. From all over the State delegations came full of enthusiasm and devotion. One young man said that his journey to the Convention and back covered seven hundred miles. The League in Minnesota is four years old. The report of the State Treasurer showed all bills paid and a balance in the treasury, a great improvement over last year's financial condition. The Secretary reported that there are now 221 Chapters and 100 Junior Leagues, with a total membership of about 15,000. This is a large increase over last year's report and it does not include many German and Scandinavian Leagues.

NEARER THE SKY.

FROM the tip-top branch of an apple tree
A queer little bird looked down at me.
"Why did you go up there?" said I,
And this was the strange little bird's reply:

"From the very top of this apple tree
The country far around I see;
And I'm nearer the sky on the top of this tree,
And nearer the One who made and loves me.

"And soon the sun will sink to rest
Behind the hills in the distant west:
Then listen well, and you'll hear me say
My prayers, in a true little bird's own way."

Music in Africa.

An Angola Piano and How it is Played —Music to Drive Civilized Ears Frantic, but which Africans Love to Hear.

THROUGH the kindness of Mr. S. John Kuno, an independent Christian missionary at St. Paul de Loanda, Angola, West Africa, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is enabled to present to its readers on this page a remarkably interesting picture. It is reproduced from a photograph taken by Mr. Kuno in a country practically unknown to the civilized world, and represents a native musician about to perform on an instrument that may, for want of a better name, be not inaptly styled "an African piano." Such indeed is the name actually applied to it by those white men who have come within the range of its remarkable tones, or have had the hardihood to remain near the performer while he was making the neighborhood hideous with the discordant din of his odd-looking instrument. It is a select assortment of dried and inflated gourds all made air-tight, and ranged according to size, on the principle of the xylophone, or the musical glasses. Our young readers will recognize the similarity at a glance.

The gourds, eighteen or more in number, are arranged in the form of a semi-circle and pieces of red-wood or ivory, to correspond with them in size, form the key-board on the inside of the semi-circle. As the whole instrument is comparatively light, the performer carries it suspended by a belt which is also a sort of head-rest, and thus his hands are left free. He plays with a small, round-headed mallet, sometimes with two, and it is surprising to observe the skill and dexterity of his performance, the size and awkwardness of the instrument being taken into consideration.

It has been said by the famous English poet, Congreve, that "music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," but the reverberant tones of this rude gourd piano of the Angolans, with its three incomplete and irregular scales, give the impression of a procession of strange, outlandish discords, rather than a soothing harmony of sounds. Accompanied by the drum or the tambo, it might easily be employed to urge the tribesmen on to battle, although its clumsiness might prevent the instrument from being put to such a use on the field. Doubtless the simple Angolans regard it as the very crown and climax of their constructive musical skill and view it as a luxury only to be indulged by great chiefs or rich headmen. Strangely enough, the native musicians are almost exclusively men. With rare exceptions, African women have not yet risen to the level of taste and skill where they make music for the household on any instrument whatever.

In the Fan tribe an instrument greatly resembling that of the Angolans is called the handja. It is also formed of hollow gourds and played upon with two sticks, the frame however being rectangular instead of semi-circular. Next to the great drum of the Waganda tribe—an affair as large as the biggest hogshead sawed in half—there is not a more formidable or imposing musical instrument in use among the African tribes than the handja, which is certainly a remarkable illustration of unaided native ingenuity, combining in a rude fashion the leading principles of some of the most delicate, delightful and accurate musical instruments known to modern civilization.

Things to Forget.

If you would increase your happiness and prolong your life, forget your neighbor's faults. Forget all the slander you have ever heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the faultfinding, and give a little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the pe-give them smiles they will pay you back in smiles, and if you will give them frowns you will get frowns. A little boy ran into the house one day and said to his mother: "Mamma, there's a bad boy in our spring." "How do you know, my child?" she asked. "I saw him, and he made faces at me." "Well, there is a good little boy there, too, my son," said his mother. "Go and look into the spring and smile, and you will find him." And sure enough, the little boy soon came running back with a happy face, and said: "I saw him, mamma, I saw him! He's a nice, pretty little boy, and he laughed at me."

He didn't know that both the good and the bad boy had been made by his own face in the spring. So it is with older folks. Their actions are mirrored back to their own hearts and consciences, no matter whether the world knows it or not.

A Word About Advice.

"Never let your husband come home and find everything in disorder," said an old lady cheerfully, "but always take time to arrange things as he likes them best about the house, and always keep your children's faces clean, so he can kiss them and enjoy them, for no man loves a dirty-faced baby."

I thanked her warmly, writes T. P. in "The Housekeeper," for I knew her words sons, if listened to with giggles and pouts, as the case may be, have really been remembered. We will then feel repaid. As for the "good advice," I would say it should be given and taken in homœopathic doses, or else buried, and "peace to its ashes" be inscribed on its tombstone. I think that when a husband and wife set out to be equal partners in joys and sorrows, they should be so in reality, and the wife is wisest who does not try to always keep all unpleasant things from him, for the time will come when she will find that she cannot always do so.

Mexican Homes.

Home life in Mexico is widely different from that in our own land. "There is no more delightful place to visit than a Mexican 'hacienda,'" writes Rev. Geo. B. Winton. "Imagine a square of an acre or two inclosed by a strong wall of stone some twenty feet high. Inside are the houses, barns, corrals, stores, workshops, etc., to all of which one great portal gives entrance. This is the usual style of building in sections that were formerly much exposed to robbery. In other sections the various more important buildings are grouped around an open square, which serves as market place and general playground. Flanking the 'big house' and the church and barns are the huts of from one hundred to several thousand laborers. Some of these are the house servants, cooks, coachmen, porters and others, of which there are usually a large number.

"From the roof of the house, perhaps from the front door itself, there is a view of field and pasture, forest and hill, that stretch away and away till the far boundary is often lost beyond the blue horizon. Such is the Mexican 'hacienda.' Like its counterpart in our own country, it is the abode of cheerful hospitality. If you are a friend of the owner, you can come and go with perfect confidence, staying a day, a week, or a month, as you may please, and having the whole place at your command. And in the little plaza night by night, glitter the campfires of muleteers and other humble travelers, who camp thus under the shadow and protection of the house."

A Little Girl's Gift.

A little maid had a bed of strawberries. She watched them with great solicitude, until they ripened. At last they were ripe and her brother urged her to pick and eat the best. "No," said she. "I cannot eat these for they are the first ripe fruit." "Well, what of that?" he asked. "Father told us that he used to give God the first out of the money he made, and that then he always felt happier in spending the rest; and I wish to give God the first of my strawberries, too." "But," said her brother, "how can you give strawberries to God? And even if you could, he would not care for them." "Oh, I have found out a way," said she. "Jesus said, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' And I mean to go with them to Mrs. Perkins' dying child, who never sees a strawberry, they are so poor."

Away went the children to give them to the dying child, and when they saw her put out her thin arms to take the ripe, round fruit in her little, shriveled fingers, and when they saw her eyes glisten and her little lips smile, they felt as if they had a far richer treat than if they had kept the ripe fruit for themselves; and something within told them that God had accepted their little offering.

Trivial Worries.

We have read, somewhere, of a battle against cannibals gained by the use of tacks. They had taken possession of a whaling vessel, and bound the man who was left in care of it. The crew, on returning saw the situation, and scattered upon the deck of the vessel a lot of tacks, which penetrated the bare feet of the savages, and sent them howling into the sea. They were ready to meet lance and sword, but they could not overcome the tacks on the floor.

We brace ourselves up against great calamities. The little tacks of life, scattered along our way, piercing our feet and giving us pain, are hard to bear. Really, it is easier to dispose of those great questions which cover the world than it is to meet and successfully overcome the little worries which present themselves day by day.

cularities of your friends, and only remember the good points which make you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are. Blot out as far as possible all the disagreeables of life: they will come, but they will only grow larger when you remember them, and the constant thoughts of the acts of meanness, or, worse still, malice, will only tend to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday, start out with a clean sheet for to-day, and write upon it for sweet memory's sake only those things which are lovely and lovable.

Two Faces.

Our thoughts, feelings and actions reflect themselves. If you smile, the face in the glass will smile, and if you frown, the face in the glass will frown, and it's apt to be the same way with other people. If you were well meant, and promised to remember them, which I did, truly and faithfully following her advice to the letter, long after the old lady had gone to a better land, until it had become a part of my very nature to keep continually picking up and straightening things, for fear husband might come and find something out of fix, until it was perfect torture to see even a chair out of its proper place. As the years went by, and little ones came, I almost worked my fingers off in the effort to follow the "good advice." I think scarcely a day went by in all that time without recalling the words. But what was the effect on my better half? Just what I might have expected. He never knew anything about the efforts I made, and as long as everything was in order, supposed, like "Topsy," that they "jes' grewed."

I think that children of the present age are much like the little folks in Bible times, of whom it is said that they could be taught only by "line upon line, precept upon precept," and in time we will see that our les-

SAUL looked earnestly in the face of Karmes as he put his question, in which seemed to be summed up the results of their deliberation. He was evidently anxious that there should be no mistake about Thaeon being brought, by some means, to the Damascus Gate of Jerusalem soon after sunrise the next morning. One look at the face of the fierce Pharisee was sufficient to show that the appointment boded mischief for the young Nazarene. Small concern had Karmes with Thaeon's religion but he had his own reason for plotting against him. He showed no hesitation, but answered at once with the required promise and the reminder that Saul also was under an obligation.

"Thaeon shall be there," he said, glancing at the Pretorium, "and you too will keep your promise. I rely upon you to see that Zerola shall be sold as a slave. You promise?"

"I do."

"My slave?"

"By first right of purchase."

"It is agreed."

"Then, farewell," said Saul.

"Farewell," answered Karmes. "But remember, to-morrow at the Damascus gate. Farewell."

And they parted for the night.

Strange is the fact that, in moments when we little dream of such a thing, there may be enemies planning our ruin. Thaeon and Zerola were walking together just outside the city walls, and were filled with that joy of love which is the sure result of similarity of tastes, and community of aspiration. Perfect was their happiness; every flower seemed to breathe it, every brook seemed to ripple it, every star seemed to shine it. Happiness on the land, happiness on the waters, happiness in the seas, happiness in the cities: every tower seemed to gleam it, every wave seemed to dash it. Happiness in the forests, on the plains, on the mountains; every leaf trembled it, every breeze whispered it, every bird carolled it. Happiness, happiness!

They wandered far, heart speaking to heart, and each finding in the other response to thoughts and longings hitherto unuttered. When love has touched the fountains of being, life takes a new aspect, and the future is painted in roseate tints, to which each brings some new tinge of brightness. Happily for them, as for so many, neither could bring the gift of fore-knowledge. The present was full of joy, and as to the future, knowing nothing, they could paint the picture for themselves. If coming events do cast their shadows, as we are told, no shadow fell on those two young hearts, no premonition of coming evil troubled them.

Surely if their two enemies could have seen the sweet ecstasy of mutual love that filled their hearts, some feeling of compunction would have moved them. Yet they were not men likely to be touched by any such emotion. To the relentless persecutor it was enough that Thaeon was a follower of the Nazarene. Karmes had reminded him, too, that Thaeon was the son of Stephen, who had given up his life rather than his faith. Might not the spirit of the father live in the son and be more vigorous in the youthful frame? It would be well that he should die, otherwise the new heresy might be propagated with greater zeal in the younger hands. So Karmes had argued, knowing well what considerations would appeal to the persecutor. To himself Karmes said that Thaeon was the favored lover of Zerola. That was enough for him. He hated him as the lover, not as the Christian, and jealousy is as remorseless as bigotry. Saul would serve his purpose, and Karmes cared not what motive impelled him to do so, if only the motive was strong enough to carry him through without faltering. But Zerola must be secured, too. Saul might be so absorbed in the pursuit of the apostate, Thaeon, that he might be perfunctory as to the girl, but Karmes would see to that. It was part of the bargain. So the Egyptian looked forward to the morrow with confidence, and went over in anticipation all the details of the plot, and gloated over the coming misery of the two lovers. They, all unconscious of the impending evil, retraced their steps, and at the humble dwelling where Zerola was to sleep, separated for the night.

CHAPTER III.
THE APPOINTED HOUR.

The morning broke over Jerusalem, as dwellers in Western climes never see it break. It does not seem a sky that is spread over Palestine, but infinite space, gloriously clear, of an azure that speaks of immeasurable distance, not of color; and as the sun rises gilding the mountain tops, stretching long spears of light far up into the ether and athwart over the city, the glory of the king of day and the majesty of his coming impress every beholder. So rose the sun on that day eventful beyond others to the persons whose history I am writing.

Jerusalem is early astir as if with pre-science of coming events. The golden dome of the Temple is dazzling with its reflection of the rising sun. The carved columns of porphyry and polished marble are casting long shadows which are shortening every minute as the sun rises toward the zenith, and the silent cloisters are changing their aspect slowly and drowsily as if reluctant to give up the gloomy shadows which they love better than the forms of men whom the light will bring to break the quiet with hurrying footsteps and harsh strident voices. Already there is stir and movement. From one of the porticoes of the sacred edifice issues a band of men, whose elaborately embroidered robes indicate that they belong to the privileged class, who abide in the Temple and take part in the ancient services that have never been interrupted since Ezra reorganized the ceremonies and, after seventy years of silence, made Mount Moriah again a place of praise to the Holy One of Israel. But it is not of praise or worship that these men are thinking as they emerge from the Temple of God and make their way into the narrow streets of the newly awakened city. Saul of Tarsus is at their head with flashing eyes and resolute eager face. Small and slight of frame, but nervous and elastic of step and with power and energy that show him a born leader among men. The men follow him silently, knowing that where he leads there is a solemn tragedy to be enacted. They disappear down the steep street which leads into the city from the Temple height and are lost to view in the shadows of the houses.

The Temple is in the South-east of the venerable city. Away over in the Southern quarter, where the dwellings are more dilapidated than elsewhere; where squalid poverty reigns and the men look haggard and prematurely old, and the women listless and weary, there is another scene that will interest us. On the threshold of a miserable hovel stands a bright, beautiful girl of nineteen. Her hair is black, and long, and glossy, and as the sunlight touches it there comes among the shining tresses a golden sheen as if the sun was imparting some of its own glory to the graceful head. Her dark-brown eyes are full of tenderness, and they dwell lovingly on the group gathered in the low doorway to give her the word of peace as she goes forth. A poor, wretched dwelling it is, but they are men and women who live in it with warm hearts and the passionate love of kindred that the Jew shows wherever he is.

Life is very hard with these people. One sees that by their gloomy looks and their heavy steps. Sleepless nights and foodless days have driven the iron into their souls but there is less of patient endurance than of fierce resentment in their faces. They are poor and despised but untamed. Tiberius in his palace in Rome cannot understand these people whom he thinks he has broken to his yoke, but whom he finds ever and anon to be proud and haughty, dreading his anger, yet despising him and all his minions as heathen and outcast. Their God is angry with them now and, as he has done many times in their history, has suffered another nation to put a grievous yoke upon them. But they are his people, God's chosen race, descendants of Abraham the friend of God. The Roman with all his boasted power can attain no such dignity. It is theirs and theirs alone and he can never strip them of it, although he can make their lives bitter to them. They are a royal race, a peculiar people, the teachers of the nations, the custodians of the oracles of God and even these poorest of the race, as they gather about the beautiful girl at the threshold of their hovel, have an innate dignity of bearing, which their surroundings do not diminish. The girl herself has the manner of a queen and her broad low brow, and delicate features and mobile mouth would look well under a crown and should be set in flashing jewels. We recognize her as she smiles upon her kindred and in rich well-modulated tones, gives them response to the benediction they bestow on the departing guest. It is Zerola who is going out to meet her lover who will go with her to her home in Nazareth.

The girl lingered long before the words of final parting were exchanged.

"Farewell," she said at last.

"Farewell, Zerola," they answered.

It was over, and she was hastening through the street, her mind recalled by the very words to the scene at Nazareth, when, with the same words, her mother kissed her and bade her come back speedily to her own home where loving hearts were waiting to welcome her. Her camel waited for her outside the Damascus gate and, somewhere near, Thaeon would be waiting to greet her.

As she approached the gate she was surprised to see a great concourse of people pressing through its portals. It was too early for crowds to gather unless some unusual occurrence attracted them. It might be one of the Roman legions then stationed in Palestine, leaving Jerusalem for Caesarea or some other town, but as she listened, it was not the measured tramp of the soldiery that she heard, but the wild roar of a mob, a mob angry and excited, eager for bloodshed. What could it be? She stopped to let the crowd pass through the gate before she reached it. She did not want to witness bloodshed. She was no coward, and should occasion arise, she looked as if she could stand on a battlefield nerving and stimulating soldiers to the fight and ministering to the wounded and dying with unblanched cheek; but now with her young heart full of love and her thoughts with her mother in the peaceful village home, she shrank from a scene of violence and would willingly avoid it.

But what could it be? Wild vengeful cries fell upon her ear. Zerola knew that there were in that crowd fathers whose daughters were dishonored and were now immured in Roman dungeons, and sons who were groaning under Herod's cruel fetters or were forced into the ranks of Caesar's army to wage war in distant provinces. Could it be that at last the bitter wrongs had become too heavy to be borne and the men, feeling that a noble death was preferable to a dishonored life, were rushing headlong to destruction under Roman swords content if in their death they could strike even one blow at their oppressors? But no, it was not the cry of despairing patriotism that Zerola heard. She could not distinguish all the words that were being shouted out by the crowd, but she heard enough to know that some poor follower of the Nazarene was being hounded to his death and she cowered in the shadow to pray for the sufferer whoever he might be. Her heart bled for him and her words went up in tender pleading to the God of her people on his behalf. But how much more earnest would have been her cry could she have seen the face of the sufferer!

It was really a fanatical murder that the crowd was bent upon. Priests and zealots and rabid bigots laughed and pointed the finger of scorn at a prisoner who manacled at wrist and ankle was being dragged outside the gate to the place of stoning. Dust and blood are upon the wretched man's face, but beneath it we see the noble features of Thaeon who, decoyed from the place of his tryst with Zerola, has been seized by Saul of Tarsus and is being hurried to the place where his father, Stephen, surrendered his life a short time ago to the persecutors. Outside the gate the crowd halt, pressing around the victim whom they strike and spit upon. Then it separates and great heavy stones are hurled at him. He is prostrate now and the stony hail ceases. They think he is dead; but no, he stirs, he rises to his knees. His eyes are raised heavenward and the prayer of his dying father leaves his lips, "Lord lay not this sin to their charge. Lord Jesus receive my spirit." Then wrapping his loose upper garment around his face and head, he falls prostrate in his blood. Is he dead? No; a quiver of the limbs and a palpitation of the body show that the young life is still clinging to the body. One of the crowd raises a great stone to hurl at him; but another interposes though not in mercy.

"Let alone," he cries; "it is too easy a death for the dog of a Nazarene. Let him suffer. He will die too soon."

The man to whom he spoke nodded his head and laughed, and the two stood with the others feasting their eyes on the dying struggles of the young martyr.

A disturbance was noted on the outskirts of the crowd and a woman's pleading voice was heard, followed by the crash of some earthenware vessel. "What is it?" ask several eager voices.

"A woman! Room for the woman! She brought water for the Nazarene dog. One struck it from her hands. Where is the accursed? Bring her hither. She, too, is a blasphemer. Let her die with him. Where is the woman? Shed her blood with the water she brought."

Cries of one and another came from various members of the crowd, and Karmes, who is in the first ranks, recognizing the woman as Zerola, is loudest in his clamor for her punishment. But he nevertheless works his way through the throng and keeps her from being injured. He wants her reserved for a fate worse than death. Saul also made his way to her side, at a signal from the Egyptian. The keen, piercing gaze of the great leader, under which in future years many would quail, was fixed on the girl's countenance and seemed to be reading her soul. She met it unflinchingly, although she knew the man and knew him as the relentless enemy of her faith. But she glanced from Saul to the body of the martyr, whom, his face being covered with his mantle, she did not know as her lover, she suddenly became resolute and even defiant as she said in a voice tremulous with passion barely controlled:

"You speak of a blasphemer! I do not know where you will find one. But wait. Perhaps I can tell you. Dogs of that kind often carry scrolls, and skulk in crowns. Therefore, go look in the Temple or the Palace! But possibly I mistake your meaning. Blasphemer? If it is to have a human heart and a woman's soul, if it is to be a follower of the Nazarene whom ye despise and crucified, then I am a blasphemer! You priests, who only break the commandments you profess to keep, look upon the bleeding body of your brother, and behold in it the cruelty and the impotency of your corpse-like creeds. For even now the man whose blood is on your hands and sacred robes, is with that God whose servants ye kill as did your fathers, and whose laws ye blaspheme!"

Such words, at such a time, in such an age, could have only one result. The soldiers immediately received their orders: the fetters were soon fastened upon the ankles and wrists of the captive girl, and she was dragged in disgrace through the streets of Jerusalem.

The Egyptian followed the soldiers, keeping his black eyes on the maiden prisoner as he muttered to himself:

"My slave—yes a slave in the power of Karmes!" And he gloated over his triumph.

Saul had hurried on ahead to the Judgment Hall to make the accusation.

That afternoon the court of Jerusalem which attended to such prisoners, disposed of the young Nazarene. But she was not made aware of their decision until the morning.

That night Zerola slept on the stones of a dungeon beneath the walls of a Roman palace, little dreaming that she might now be separated forever from her lover and from the fond mother who that evening had seen the sun go down and the twilight darken into night, as she stood on the threshold of their home and watched for the return of her daughter across the hills and through the olive groves of Nazareth.

ASSYRIAN MONUMENTS.

AMONG the most remarkable archaeological finds in recent years are the Assyrian sculptures, from ancient Nineveh, which have now been removed to the British Museum. The preservation of these valuable art-relics may be said to be chiefly due to the circumstance of their being carvings upon thin slabs of stone. Had large blocks been employed it is doubtful if they would ever have been brought to European museums where their historical value can be justly appreciated. It is doubtful, too, in that case, whether they would have escaped destruction by violence or the ravages of time. But it fortunately happened that when the ancient buildings were destroyed, these precious relics were safely buried amongst the debris, and some of them are to this day almost as fresh and perfect as when they were finished by the sculptors of ancient Nineveh.

The best period of Assyrian sculpture is that of Assur-bani-pal, or Sardanapalus as he has sometimes been called. The delineation of animals was at this time most admirably true to nature, vegetable forms had lost much of their stiffness, and there were several examples of successful foreshortening; but, curiously enough, the Assyrian artist was rarely, if ever, successful in human portraiture. Assur-bani-pal was in every sense a great king. His tastes were of a liberal and refined character. He was not merely a warrior and a sportsman, but he was also a great patron of literature and the arts. He built the most magnificent of all the Assyrian palaces, and collected within its walls the finest sculptures which could be produced by native artists. He had a mind in advance of his time. While other Kings had been content to leave behind them records of their exploits inscribed on stone tablets and cylinders, he was who founded the vast collection of clay tablets whereon were inscribed comparative vocabularies and other information of the most valuable kind, including the legends which relate to the Creation and the Deluge.

On many accounts the obelisk of Shalmanesar II., (858-823 B.C.), may be considered to claim a foremost place in the collection. It records, by inscriptions and pictorial illustrations, the tribute brought to the Assyrian King by five people. The King Shalmanesar II., is twice depicted, and near him, in both instances, are the winged circle or globe, the token of the Supreme Deity, and one of the heavenly bodies, the sun or a star. There are five panels of sculptured figures on each of the four sides of the monument, and above and below them is an inscription 200 lines in length. The animals depicted comprise the elephant, rhinoceros, two-humped camel, wild bull, lion, stag, and various kinds of monkeys. The most important fact about this monument, however, is the valuable confirmation it gives to Bible history. In the second panel from the top on one side (shown in the illustration), we have a representation of the offering of the tribute of Jehu, King of Israel. The prostrate figure before the Assyrian monarch is supposed to be either King Jehu himself or his ambassador. The inscription relates that Shalmanesar received from Jehu, in the form of tribute, "silver, gold, pitchers of gold, lead, sceptres for the King's hand, and staves." Another important Biblical monument is the bas-relief representing the siege of Lachish by Sennacherib as described in II Chron. 32. The story of the subsequent destruction of the hosts of this King of Assyria is told in the Second Book of Kings, and in the prophecies of Isaiah.

HINDOO FANATICISM.

In a letter from India, Mr. Herbert Francis, thus describes some incidents of the great fair at Allahabad, (city of God), "On the banks of the Ganges" he writes, "is a place where a poor Hindu lived without ever leaving the spot for forty years. He died a short time ago, and now another man has taken his place. Another spot is devoted to the Fakirs. Pen cannot fully describe this horror of heathen darkness and devil-

dom. In rows, were hundreds of these wretched creatures, some lying without any clothing, covered with (wood) ashes, their faces painted in almost every other color, their hair matted with filth, some dancing wildly in front of us, some drugged with narcotics; all looking more like demons than men. This sight made one better able to imagine Hell. On some of the stands in front of which these poor creatures lay were several long planks of wood with a forest of sharp iron points two inches long, so sharp that they must have been driven into the flesh of the devotees who recline upon them. We saw multitudes, old and young alike, eagerly rushing into the Ganges; some throwing flowers into them, others drinking the waters, although many dead bodies are often seen floating down the stream, and the water was dark with mud and dirt. Presently we came to where the monkey god was lying, covering a space of about 15 ft. square. Money was placed upon its hideous limbs. Throngs of people touched it, and, being composed of red clay, the red substance was transferred to the fingers, and from thence to the forehead of the worhipper. Think of 1,200 natives passing into eternity every hour in India. What can we do to evangelise the millions of India?"

A SCIENTIST ON CHRIST.

Sir Wm. Dawson, the eminent scientist of Canada, discoursed lately to a band of theological students, and among other things, he said: "I have read recently, I confess with feelings of contempt, discussions respecting the supposed limitations of the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Did he know the data of modern criticism? Was he acquainted with the discoveries of modern science? The fly alighting on my hand might as well attempt to understand the thoughts passing through my mind, as criticism to gauge in this way the mind of Christ. To me, as a student for fifty years, of nature, of man, and of the Bible, such discussions seem most frivolous, since our Lord's knowledge, as we have it in his reported discourses, is altogether above and beyond our science and philosophy; transcending them as much as the vision of an astronomer, armed with one of the great telescopes of our time, transcends the unaided vision of a gnat. Christ views things from a standpoint of his own, and through a different medium from the atmosphere of this world. His difficulty appears to be to convey heavenly thoughts to us through the imperfect language in which we speak of earthly thoughts."

MY FATHER'S BIBLE.

MY Book! my Book! my grand old Book
By inspiration given!
Thy every page from age to age,
Reveals the way to heaven.
My Star of Light, in nature's night,
Thy unobscured ray
Has turned the gloom of death and tomb
To everlasting day:
My Chart, my Chart, my trusty Chart,
By thee I guide my bark,
A simple child on ocean wild
O'er mountain billows dark,
By thee I steer in safe career
With canvas all unfurled,
And onward sail, before the gale,
To yonder distant world.
My Staff! my Staff! my trusty Staff,
I'll grasp thee in my hand;
As faint and weak on Pisgah's peak
I view the promised land;
Not sadly told, as once of old,
To see but not explore:
My hold I'll keep through Jordan's deep,
Till safe on Canaan's shore.
My Sword! my Sword! my two-edged Sword
By thy unerring might,
I'll deal the foe the deadly blow
In faith's unequal fight;
Thy tempered blade that gave me aid
In every conflict past,
Shall make me more than conqueror,
Through him that loved at last.
My Book! my Book! my grand old Book!
Heaven speed thee on thy way,
From pole to pole, as ages roll
The harbinger of day:
'Till Christ the Light, shall banish night
From this terrestrial ball,
And earth shall see her jubilee
And God be all in all.—W.H.ROBERTS.

A CHINESE WOMAN'S SACRIFICE.

Pastor Hsi, a native Chinese Christian, was a most devoted servant of Christ. The city of Hoh-chau (writes Mr. Hudson Taylor, the well-known missionary), on the main road to the capital, was much on the heart of Pastor Hsi. Day by day, at family prayers, he pleaded for that place and neighborhood, deeply feeling its spiritual destitution. At last his wife said to him:

"You are always praying for Hoh-chau. Why do you not go and commence an Opium Refuge there, as you have done in so many other places?"

"I have spent all," he replied, "that I can use in this way; unless the Lord supply the means, no more can be attempted."

"Why," she responded, "what do you think it would cost?"—"Twenty to thirty thousand cash," he answered gravely. (About £5 sterling.)

When the wife heard that she went away and said no more. But she could not forget it. There was a city needing the Gospel. Here were ready, willing workers, longing to enter it. But means were lacking. What could she do?

Next morning the good pastor pleaded, as usual, the need and darkness of Hoh-chau. What was his surprise, as he rose from his knees, to see his wife standing beside him with all her jewelry, including many much prized possessions, which she handed to him, saying, "I can do without these. Sell them, and let Hoh-chau have the Gospel."

Here, surely, is a striking lesson for Christian sisters at home! The city soon had its opium refuge and a good work commenced.

That Tired Feeling

So common at this season, is a serious condition, liable to lead to disastrous results. It is a sure sign of declining health tone, and that the blood is impoverished and impure. The best and most successful remedy is found in

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practiced by George Thomas Congreve.

TENTH INTERVIEW,

By our Special Commissioner,

With Mrs. JOHN FRASER, West Free Manse, Brechin, with reference to Case of ANN THOM, &c.

FOUR CASES OF SUCCESSFUL TREATMENT, one of which was published (in the weekly papers) in August, 1890.

I should very much have liked to have had the company of some of those sceptical people who will not believe that Consumption is curable, when, one beautiful summer's morning, I rang the bell at the West Free Manse, Brechin, one of the old walled cities of Scotland, though the gates have long been removed, and there is nothing left to remind one that it has more than once suffered by the incursions of invaders and broils of civil wars.

In answer to my ring the door was opened by a strong, healthy-looking, Scotch lassie, and in a few moments I was ushered into the presence of Mrs. Fraser, the wife of the minister of the West Free Church. My first question had reference to the present health of a young woman who, some year or two previously, had suffered much from chest disease, in whom Mrs. Fraser, in the goodness of her heart, had evinced great interest.

"Why, it was she who opened the door to you," replied Mrs. Fraser. "Perhaps you would like to see her for yourself."

Anticipating my desire, Mrs. Fraser left the room, and returned with the neat housemaid already referred to. Certainly there was nothing in her appearance to suggest that she had suffered from any form of chest disease. But what are the facts?

To summarise an account which has already appeared in print, I may say that Ann Thom comes of a consumptive family. There had been chest disease on the father's side, and one sister had already fallen a victim to the fell complaint. Early in the year 1889 Ann Thom was taken ill, and soon developed many symptoms occurring in well-marked cases of consumption. Cough, wasting of flesh, night perspiration, general debility, pains in the chest, palpitation, and shortness of breath, all told only too plainly that she, too, had inherited the seeds of the terrible disease, and with the consent of her local medical man, and on the recommendation of Mrs. Fraser, she placed herself in the hands of Mr. Congreve.

In one short month an improvement was noticeable: two months later, upon examination by the doctor referred to, she was pronounced free from active disease, and by his advice she remained a patient of Mr. Congreve. As a result of this, she passed the winter well, and in the spring went out in all weathers, and was recovered sufficiently to enter Mrs. Fraser's service, where she remained to this day.

And now, according to her own statement, she is in robust health, which her appearance strongly indicates. This case was published in some of our weekly journals in August, 1890.

But Mrs. Fraser knew of some other results achieved by Mr. Congreve's medicine, and told me of one case—a lady, residing in Edinburgh, who had, to use her own words, "been condemned to die in a fortnight," and who afterwards, thanks to Mr. Congreve, was able to walk nine miles. Although this is some years ago, Mrs. Fraser was in a position to say that, as far as she knew, that lady was still keeping well.

One more case mentioned by Mrs. Fraser in conclusion:

"I met a lady in a Hydropathic at Forres," she said, "a lady whose name I do not know, or have forgotten. There were a number of consumptive-looking people staying in the 'hydro,' and I remarked to this lady that I wished someone would tell them of Mr. Congreve's treatment. She replied that she could well do so, for she had been quite cured of consumption by Mr. Congreve, as had her niece, whose belief in the efficacy of the remedy was boundless, and she made a practice of giving it to anyone she knew who suffered from even the early symptoms of a cough or cold."

No less than four cases known to this one lady living in a quiet little Scotch town. Verily, as I said before, I should have liked to have had the company in my visit to this Free Church Manse of some sceptics such as I have named.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be before your eyes, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00, $1.75, $3.75 or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

THE BOOK SHELF

AN INFIDEL AWAKENED.*

ON the 22d of December, 1870, I went to labor in Monmouth Square Church, Charlestown. Through the day I made calls, and in several instances the truth was made real to the hearers, and they received marked light. In the evening services God was wonderfully with us, subduing the erring, the blasphemers, the infidel, and the moralist. All these now proclaim what victory there is in Christ. One interesting case was that of a young man who was an infidel. He came to me after a meeting and frankly said:

"I am an infidel, but I would do anything I could to get what that neighbor of mine has. He is always rejoicing, even if he is in trouble. He calls it divine grace. Of course I think he is mistaken about that, but I would do anything to have what he has."

"Do you mean what you say?" I asked. "Of course I do."

"You said you would be willing to do anything you could to get it. Will you stand by that statement?"

"Yes, I will."

"Are you willing that I should test you? Will you give me your word of honor that you will not go back from what you have said?"

"Yes; with all my heart."

Then I said, confidently, "If you abide by the testing you will find. To-morrow evening, when I give the invitation to those who desire to find a satisfying portion to come forward and kneel at the front seat, I want you to come; you can do that."

"I do not want to take the part of a hypocrite," he replied.

"You need not. When you come forward, tell the congregation you are an infidel, and relate all the circumstances."

This he did the next evening. When he had finished, I bade him kneel and repeat for half an hour, "God be merciful to me, a sinner;" adding, "Let not your mind be distracted by the circumstances around you. On returning home refrain from conversation, and go immediately to your room." I knew that after saying those words for half an hour it would be difficult to get them out of his mind immediately, and the Spirit would have opportunity to reason with him. He afterward told me that he tried to sleep, but "God be merciful to me, a sinner," would keep coming into his mind. Very naturally he began to question, "Am I a sinner? If so, to what degree?" Deep conviction was the result, followed by a sense of relief that there might be a God who would pardon him. He began to seek the Lord, and soon found him, to the joy of his soul. It was impressive to hear him say to his young comrades, as he stood there near Bunker Hill, "If I should tell you there was gold under that hill and you laughed and mocked, I would simply say I had dug and found, and that you had no right to laugh until you had made search without success. You think there is no God, but I have found him; and if you seek him with all your heart, you will discover that he will be found of you."

THE PLEASURES OF TRAVEL.

Vivid pleasures are not found in the whirl of travel. Though amidst changing scenes, one feels satisfied, not joyous. The days flow placidly in the contemplation of dream-like realities. You drink copiously in the beautifully wrought wisdom-cup which Dame Nature daintily serves. Going from country to country, while observing at every hour some new and striking fact, quenches the thirst for knowledge with an invigorating beverage. Some travel merely that they may be able to say they have traveled; others, more serious, do so that they may read many pages in the infinite book of life. And these students cannot see much without remembering much; there could be for them no deeper tountain of learning.

Can one find happiness in these peregrinations? He who seeks it there is a fool or a child. 'Tis the rainbow in the ever-receding horizon which baby fingers would touch. No! There cannot be bliss even for the most favored of travelers; what would have been the use of inventing a paradise if it could be found on earth? Chamfort said it was difficult to find happiness in ourselves, and impossible elsewhere. Schopenhauer, the philosopher, who has seen the world, wrote that it consisted in undisturbed leisure, and great intellect, with freedom from pain and boredom. To Aristotle, happiness consisted in leisure. I am quite content if I can enter merely the peristyle of the Temple of Felicity, through the opportunities for travel, equanimity of temper, the possession of liberty, competence, health, education, the friendship of a few equals, and the power to borrow no trouble and to disdain the inevitable.

Socrates praised leisure as the fairest of all possessions. Yet, with this do nothing there comes a serious obstacle to happiness. "It is so difficult to keep quiet when one has nothing to do." The result is that you begin to travel in quest of keen pleasures, and, instead, you find but mild amusements after much labor sometimes amounting to hardship. Upon returning home you begin to think it were preferable not to have gone. Having enjoyed better things than your own country affords, it becomes difficult to relish existence there again for a prolonged period. You have acquired tastes which cannot be gratified simultaneously anywhere. You feel "blase," almost disgusted with life itself. Work, the universal panacea, is inefficacious against your melancholy. Then you conclude it was folly that impelled you far from your birthplace in quest of ephemeral pleasures which were to be accompanied by so many regrets.

THE SOURCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

After an early breakfast at Camp Shure tents were struck and an hour later we were in our canoes, paddling up the Southwestern arm of Lake Itasca, it being the intention to establish a permanent camp and base of operations on the south side of the elevation of land which separates that arm of Itasca from the beautiful sheet of water, now generally recognized as the true source of the Mississippi. As we approached the southern end of the lake, my companions seemed more than usually interested, and, resting on our paddles, we paused a few moments to scan its shores. To me the scene was quite familiar, but to them it was new and strange and full of material for future investigation; for it was this portion of Itasca, together with the fine lake beyond, and their respective feeders, which had occupied the attention of geographers for more than ten years. Entering on our right is a trickling rivulet having no well-defined course, and of little consequence. Directly in front is a small stream usually denominated Nicollet Creek—the outlet of ponds situated in marshes to the southward. This creek and the insignificant ponds in which it originates were seen and entered by Nicollet in 1836, Julius Chambers in 1872, and again by my party in 1881; and have since been visited, christened and re-christened so many times, by two or three enterprising parties from St. Paul, that it is now extremely doubtful if the people of Minnesota or elsewhere, have any definite idea of their claim to serious consideration. . . . Resuming our observations, I may explain that we are still in our canoes looking southward. On our right the west shore of Itasca is fringed with pine, while in our front its southern end and the eastern shore on our left are covered with tamarack, excepting the open space at the summit of a hill near the southern extremity of the lake. The Hauteur de Terre range of hills may be clearly seen in the distance, and between those hills and the knoll there is a peculiar light which indicates to the practised eye of the woodsman that there is a large body of water beyond. No portion of Itasca presents so many features of striking interest as this, and were it not that imperative duties urge us forward to other fields of equal and even greater interest we would gladly have waited longer where there was so much to admire.

Passing from the scene which had held our attention for half-an-hour I carefully scanned the eastern shore for the mouth of the infant Mississippi the view being obstructed now, as in 1881 by a rank growth of weeds, rushes and wild rice. Fixing my eyes upon a small pine, which marks the precious point of entrance, we turned the canoes and pushed them through the dense vegetation into the clear waters of the inlet. . . . We continued to move up the stream in our canoes until stopped by falling trees; then disembarking, we hastened forward on foot to the crest of the hill which overlooks the source of the Mississippi and its outlet. This beautiful body of water, the Po-keg-a-ma of the Chippewas—re-named "Lake Glazier" by my companions of my first expedition—is the primal Reservoir.

THE GREATEST OF MIRACLES.

Jesus at the tomb.—Majestic calm of conscious, unbroken communion! The emotion is past, and the habitual calm majesty reassumed. The command to take away the stone is in accord with Christ's continual economy in the use of miraculous power. Whatever man can do is to be done by man; and, besides, the men whose hands rolled away the stone were made witnesses of the resurrection.

John has a delicate touch in reminding us of Martha's relationship to "him that was dead," as explaining the natural shrinking of her love from the exposure of the dear form in its dishonor. But she was faltering in her faith, or she would not have so spoken. Therefore Jesus puts out a hand to hold her up, as he did to Peter sinking, and his reminder of the previous conversation puts its true purport into other words. He had, in effect, told her that, if she believed, she would see the glory of God, when he had sought to draw out her faith, and spread before her astonished eyes the resurrection and the life which come by faith. Her faith was not the condition of the miracle, but it was of her enjoying (seeing) all that the miracle meant and prophesied. The outward fact might be seen by eyes all blind to the glory that shone in it.

With like majesty sounds the solemn thanksgiving before the mighty act. It was not a prayer, such as Martha had meant. He does not ask for a gift, but he gives thanks. He traces, indeed, as always, the miracle to the Father; for he does nothing of himself, and gives life to whom he will in conformity with the Father's gift. But that relation is by no means parallel with the relation of other men who wrought miracles by Divine power, and must be taken in conjunction with the teaching of chapter 5; for he has the consciousness of unbroken common with the Father, and of continual fulfillment of his will.

The prayer of thanksgiving, then, was spoken in order that the bystanders might, by hearing it, and seeing the miracle that followed, be led to recognize the true import of the miracle as a sign that he was sent from God. The prayer was a solemn appeal to God, a confident assumption of what was to follow. If it did follow, the appeal was effectual and the conclusion plain.

EDUCATING THE NEGRO.

Rev. Dr. Brockett Writes of the Progress Made in North Carolina.

HERE is probably no more important problem in the South to-day than the education of the negro. From time to time, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has made mention of the progress of educational and evangelical work among the colored population in different parts of the Southern States, and especially in the Carolinas, Florida, Mississippi and Tennessee. In a letter to this journal from Rev. John A. Brockett, the writer gives a very encouraging picture of work of this class in North Carolina at the present time. He writes: "Four years ago I left Boston to engage in a work of education for my race. My native

REV. JOHN A. BROCKETT.

State, North Carolina, naturally became my field of labor. After a time the Senatorial Educational Committee invited me to visit Southern Pines, N. C., and examine it as a field for practical educational work, giving special provision to manual training. In June, 1893, I prepared to enter upon the work, and with my family, we went to our field of experimental labor. To say that we have built a University in one year would be a mistake. But something has been accomplished. Hon. J. T. Patrick, of Southern Pines, placed at our disposal a new house which was very well adapted to the work. We began by opening a school for a summer session of six weeks. Mrs. Brockett working with me side by side. While this work was in progress, with the help of friends, we began the erection of our first school building. Success crowned our efforts, and we had our first Christmas exercises in our new school house, which was indeed dedicated to the Christ-Child and the uplifting of the poor. The total enrollment for the first year was fifty-six students, and the summer session eighteen. Through the kindness of a philanthropic lady of Cambridge, Mass., we have secured a fine tract of land, covering 252½ acres. I expect in a few years to make this tract of land maintain the school. Through strict economy, our teachers have been paid in full. We are in the southwestern part of the State. Looking south, we are forty-five miles from the boundary line between North and South Carolina. The population we have to draw from is between 80,000 and 100,000 souls. In the county schools the negro receives his proportion of the school fund provided from the tax of the citizens of the State, which at best provides this large number of people with open schools in the rural districts two months and a-half during the year.

"The one building we have will not meet the demands of our work for the coming year, and we are preparing to erect two new buildings this summer. One of these buildings is for a trade department for boys, and the other for girls—an Industrial Hall. In this latter building we propose to have departments in which cooking, sewing, laundering, and domestic work will be taught. "One of the encouraging features of the work is that the young colored men in business and engaged in the professions here in the South have been among its most cheerful supporters. Students come to the school at the cost of $1 per month for tuition, or $9 per year. Not much, to be sure, yet the lack of that seeming insignificant sum will prevent many a bright boy and girl from attending school the coming year. We expect to have one hundred such scholarships for the opening of the school next September.

"The 'Building and Trades College' (our corporate name), is established to give the negroes a thorough grounding in English, teach them useful trades, and make them worthy members of society and productive factors in the community they live."

Rev. Dr. Brockett's work at Southern Pines is warmly endorsed by many high state and national officials. It is a moral as well as an industrial work in which he is engaged, and well worthy of general support.

TRUE CONSOLATION.

NO more beautiful letter of consolation from one Christian to another, bowed under affliction, was ever found than these sentences from a South Carolina lady to a friend in Mississippi:

"The Lord knows the soldiers he can put to the sharpest tests. He did not demand the supreme surrender of Abraham at the start, but after the years of blessed friendship which had taught love, and trained trust, and strengthened the father's feet to climb the slopes of Mount Moriah. It does not surprise me that God's faithful servants are put to harder tests than his raw recruits.

"When I heard of your sorrow, my mind instinctively reverted to an expression in your letter—that you were 'anxious to spend your remaining years in the service of your generation.' May it not be that by patiently suffering now, you may speak as eloquently of his grace as in the days of active service? Truth lived is always mightier than truth spoken. The Cross of Calvary taught us what words could never have done. May not a cross borne bravely to-day, for his sake, reveal more than a hundred sermons? And if so, can we ask truer comfort? Life is short. The end will soon come, and then—the crown, the 'well done,'—the open door of the 'Father's house,' and the reunion with those from whom we have never really been separated, if we have been united in him, they rejoice 'in his presence' to-day. We, 'having not seen,' love none the less. They serve him in the upper temple, we in the outer court—they with songs, we with tears; but the service is one—his will is the music to which both lives are set. He, the supreme joy, and desire, and satisfaction of each; there may be a brief lapse in the sweet interchange of glance and speech, but there can be no heart-separation. We meet in him."

A YOUTHFUL HERO.

THE heroes were not all on one side during the late war, as the following incident, related by a Southern exchange, will show:

The day after the battle of Fredericksburg, Kershaw's brigade occupied Mary's Hill, and Sykes' division lay one hundred and fifty yards ahead, with a stone wall between the two forces. The intervening space between Sykes' men and the stone wall was strewn with dead, dying and wounded Union soldiers, victims of the battle of the day before. The air was rent with their groans and the agonizing cries of "Water! water!" "General," said a boy sergeant in gray, "I can't stand this." "What is the matter, sergeant?" asked the general. "I can't stand hearing those wounded Yankees crying for water. May I go and give them some?" "Kirkland," said the general, "the moment you step over the wall you'll get a bullet through your head: the skirmishing has been murderous all day." "If you'll let me, I'll try it." "My boy, I ought not to let you run such a risk, but I cannot refuse. God protect you! You may go." "Thank you, sir," and with a smile on his bright, handsome face, the boy sergeant sprang over the wall, down among the sufferers, pouring the water down their parched throats.

After the first few bullets, his Christ-like errand became understood.

He came back at night to his bivouac untouched. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

MARION HARLAND IN BETHANY.

Our Traveler Visits the Home of Mary and Martha—Slatternly Housewives and Untidy Children—The Mania for Barter—Buying a Baby-Bag—Vanished Illusions.

CN excellent road connects Jerusalem with Bethany. The city boasts of but one handsome carriage ("the Laundau," always pronounced with a capital letter, belonging to the Grand Hotel), yet comfortable conveyances may be hired without the Jaffa Gate. That into which David packs our rugs, the camera, and lastly the women of the little party, is commodious, if shabby.

"As you will observe, madam, it has been washed this morning," says the honest dragoman, withdrawing a space to contemplate complacently the effect of the unwonted process. As I have said to the driver, a muddy carriage does not go well with a day like this.

We have alighted to look back at the city, and to remark again upon the growth of the settlement without the walls, for the most part hospitals, convents and the private residences of consuls and well-to-do citizens. The day is glorious; respiration is a luxury. The stony hill-sides can never look cheerful except in the brief blossom season; but under the cloudless blue arch of this sky, they are resigned in expression and almost benignant.

My companions within the lately-washed vehicle are a newly arrived fellow-countrywoman, bright of face and of nature, and the native Syrian matron, who acts as my intelligent interpreter in the jealously-guarded homes where the foot of a strange man may not tread. We have crossed the waterless bed of Kidron; run the gauntlet of the leprous beggars mustering in force on the south side of the wall of Gethsemane, holding our breaths in passing, the odor of the collecting bodies being overpowering when so large a delegation is abroad; have traced with serious eyes the "Path of the Captivity" winding around the shoulder of the height upon which the city is built, "said by tradition to be the way along which Christ our Lord was led after his betrayal."

We have flanked Olivet and come into sight of the open country. The road is lively with foot-passengers, generally market-women with great baskets or bundles of green stuff upon their heads—oftener bundles than baskets. It is surprising what variety of commodities can be contained in a fold of the Syrian woman's blue cotton robe, or be enveloped in the dingy cloth knotted about her cargo. Beets, turnips, cauliflower, carrots, eggs, oranges, potatoes, cheeses—chiefest of all, cabbages—are thus carried with ease and in safety. Donkeys pace by, under loads of faggots and greens, and dark-visaged men seated stolidly upon the beasts' rumps, and we meet a string of camels, coming up from Jericho, loaded with oranges and citrons, and hugging one side of the white road. Upon the hill-top to the right we see a building which we are told is the reputed house of Simon the Leper.

"Then we must be nearing Bethany?"

"We are in Bethany!"

The invariable group of children, a couple of beggars, and divers women, appear in doors and from behind walls to stare at us. The terraces and houses have an intermittent backing of the saddest-looking olives we have yet beheld in this saddened land.

"Bethany!" we reiterate in wonder and disbelief. "Where is the town?"

This is all of it, and the two women who are bribed with a few "metalliks" (pennies) to stand out upon the platform of their house to be photographed, are representative matrons. They have no scruples about letting us see their faces, etiquette in this respect being less stringent among the peasants than in the town and with the higher classes of society. Whatever other objects and occasions of carefulness and trouble these housewives may have, the business of keeping themselves and their children clean is not ranked as an essential to peace of mind or comfort. Their own gowns are ragged and dirty; their hands horny and filthy, albeit the nails, like those of the little girl who lugs an inconceivably dirty baby upon her hip, are dyed with henna. The children are, as the uninitiated new arrival at my elbow shudderingly whispers, "horrors!" sore-eyed, barefooted and unclean. One, sour of visage, a "kafeyeh," stiff with dirt, bound above matted locks, hugs track, and stops to inspect us. By some accident, his face is clean, and the soiled sheepskin jacket beneath his abie does not disguise a certain careless grace of bearing. His eyes are bright and healthy, his cheeks glow ro-sily.

"Ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look at!"

The model frown is slightly, the sun striking full in his eyes, but the erect carriage of figure and head that gives something kingly to the boyish figure, is preserved.

"Such a fellow must be regarded as a freak in Bethany," comments his admirer, clicking the "film" into position.

The best house in Bethany is at hand. The stone platform, or terrace, on which it perches, sets the front and ugly door ten feet above the level of the nearest neighbor's. A ladder, fitted with rungs, not steps, must be mounted if we would accept the invitation extended in smile and beck by the mistress of the eyrie. One by one, we three women adventure the climb, and stand beside our hostess on a ledge, maybe fifteen feet in width. It looks down into the court of the "House of Lazarus," a blackened build-

(From a photograph secured in Palestine for "The Christian Herald.")

The carriage has come to a full stop again, and we get out in blank bewilderment. Upon one hand the ground slopes away into stony fields; upon the other, half ruined huts of stone, perhaps a dozen in number, straggle up a rudely terraced hill.

a mangy dog, whose eyes are as sore as his master's.

We are on our way up a narrow, steep alley, abominable for pollutions, but the only means of approach to "the best house in Bethany," when a boy bounds into the

The TABERNACLE PULPIT

LAUGHTER.

Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Psalm 126: 2, "Then was our mouth filled with laughter," and Psalm 2: 4, "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh."

THIRTY-EIGHT times does the Bible make reference to this configuration of the features and quick expulsion of breath which we call laughter. Sometimes it is born of the sunshine and sometimes the midnight. Sometimes it stirs the sympathies of angels and sometimes the cachinnation of devils. All healthy people laugh. Whether it pleases the Lord or displeases him; that depends upon when we laugh and at what we laugh. My theme to-day is the laughter of the Bible, namely: Sarah's laugh, or that of scepticism; David's laugh, or that of spiritual exultation; the fool's laugh, or that of sinful merriment; God's laugh, or that of infinite condemnation; heaven's laugh, or that of eternal triumph.

Scene: An Oriental tent; the occupants, old Abraham and Sarah, perhaps wrinkled and decrepit. Their three guests are three angels—the Lord Almighty one of them. In return for the hospitality shown by the old people, God promises Sarah that she shall become the ancestress of the Lord Jesus Christ. Sarah laughs in the face of God; she does not believe it. She is affrighted at what she has done. She denies it. She says: "I didn't laugh." Then God retorted with an emphasis that silenced all disputation: "But thou didst laugh." My friends, the laugh of scepticism, in all ages, is only the echo of Sarah's laughter. God says he will accomplish a thing; and men say it cannot be done. A great multitude laugh at the miracles. They say they are contrary to the laws of nature. What is a law of nature? It is God's way of doing a thing. Alas! for the folly of those who laugh at God when he says: "I will do a thing;" they responding: "You can't do it." God says that the Bible is true—it is all true. Bishop Colenso laughs; Herbert Spencer laughs; Stuart Mill laughs; great German Universities laugh; Harvard laughs—softly! A great many of the learned institutions with long rows of professors seated on the fence between Christianity and Infidelity, laugh softly. They say: "We did n't laugh." That was Sarah's trick. God thunders from the heavens: "But thou didst laugh." The Garden of Eden was only a fable. There never was any Ark built; or if it was built, it was too small to have two of every kind. The pillar of fire by night was only the Northern lights. The ten plagues of Egypt only a brilliant specimen of jugglery. The sea parted, because the wind blew violently a great while from one direction. My friends, there is not a doctrine or statement of God's Holy Word that has been derided by the scepticism of the day. I take up this book of King James's translation. I consider it a perfect Bible; but here are sceptics who want it torn to pieces. And now, with this Bible in my hand, let me tear out all those portions which the scepticism of this day demands shall be torn out. What shall go first? "Well," says someone in the audience, "take out all that about the Creation, and about the first settlement of the world." Away goes Genesis. "Now," says someone, "take out all that about the miraculous guidance of the children of Israel in the wilderness." Away goes Exodus. "Now," says someone else in the audience, "there are things in Deuteronomy and Kings that are not fit to be read." Away go Deuteronomy and the Kings. "Now," says someone, "the Book of Job is a fable that ought to come out." Away goes the Book of Job. "Now," says someone, "those passages in the New Testament which imply the divinity of Jesus Christ ought to come out." Away go the Evangelists. "Now," says someone, "the Book of Revelation—how preposterous! it represents a man with the moon under his feet, and a sharp sword in his hand." Away goes the Book of Revelation. Now there are a few pieces left. What shall we do with them? "O," says some man in the audience, "I don't believe a word in the Bible, from one end to the other." Well, it is all gone. Now you have put out the last light for the nations. Now it is the pitch darkness of eternal midnight. How do you like it?

But I think, my friends, we had better keep the Bible a little longer intact. It has done pretty well for a good many years. Let us each one keep a copy for himself, for we might have trouble, and we would want to be under the delusions of its consolations; and we might die, and we would want the delusion of the exalted residence of God's right hand, which it mentions. O! what an awful thing it is to laugh in God's face, and hurl his revelation back at him. After awhile the day will come when they will say they did not laugh. Then all the hyper-criticisms, all the caricatures, and all the learned sneers in the "Quarterly Reviews," will be brought to judgment; and amid the rocking of everything beneath, and amid the flaming of everything above, God will thunder: "But thou didst laugh!" I think the most fascinating laughter at Christianity I ever remember was a man in New England. He made the Word of God seem ridiculous, and he laughed on at our holy religion until he came to die, and then he said: "My life has been a failure—a failure domestically; I have no children; a failure socially, for I am treated in the streets like a pirate; a failure professionally, because I know but one minister that has adopted my sentiments." For a quarter of a century he laughed at Christianity; and ever since Christianity has been laughing at him. Now, it is a mean thing to go into a man's house and steal his goods; but I tell you the most gigantic burglary ever invented is the proposition to steal these treasures of our holy religion. The meanest laughter ever uttered is the laugh of the sceptic.

The next laughter mentioned in the Bible is David's laughter, or the expression of spiritual exultation. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter." He got very much down sometimes; but there are other chapters where for four or five times he calls upon the people to praise and exult. It was not a mere twitch of the lips; it was a demonstration that took hold of his whole physical nature. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter." My friends, this world will never be converted to God until Christians cry less, and laugh and sing more. The horrors are a poor bait. If people are to be persuaded to adopt our holy religion, it will be because they have made up their minds it is a happy religion. They don't like a morbid Christianity. I know there are morbid people who enjoy a funeral. They come early to see the friends take leave of the corpse; and they steal a ride to the cemetery; but all healthy people enjoy a wedding better than they do a burial. Now, you make the religion of Christ sepulchral and hearselike, and you make it repulsive. I say, plant the rose of Sharon along the church walks, and columbine to clamber over the church wall; and have a smile on the lip, and have the mouth filled with holy laughter. There is no man in the world, except the Christian, that has a right to feel an untrammelled glee. He is promised everything is to be for the best here, and he is on the way to a delight which will take all the processions with palm branches, and all the orchestras harped, and cymballed, and trumpeted to express. "O," you say, "I have so much trouble." Have you more trouble than Paul had? What does he say? "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. Poor, yet making many rich. Having nothing, yet possessing all things." O! rejoice evermore. You know how it is in the army—an army in encampment. If to-day news comes that our side has had a defeat, and to-morrow another portion of the tidings comes, saying we have had another defeat, it demoralizes all the host. But if the news comes of victory to-day, and victory to-morrow, the whole army is impassioned for the contest. Now, in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, report fewer defeats; tell us the victories—victory over sin, and death, and hell. Rejoice evermore, and again I say rejoice. I believe there is more religion in a laugh than in a groan. Anybody can groan; but to laugh in the midst of banishment, and persecution, and indescribable trial, that required a David, a Daniel, a Paul, a modern heroine.

The next laughter mentioned in the Bible that I shall speak of is the fool's laughter, or the expression of sinful merriment. Solomon was very quick at simile: when he makes a comparison we all catch it. What is the laughter of a fool like? He says: "It is the crackling of thorns under a pot." The kettle is swung, a bunch of brambles is put under it, and the torch is applied to it, and there is a great noise, and a big blaze, and a sputter, and a quick extinguishment. Then it is darker that it was before. Fools' laughter. The most miserable thing on earth is a bad man's fun. There they are—ten men in a bar-room; they have at home wives, mothers, daughters. The impure jest starts at one corner of the bar-room, and crackle, crackle, crackle, it goes all around. In five hundred such guffaws there is not one item of happiness. They all feel demeaned, if they have any conscience left. So, all merriment born of dissipation, that which starts at the counter of the drinking restaurant, or from the wine-glass in the home circle, the maudlin simper, the meaningless joke, the saturnalian gibberish, the paroxysm of mirth about nothing, which you sometimes see in the fashionable club-room or the exquisite parlor at twelve o'clock at night, are the crackling of thorns under a pot. Such laughter and such sin ends in death.

The next laughter that I shall mention as being in the Bible, is the laugh of God's condemnation: "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." Again: "The Lord will laugh at him." Again: "I will laugh at his calamity." With such demonstration will God greet every kind of great sin and wickedness. But men build up villanies higher and higher. Good men almost pity God, because he is so schemed against by men. Suddenly a pin drops out of the machinery of wickedness, or a secret is revealed, and the foundation begins to rock; finally, the whole thing is demolished. What is the matter? I will tell you what the matter is. That crash of ruin is only the reverberation of God's laughter. A man in New York said he would be the richest man in the city. He left his honest work as a mechanic, and got into the city councils some way, and in ten years stole $15,000,000 dollars from the city government. Fifteen million dollars! He held the legislature of the State of New York in the grip of his right hand. Suspicions were aroused. The grand jury presented indictments. The whole land stood aghast. The man who expected to put half the city in his vest pocket goes to Blackwell's Island; goes to Ludlow street Jail, breaks prison, and goes across the sea; is re-arrested and brought back, and again remanded to jail. Why? "He that sitteth in the heavens laughed." Rome was a great empire; she had Horace and Virgil among her poets; she had Augustus and Constantine among her Emperors. But what mean the defaced Pantheon, and the Forum turned into a cattle market, and the broken-walled Coliseum, and the architectural skeleton of her great aqueducts? What was that thunder? "Oh!" you say, "that was the roar of the battering-rams against her walls." No. The quiver and the roar were the outburst of omnipotent laughter from the defied and insulted heavens. Rome defied God, and he laughed her down. Thebes defied God, and he laughed her down. Nineveh defied God, and he laughed her down. Babylon defied God, and he laughed her down. There is a great difference between God's laugh and his smile. His smile is eternal beatitude. He smiled when David sang, and Miriam clapped the cymbals, and Hannah made garments for her son, and Paul preached, and John kindled with apocalyptic vision, and when any man has anything to do and does it well. His smile! Why, it is the fifteenth of May, the apple orchards in full bloom; it is morning breaking on a rippling sea; it is heaven at high noon, all the bells beating the marriage peal. But his laughter—may it never fall on us! It is a condemnation for our sin; it is a wasting away. We may let the satirist laugh at us, and all our companions may laugh at us, and we may be made the target for the merriment of earth and hell; but God forbid that we should ever come to the fulfilment of the prophecy against the rejectors of the truth: "I will laugh at your calamity." But, my friends, all of us who reject Christ and the pardon of the Gospel must come under that tremendous bombardment. God wants us all to repent. He counsels, he coaxes, he importunes, and he dies for us. He comes down out of heaven. He puts all the world's sin on one shoulder, he puts all the world's sorrow on the other shoulder, and then with that Alp on one side and that Himalaya on the other, he starts up the hill back of Jerusalem to achieve our salvation. He puts the palm of his right foot on one long spike, and he puts the palm of his left foot on another long spike, and then, with his hands spotted with his own blood, he gesticulates, saying: "Look! look! and live. With the crimson veil of my sacrifice I will cover up all your sins; with my dying groan I will swallow up all your groans. Look! live." But a thousand of you turn your back on that, and then this voice of invitation turns to a tone divinely ominous, that sobs like a simoom through the first chapter of Proverbs: "Because I have called and ye refused, I have stretched out my right hand and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof; I, also, will laugh at your calamity." O! what a laugh that is—a deep laugh; a long, reverberating laugh; an overwhelming laugh: God grant we may never hear it. But in this day of merciful visitation, yield your heart to Christ, that you may spend all your life on earth under his smile, and escape forever the thunder of the laugh of God's indignation.

The other laughter mentioned in the Bible, the only one I shall speak of, is heaven's laughter, or the expression of eternal triumph. Christ said to his disciples: "Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh." That makes me know positively that we are not to spend our days in heaven singing long-metre psalms. The formalistic and stiff notions of heaven that some people have would make me miserable. I am glad to know that the heaven of the Bible is not only a place of holy worship, but of magnificent sociality. "What," say you, "will the ringing laugh go around the circles of the saved?" I say, yes; pure laughter, cheering laughter; holy laughter. It will be a laugh of congratulation. When we meet a friend who has suddenly come to a fortune, or who has got over some dire sickness, do we not shake hands, do we not laugh with him? And when we get to heaven and see our friends there, some of them having come up out of great tribulation, why we will say to one of them: "The last time I saw you, you had been suffering for six weeks under a low intermittent fever;" or, to another, we will say: "You for ten years were limping with the rheumatism, and you were full of complaints when we saw you last; I congratulate you on this eternal recovery." We shall laugh. Yes; we shall congratulate all those who have come out of great financial embarrassments in this world, because they have become millionaires in heaven. Ye shall laugh. It shall be a laugh of re-association. It is just as natural for us to laugh when we meet a friend we have not seen for ten years, as anything is possible to be natural. When we meet our friends from whom we have been parted ten, or twenty, or thirty years, will it not be with infinite congratulation? Our perception quickened, our knowledge improved, we will know each other at a flash. We will have to talk over all that has happened since we have been separated, the one that has been ten years in heaven telling us all that has happened in the ten years of his heavenly residence, and we telling him in return all that has happened during the ten years of his absence from earth. Ye shall laugh. I think George Whitefield and John Wesley will have a laugh of contempt for their earthly collisions; and Toplady and Charles Wesley will have a laugh of contempt for their earthly misunderstandings; and the two farmers, who were in a law suit all their days, will have a laugh of contempt over their earthly disturbance about a line fence. Exemption from all annoyance. Immersion in all gladness. Ye shall laugh. Christ says so. Ye shall laugh. Yes, it will be a laugh of triumph. Oh! what a pleasant thing it will be to stand on the wall of heaven and look down at Satan, and hurl at him defiance, and see him caged and chained, and we forever free from his clutches. Aha! Yes, it will be a laugh of royal greeting. You know how the Frenchmen cheered when Napoleon came back from Elba; you know how the English cheered when Wellington came back from Waterloo; you know how Americans cheered when Kossuth arrived from Hungary; you remember how Rome cheered when Pompey came back victor over 900 cities. Every cheer was a laugh. But, Oh! the mightier greeting, the gladder greeting, when the snow-white cavalry troop of heaven shall go through the streets, and, according to the book of Revelation, Christ, in the red coat, the crimson coat, on a white horse, and all the armies of heaven following on white horses. Oh! when we see and hear that cavalcade, we shall cheer, we shall laugh. Does not your heart beat quickly at the thought of the great jubilee upon which we are soon to enter? I pray God that when we get through with this world and are going out of it, we may have some such vision as the dying Christian had when he saw written all over the clouds in the sky the letter "W;" and they asked him, standing by his side, what he thought that letter "W" meant. "Oh!" he said, "that stands for welcome." And so may it be when we quit this world. "W" on the gate, "W" on the door of the mansion, "W" on the throne. Welcome! Welcome! Welcome! I have preached this sermon with five prayerful wishes: that you might see what a mean thing is the laugh of scepticism, what a bright thing is the laugh of spiritual exultation, what a hollow thing is the laugh of sinful merriment, what an awful thing is the laugh of condemnation, what a radiant, rubicund thing is the laugh of eternal triumph. Avoid the ill: choose the right. Be comforted. "Blessed are ye that weep now—ye shall laugh, ye shall laugh." ing that must now be used as a mill or granary, for through sashless windows protrude sheaves of grain and bundles of straw.

In the reeking court-yard where the sun seldom falls, two sparrows twitter happily over some kernels that have dropped from above. Another pair, as busy and cheery, sport upon the broken stones of the time-stained wall, pecking their noon meal out of the chinks and crannies.

"Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing," one of us breathes softly before leaving the little preachers and the cheerful light of day behind.

The door opens into a vaulted chamber that cannot be over twelve feet square. There is no window, but six queer niches in the sides of the room are utilized as cupboards. The walls are whitewashed, and above the niches are gaudily-colored designs of palms, flowers, fruits, and, oddly enough, green hands, with outspread fingers pointing upward.

"To keep off the Evil Eye," explains my interpreter, avoiding looking at the mystic signs while she speaks.

To direct attention to them by any manifestation of curiosity on our part would excite suspicious alarm.

Quilts and matting are dragged from a pile at the back of the room to supply us with seats. A man, his wife, and five daughters of assorted ages, have their only home here, sleeping, eating, sitting and living here the year around. Cooking is done over an earthenware brazier, exhibited to us proudly by the housewife. The bread, she rude ballad, seems yet to underrun the voice in my ears:

Soldiers! soldiers! far over the sea!
As we grind the yellow grain, may the Prophet hear our plea!
May he spread his mighty arms in protection round your host,
And hide you in their shelter safe when perils threaten most.
May he guard his faithful followers where-ever they may be!
Soldiers! soldiers! far over the sea!

The cupboards, unscreened by curtain or door, hold besides the cakes of fuel, earthenware jars and bowls, the inevitable apparatus for coffee-making, and a big metal pan covered with a mat of platted straw. The day's baking is in this basin, and since we cannot wait for coffee, we must eat, each of us, a morsel of the tough, warm cake. It is curiously stamped by the hot pebbles, and dark-gray in color. Yet we accept it with smiling gratitude, and feign to swallow it, retiring in fair order toward the door, while our interpreter voices our thanks for hospitality received.

Jamal and Alcides in the lower court are the cynosure of an admiring group. The Bethany women are notable of their kind, carrying on (for Palestine) a thriving trade with Jerusalem in butter-milk, eggs, cheese and butter. One of the most prosperous listens with downcast eyes to David's talk of crops and weather, cunningly drawn out while Alcides retires to a ledge far enough away to focus the modern Martha of Bethany. Every line of her coarse features expresses the cumbering cares of much serving in home at first. My Syrian friend interferes when I order the coachman to put the bag with other belongings of ours in front of the carriage.

"It will go first to my house, if you please," she says, significantly. "I have a garden where it can be sunned, and fumigated with burning sulphur, and so be made quite safe to be packed with clean things. You shall have it in a few days."

A warm discussion arises on the way home. Alcides has been thinking.

"We see how little social and domestic customs have changed in this part of the world since Bible times"—is the summing up of these meditations.

"The Bedouin of 1894 A. D. is the Bedouin of 1894 B. C. That was in Abraham's day—wasn't it David?"

"Between the eighteenth and twenty-second chapters of Genesis, Captain."

"Dress, modes of speech, tricks of trade, marrying and giving in marriage—all these things are so much the same now as then, that I believe the original Martha of Bethany lived and looked very much as her sister of the nineteenth century lives and acts and looks now. The whole family probably lived in one ten-by-ten room, and sat on the floor to eat and talk, and lay upon dirty mats to sleep, and crouched, on rainy days over a brazier in a windowless chamber, and were upon as bad terms with soap, water and towels, and combs, as at present."

It is a bomb that bursts disastrously. The sketch is repulsive, unnatural—we declaim—if not actually blasphemous. We remind the transgressor that the bleak hills about us, blossomed as the rose in the days of Israel's glory; that Herod the Magnificent was on the throne and abundant in public works when the Nazarene Teacher withdrew to Bethany at even-tide after the day's disputation in the Temple, or many hours of healing and talking in marketplace and by the waysides. At last the gentle voice of the sweet-faced American traveler is heard. She speaks modestly—but confidently.

"I cannot think that our Martha was like that! Or that her house and clothes—and children, if she had any—were dirty. For you know—Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus! And Bethany was his chosen resting-place. Martha's home may have been humble. It must have been neat and peaceful."

A sudden and a lasting calm ensues that has not been broken when we quit the carriage to walk a little way up the side of Olivet to the old Bethany road, and gaze down upon Jerusalem as our Lord beheld it four days before the shout of "Hosanna" was exchanged for the howl of "Crucify Him!"

tells us, is kneaded into flat rounds which are laid upon hot pebbles in the brazier, patted down, and covered with a fire of dried camel's manure. A heap of this fills one cupboard! Flour for each day's provision is ground in the morning. A laughing-eyed girl of thirteen, persuaded by the gracious arts of our interpreter, sits down upon the floor, takes the mill—a stone, laid in a socket and worked back and forth by an upright pin, or handle of wood—between her feet, pours in grain and begins the work.

"But it is nothing without the song," interrupts the interpreter. "Sing, will you not? These ladies have never heard the Syrian grinding-song."

The fair performer requires as much coaxing as the musical prodigy of an American provincial circle, but demur and diffidence finally overcome by the winsome interpreter, she chants in a fresh, tuneful voice, to the accompaniment of the mill. The effect is marvellously melodious, the hum of the stone in its groove keeping perfect time with the song. Our Syrian matron translates what I seize a moment to jot down in my note-book, and subsequently pass over to Alcides the Rhymer. I wish it were possible to give with it the beat and whirl that, as I read the faithful translation which retains the very measure of the and market. Her baby sleeps in a stout bag suspended between her shoulders by a cord passed across the forehead; on her head is the flat basket that went with her and baby to town (a Sabbath day's journey), filled with butter, cheese and eggs, and holds now sundry parcels of groceries and other household necessities. The baby-bag is a curious thing, made of dyed goats' hair cords, ingeniously netted and trimmed with long fringes.

"Will she sell it?" I ask.

"She will sell anything!" tersely, and the bargain begins.

Other and shrewder lines cross Martha's visage. She is in her element.

Withdrawn a few paces from the battlefield, we are kept by the laughing interpreter in touch with the principal actors. Martha draws the first blood by a firm demand for sixteen shillings, English money (four dollars).

"Is the woman mad!" David raises appealing eyes and hands to the presumably sane spectators. "We don't want to buy the baby, too! Only the bag!"

Martha does not join in the merriment excited by the wilful misinterpretation. Buying and selling are not matters for jest. She chaffers valiantly, but the end of the ten-minute duel is the purchase of the gayly-colored netting at half the sum she asked

THE YOUTH OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for July 29. Luke 2: 40-52.
Golden Text, Luke 2:52. By Mrs. Baxter.

IT was not long after his horrible massacre of the little children of Bethlehem and the neighborhood, that Herod himself was called to yield up the life which he had so stained. True, he was called Herod the Great, but his was an unenviable greatness, a terrible superiority in the lengths of sin to which he went. The Child Jesus, whose death he had sought to compass, lived on by the will of a Greater than Herod. "The Child grew and waxed strong, becoming full of wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him." (Luke 2: 40, R.V. margin.) What was the wisdom with which Jesus was becoming full in his childhood, as the Son of man? There were schools in Nazareth, and with other children of his age, Jesus learned, but his school-mates did not become filled, with the same wisdom as he. There was one branch of study which above all others must have occupied the attention of Jesus in his early years; it was the study and the committal to memory of the Holy Scriptures. "He took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham, Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren." (Heb. 2: 16-17.) Thus he must have needed, as man, to study in the same way, in which we have to study, the Holy Scriptures, that he might learn what had been written in them about himself. The Holy Scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus," and we find our Lord, after he was risen, when he joined the two disciples on their way to Emmaus," beginning at Moses and all the prophets, expounding to them in all the Scriptures.

The Things Concerning Himself

(Luke 24: 27.) Even as a Child, Jesus was our Example, he grew and waxed strong, becoming filled with wisdom. From this we gather that the spirit, "the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible," "the inward man" in Jesus developed much more, and much more rapidly than the soul, or emotional life.

Joseph and Mary went up to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover in obedience to the command of God. (Deut. 16: 1.) And when Jesus was twelve years old they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast, and when they had fulfilled the days, as they were returning, the Child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem, and Joseph and his mother knew not of it. How often at a Christian convention, friends meet together, and the joy of greeting one another and of exchanging family news and interests, the enjoyment of the society of those they have not met for a long time, the tidings of the work of God carried on by this one and that one, really absorbs the chief attention of those who come together. Thus it comes to pass that after the most solemn gatherings, when God has come very near, only one or two retire to be alone with God, to let the words "sink down into their ears," to lay to heart what has been said; and when the days are past, and those who have come together, and whose hearts have been stirred by the truth of God in the opening of the Scriptures, find that the presence of Jesus, which they had found in the gathering together of his people, has tarried behind, and they have lost it. How far did the consciousness of his presence, even at the time, depend upon the few Simeons and Annas, in whose hearts the fire of the altar was burning, and the lamp of the Lord never going out, because they alone remained in the presence of the Lord, and would not let themselves be distracted by men and things?

Joseph and Mary had lost the clue to the whereabouts of Jesus. "Supposing him to have been in the company, they went a day's journey and sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance." Where was the minute direction which Joseph was wont to receive from his God? Alas! he had allowed himself to be distracted, and he had lost the thread. Not waiting upon the Lord and therefore not distinctly guided by him, they must do the best thing they could. They had last seen Jesus in Jerusalem. But even there they were at a loss; in the place where they had lodged, no trace was to be found of him, three days of anxious searching were without result; where was it they last saw him? Then the recollection came back to them that while they were busy speaking with one another they had seen him with the roll of the book open, in earnest conversation with the leading scribes, and then, after their three days' fruitless search, they found him in the temple. If the Passover was a light thing to them, it was no light thing to him who, as man, was learning from the Scriptures, that he, born in Bethlehem of a virgin, was to be the passover Lamb on whom the Lord should lay the iniquity of us all.

There was the child Jesus "sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions." Listening as became his years, and asking questions as was consistent in the younger when speaking with his superiors in age; and then in his turn interrogated by them, and manifesting, in his understanding and answers, the wisdom with which he was filled, for the Son of Man was in his element in the written Word of his Father. He was himself the Living Word which became flesh and dwelt among us. His very taking upon him our flesh was the fulfilled message of God first given to fallen man, and as he, as man learned from the Old Testament all that was written of him—what his ministry as man was to be, how it should be consummated by the sacrifice of himself, no wonder the Word of God was the most intense interest of his life, and that, above all else, the Passover feast must have had for him a significance which astonished the doctors of the law. What to them was the doctrine was to him a deeply personal matter, what to them was mere form was to him

The Very Meaning of His Existence.

With his very coming into the world he had said: "Lo I come . . . to do thy will, O my God, I am content to do it; yea, thy law is within my heart." He has "left us an example that we should follow his steps." Are we students of the Scriptures as he was? "God is a Spirit and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him." Does he find in us spiritual worshippers, who live to learn what the Scriptures say concerning us, and to fulfil or carry out in our lives all which is written of us? Do we lay to heart and make real our vocation, to wait for, and to be ready for, the coming of our Lord? Do we lay to heart and carry out our vocation to be "not of the world as he was not of the world, to be lamb-like as he was, to resist not evil, to live not unto ourselves, even as "he pleased not himself?" Is the Word of God more to us than our necessary food not merely our comfort in sorrow, our Guide in perplexity, our help to disentangle us in the time of temptation, but the glorious tidings of our life's vocation, the map of our journey, the unfolding of thoughts of our God which he calls us to reciprocate and carry out.

"And when they saw him they were amazed and his mother said unto him: Son, why hast thou dealt thus with us? Behold thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." It was a reproach and it was an assertion of Joseph's right of a father over him. "And he said unto them: How is it that ye have sought me? wist ye not that I must be in the things of my Father?" (v. 49 R.V.) As if to say, "Joseph is not my father. While you have been distracted with kinsfolk and acquaintance I have been engaged with the word of my Father. But did you not understand? has it ever struck you how I was wont in Nazareth, to use every opportunity, when the roll of the book was open in the synagogue, to search into the Scriptures? Is this an unusual thing? how is it that ye have sought me? Is not the temple the place where I was likely to be found?" It was a protest they understood not, but surely Mary, who kept all these sayings in her heart, may have had some questionings, whether she had not greatly failed in having been distracted as she had been by the greetings of her friends and relatives at the Passover feast.

JESUS AMONG THE DOCTORS.

over after his twelfth birthday they took Jesus with them. The events of the visit are described in the verses that form the subject of the lesson. The incident is deeply interesting as being the only one preserved of the years which passed between his infancy and his manhood. Here alone we see Jesus as a boy. It is also interesting because in connection with it we have his first recorded words. They were highly significant and must have so appeared to his mother. She, in gently reproaching him, spoke of Joseph as his father, from which we may infer that, at that time, she had not communicated to her Son the mysterious secret of his paternity. When in his answer, with beautiful delicacy of reproof, he spoke of God as his Father, Mary must have been surprised and awed. The Evangelist probably did not foresee the disputes which would arise in later times as to the nature of Jesus, but in the brief sentence, in which he sums up the history of the next eighteen years, he incidentally sheds light on the subject of dispute. The theologians have perplexed themselves and their hearers in attempts to define what was divine and what was human in the person of the Lord. We learn from the passage that "Jesus increased in wisdom, and in favor with God and man." It is evident therefore that there must have been a gradual unfolding of divinity within him and that there must have been progress in the inner as well as in the outward man. This intimation strengthens the theory which has always seemed the most simple and satisfactory of the many that have been advanced, that the Godhead in Jesus was simply clothed with humanity, and that it made use of a purely human brain and organism for its purposes of manifestation. As they developed and matured, the consciousness of divinity would be felt, and the divine nature would gradually, not suddenly, find means of expression. Thus in the Temple Jesus sought knowledge of the learned doctors, who, during the feasts, sat there, that those who might be in perplexity might ask them questions and gain knowledge of the law and the prophets. Jesus appears to have spent three days in that way, and to have impressed the teachers with his extraordinary intelligence and docility.

Filled with wisdom. There are many ideas of what true wisdom is. Many a man who has been truly wise has been regarded as foolish by his neighbors and acquaintances. When the great Sir Isaac Newton lived in London, an old lady who occupied the next house to his, told a friend that a crazy man was living next door. She knew that he was crazy, because although an elderly man, he spent much of his time in blowing soap-bubbles. She was right as to the fact, but wrong in her inference. Newton was studying the laws of the refraction of light and experimented with the soap-bubble as the thinnest surface he could obtain. He is not the only wise man whom the world has set down as crazy.

Found him in the temple. There many have found him since that day. "I knew a young man," said a speaker at a Gospel service, "who was brought up in a religious home. He did not follow the advice he had there because he wanted to see the world and enjoy its pleasures and he thought religion would prevent his doing so. He left home to become a clerk in a great city. There were plenty of opportunities for gambling and drinking and going to haunts of vicious people. He lived for a year or two a fast life. Some money was left him as a legacy and that was spent in addition to his salary. One day his employers found out how he was living and discharged him. The blow came at an unfortunate time for he was just then without a dollar. Then his friends, to whom he had been generous turned their backs upon him. No one would help him and he could get no employment. In his distress he prayed, but no help came. He thought that he had sinned beyond God's forgiveness and that having rejected Christ in his boyhood it was too late to seek him. He was about to commit suicide, but thought that he would go to church once before killing himself. He had never been there since he left home. He went and the message of mercy to the perishing reached his heart. He found Jesus in the Temple. I was that young man."

Must be about my father's business. Our duties to God should always stand first, but sometimes this is forgotten. The morning prayer is often shortened or omitted altogether if there is reason for hurry, and other things that God wishes us to do are postponed or neglected if some other call of business or pleasure is heard. On one occasion Archbishop Usher was preaching, when a messenger from the king arrived desiring to speak with him. The Archbishop listened courteously to the man, who informed him that the king desired him to come to the palace immediately. He told the man to tell the king that he was then engaged in his Master's business, but when that was done he would wait upon the king. He thereupon resumed his sermon and went to the king when he had finished.

Increased in wisdom. The words indicate a gradual advance, as if Jesus himself trod the same toilsome path that other boys do. It is sometimes very slow and the boy loses patience and thinks it is impossible to reach the desired end, forgetting that the way there must be by gradual achievement. A little child was taken to a great cathedral. He stood on the marble floor and looked up with wonder to the men and women who were walking in a gallery around the great dome, a hundred and fifty feet above him. "How did they ever get there?" thought the child. He longed to get there, too, but he thought, "It is too high, too far, for me." Then the child's father opened a door in the wall, and taking him by the hand, led him through it. The child saw some stone steps in a winding staircase. One by one he put his feet upon the steps and presently he found himself in the gallery, with the blue dome just above his head and the floor on which he had stood far below. He had come all the way step by step.

Was subject unto them. Although even at this time Jesus knew himself to be the Son of God he went, we are told, with Joseph and Mary to Nazareth and was subject to them, setting for every child who aspires to be like him an example of filial reverence. It is worthy of notice that the greatest men have been characterized by their love and respect for their mothers. Washington was conspicuous in this matter. One of his biographers says, "Whatever might be the difference of opinion between the great man and his mother; however strongly the parent in her linsey skirt, short jacket and mob-cap, might contrast with the elegant dames who strove for his favor, she was ever honored in his thought and in his speech." She heard her son lauded as greater than Caesar and more modest than Cincinnatus—the hero whose fame would outlast time. Her answer honored him as it honored her. She said, "I am not surprised at what George has done. He was always a good boy."

Responses Still Flowing in From Far and Near to the Appeal for the Moody Gospel Fund—An Opportunity to Aid in a Glorious Work for Christ at Home.

WITH this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we bring to our readers and their friends everywhere, the good news that the first thousand dollars of the Moody Gospel Fund have already been raised and the money paid over. This splendid response to our appeal is an earnest of the deep and sincere interest our friends take in this grand Christian work. It is the first step in a crusade to promote which should be the dearest pleasure of every man and woman in America who loves the name of Jesus. It is the first stage of a journey, an initial mile stone on a march that will prove more and more glorious as it advances. In addition to the number of those who have already contributed, there are still other thousands in different cities and towns, as well as in the rural districts who have long desired an opportunity to aid a movement of this character. Church societies and similar organizations, as well as individuals, find in the Gospel fund an object worthy their heartiest support, since its aim, as Mr. Moody himself has explained, is to send the Gospel to those churchless millions at home who can receive it in no other way. It is for them and their little children that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now pleading and it invokes the co-operation of all who pray for the salvation of this land and its people.

In former issues, we have already explained the object for which the Fund is being raised, viz.: to enable the Bible Institute in Chicago to train, educate and send forth in Christ's name, an army of Christian workers among the three millions unevangelized in the cities and towns of America.

Hundreds of consecrated men and women are applying to Mr. Moody, and offering to devote themselves to this work. The Bible Institute is to the Lord's hosts what the drilling camp is to an army. It turns the raw recruit into the trained soldier. A thrilling national peril may call out thousands of fine men to the national standard but it would be only courting defeat to lead them immediately like a helpless mob against the enemy. Enthusiasm is not sufficient, as great generals have proved again and again. The recruit must be taught the use of his weapons, must learn how to turn them to account and how to co-operate with others. In opposing the great adversary of souls, like preparation is needed, as the untrained worker finds to his cost. And to do this effectively the facilities of the Bible Institute must at once be increased ten-fold. It is a campaign in which there is no retreat. The order of the hour is "Forward in His Name!"

To the many applicants, who cannot be practical helpfulness. The days here are busy ones and there is economy of time as well as of money. They keep early hours, for the mornings are precious as a time for hard study. The later hours of the day are given to practical work. The students are to be found then in all sections of the city, holding services in jails, in hospitals and in missions, visiting the sick, the aged, and infirm in their homes, conducting tent-meetings, inquiry-meetings, cottage-meetings, and teaching in ragged schools and industrial schools. Mr. Moody believes in teaching the students not only the theory of the work, but the work itself. In the actual work they meet difficulties which can be solved in the Institute better than anywhere else and the personal deficiencies and weaknesses are discovered in active service and can be remedied. Thus by such a course of study and discipline and by regular work in various spheres, the students are prepared for active service in different places and acquire the knowledge of God's Word and of the characters of men which enables them to present the Gospel message with success. As theological students have said, when after graduation in our seats of learning, they have spent a few weeks in the Institute, "This is what we need: it enables us to turn our college lore to practical account."

Every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should have a share in the work of equipping this evangelical host. When the word went forth throughout the nation, that men were needed for the war, there was no lack of sympathy and support. Those who remained at home gave freely to equip the host that marched to the field and to support them while there. Let it not be said that we, even the poorest of us, are less enthusiastic and self-sacrificing when it is the Lord's summons to spiritual conflict that calls out the armies of his servants to fight his battles against sin and infidelity and indifference. You may not be able to give the pay of a regiment, but you can help to equip at least one brave soldier; may not be rich enough to defray the cost of a year's training for a Christian worker souls are in the balance, no Christian can stand indifferent or refuse to give at least his encouragement and his prayers.

Prayers! What a mighty host of them is borne upon every mail that brings us the gifts that are helping to equip this army! We cannot refrain from quoting some of these letters, since as they have greatly encouraged us, they may also breathe inspiration to other souls.

"I send two dollars to help on the good work," writes an aged Christian, Mrs. Emily Capps, of Pratham, N. Y. "I am almost seventy-five, and am waiting the Lord's good time." "Luzerne," Wilkesbarre, Pa. ($40), says, "I trust this, with God's blessing, may be of service in helping along this great and good work." "May His richest blessing rest upon the effort," is the sincerest aspiration of Mr. H. H. Pritchard, Bangor, Pa. ($10). "My earnest prayer is that this wonderful Institute may continue many years in its grand work for the Master," writes A. G. A. Yellow Springs, O. ($1.10). "May the Lord bless Mr. Moody in his grand work," is the prayer of Mrs. C. L. Markley, Herrington, Kans. ($2). Alonzo Elliott Sharon Springs, N. Y. ($1), says: "It will help a little. I am a poor man and this money is my living; but I willingly give it for Christ." A friend, Ashland, Kans. ($5), writes: "I gladly give to help in this much needed work." Miss L. M. Prevost, Quincy, Ill. ($4), says: "A small amount, but I am thankful to do something, it ever so little, to help in such a great work." The prayer of D. I. Wagar, Flat Rock, Mich. ($1), is: "May God bless it and make it a means of winning a soul for His kindness. I hope Mr. Moody will get an abundance of funds to carry on his glorious work." "This amount is for the benefit of the young men who are preparing themselves to spread God's Word. May the day soon come when from one end of the world to the other all shall learn to love Him and serve Him," is the prayer of Sarah A. Hommes, Veterans Home, Wis. ($5). Lucy E. Maybury, Huntington, Ind. ($1), writes: "God speed the work," Mrs. Williams, Marshalltown, Iowa, ($1), writes: "With my prayer that however small, it may in some way tell more largely in the end for Jesus. May He, who knew how to so wonderfully multiply the loaves and fishes, touch this my dollar given in His name. I think it a noble work and I know God will bless every effort for its advancement."

We might multiply these extracts from the hundreds of similar letters that have come to us, all breathing words of hearty encouragement for the good work.

OUR FLAG CAN PROTECT THEM.

THE following correspondence, which is of immediate interest to all who have the spread of the Gospel at heart, carries its own explanation:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, 1
New York, June 28, 1894.

Hon. Walter Q. Gresham,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:—In behalf of the American missionaries in Africa—in Liberia, Congo, Angola, Benguela, Zambesia and elsewhere—I write concerning a question of information which is of very serious moment to those missionaries themselves, and also to their numerous friends in this country who support them in the mission field. In a widely-published cable dispatch, it is stated that the Sultan of Turkey has decided, at his own expense, to institute a general revival of Mohammedanism in Africa, "for the purpose of checking the advances of Christian powers." It would be exceedingly gratifying to those friends here, with thousands of whom we are in business or social contact, were they to receive from this Government some assurance that would warrant them in placing a pacific interpretation upon the dispatch in question. In view of the exciting Arab struggle for supremacy in Africa two years ago, and of the possibilities involved in a Mohammedan revival under the Sultan's personal order, they feel that there is reason to apprehend serious results. They know well, by hard experience, to what extreme Arab fanaticism will go.

May we ask you, therefore, in view of all the interests involved, to take this matter into consideration, and, if possible, ascertain whether there is in the intended action on the part of Turkey any menace to the lives and property of American missionaries in Africa, or to the lives and liberty of native converts at the American missions. Such information would be most gratefully received by a very large body of earnest Christian Americans, who have been laboring and making personal sacrifices for the enlightenment of the African people. Sincerely yours,

LOUIS KLOPSCH.

To which the Secretary of State has forwarded the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, 1
WASHINGTON, July 5, 1894.

Louis Klopsch, Esq.,

Proprietor of "The Christian Herald,"

91 to 98 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

SIR:—I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 18th ultimo, in relation to the reported action of the Sultan of Turkey in sending missionaries to spread Islamism in Africa, with a view to checking the advance of Christian powers. You ask that, in view of all the interests involved, this Department will ascertain, if possible, whether there is in the intended action on the part of Turkey any menace to the lives and property of American missionaries in Africa, or to the lives and liberty of native converts at the American missions.

This Department has no information touching the rumored efforts of the Sultan to further a Mohammedan propaganda in Africa, outside of his own dominions.

A copy of your letter will be sent to Minister Terrell, at Constantinople.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

W. Q. GRESHAM.

GOSPELIZING A CONTINENT.

OUR way to drive out false religion is to preach the true religion. So, now in one way, and then in another, the path is being prepared for the dominance of free government and the supremacy of our holy religion, the morals of which correspond with its doctrines and precepts. What has effected the change in Utah?

Some will say churches and missionaries—and noble work have they done and they are indispensable—but, under God, the railroad and the telegraphs and printing presses have done much of this. Nothing adverse to intelligence, to liberty or justice can long stand before these three agencies. God uses them as he uses the churches, and that is the reason the Chinese in China tore up the railroad track which was built by English capitalists, and that is the reason that the Sultan of Turkey does not like railroads or steamers. The harbor of Joppa, on the Mediterranean Sea, is kept in the same dangerous condition as it was hundreds of years ago. Why? Because Mohammedanism does not want vessels to land there. When, on December 1, 1889, we entered that harbor, we floated in among the rocks which have wrecked and drowned more people than any rocks in any harbor of the round world. Mohammedanism would rather have the boats wrecked than to have them safely landed. Railroads, telegraphs and steamers are the foes of ignorance and superstition. These children of darkness are terrified with the sound of a steam whistle. The Gospel alone will convert the world, but blessed be the railroads and telegraphs. They prepare the world for the Gospel. The day will come when to these will be added the practical religious uses of the phonograph. As yet this instrument is for the most part a curiosity, and we turn out from it some words of oration or sermon or song and look around and smile at the wonderful reproduction. But the day comes when hundreds of thousands of these instruments, charged with sermons and hymns and religious addresses, will be set down in all parts of the world and the most pungent and impassioned and evangelistic utterances will be turned out upon assemblages who never saw a missionary. The Bible, which is now a flat page, will be put on phonographic cylinder, and where the eye refuses to read, the ear will be compelled to listen. Hail, then, all these modern inventions and appliances. False religions cannot bear the sound of them. There are now over one hundred thousand miles of submarine cable, and in America over one million miles of telegraph, or enough to encircle the earth thirty-five times. The way is being prepared for the Gospelization of the American continent and of all the continents. Moreover, without the modern modes of intercommunication, the republic of the United States would not last six months. There are enough roughs on both sides of the Alleghany and Rocky and Sierra Nevada mountains to band together and do desperate work and enthrone outlawry, were it not for the fact that the state capitals and the national capital can instantly by the touch of a wire finger feel the pulse of every community in the nation. Bad people know this and they keep still through fear of such proximity. Then the swifter the trains run and the more complete the telegraph, the more thoroughly safe is the nation. Therefore, I have no sympathy with the constant cry against railroads, as though they were the enemies of the people. They have opened not only Utah to other forms of religion, until in Salt Lake City and Ogden there are more Gentiles than Mormons, but they have opened the continent to agriculture and merchandise, and civilization and religion.

How thoroughly dependent we are on their existence was well demonstrated eight or ten years ago when the universal railroad strike took place, and from ocean to ocean valuable property perished and all the wheels of American prosperity halted and starvation threatened whole communities in many parts of the land. Although these great railroad companies have sometimes abused their power, let us gratefully acknowledge what they have done for the advancement of all the great interests of our country. We get so in the habit of growling and complaint that our prayers too often lack the element of thanksgiving. Who has ever praised God for the modern miracles of railroads and telegraphy? Perhaps here and there one who far absent from home has been permitted to fly at the rate of forty miles an hour to the bedside of the dying, arriving in time to hear the last word of the departing spirit. Perhaps someone who, anxious to hear from someone in exposure to Johnstown flood or Charleston earthquake or Memphis epidemic, has received message of rescue. Thank God that we live now and here! Thank God that we are permitted to see the summer hour and feel this last warm wave putting the last blessing of the sunshine upon the corn and preparing it for the sickle. It seems as if God has determined that nothing shall be wasted to arouse the gratitude of our American people. The last crop must be gathered undamaged, the last orchard must yield its fruit unhurt. Praise the Lord for his goodness and his wonderful works to the children of men. Shall the unparalleled harvests soon to be gathered from the fields be a type of the grander spiritual harvest to be reaped this year?

OUR MAIL-BAG.

James Palmer, Reading, Pa. By whom was the first temperance society organized in Biblical times?

By the children of Rechab. (See Jer. 35: 5-10.)

J. F. W., New Milford, Ct. What is the estimated expense, per head, of sending the children to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont Lawn for a ten day's outing?

Three dollars, including traveling expenses.

Wesley Bean, Berlin, Ont. Where was Richard Baxter buried?

He died in 1691 and was buried in Christ Church, London.

H. B., Hancock, N. H. A young man wishes to attend some good school or academy in the East which will fit him for college, with the intention of becoming a minister. He expects to be obliged to pay his own way, so rates must be considered? Where can he go?

The best school for the purpose is the Northfield Institute, established by Mr. Moody at Northfield, Mass. Write to Rev. E. B. Hartzler, at the Institute for full information.

L. B. Antrim, Topeka, Kan. How wide was the part of the Red Sea where the children of Israel crossed?

According to the ablest modern Bible scholars, the passage was made at a point known as Ras Atakah, where the total width is about five miles. The shallows extend far in from either shore, the real channel of considerable depth being about five-eighths of a mile wide.

F. Barker, Minneapolis, Minn. How do you reckon New Testament time?

The natural day was from sunrise to sunset, the civil or official day from sunset to sunset. The first watch of the night was 6 to 9 p. m., second 9 to 12 p. m., third (cockcrow) 12 to 3 a. m., fourth 3 to 6 a. m. The third hour of the day was 9 a. m., the sixth 12 m., and so on.

P. Farwell, Dayton, O. Is there any people in the world who do not either bury, incinerate, or otherwise dispose of their dead in a manner to indicate respect for the departed and at least some trace of a belief in a future state?

It is said that some of the natives of Mongolia take their dead, put the bodies upon sledges to be drawn by horses and hurry them to the plains, where they are tossed aside to be devoured by dogs and wolves. Every other race, so far as known, makes a funeral a religious ceremony of some sort and displays sorrow for the dead.

Earnest Soul, Key, Iowa. Is it a sister's duty to live with her brother and work for him when his language is profane and his opposition to Christianity is inveterate and malignant?

The sister is under no obligation to live with or serve her brother in any case. She may do so as a matter of sisterly affection. If, however, having done all she can to win him to Christ and having prayerfully sought his conversion, he still persists in shocking her religious feelings, she is perfectly justified in seeking a home elsewhere.

R. E. B., Montreal. Is a Christian, after repeatedly but vainly praying for and pleading with, a friend who is an unbeliever in the divinity of Christ, justified in ceasing to do either, by the command of Christ to his disciples to shake the dust of a city from their shoes if that city will not receive them? (Matt. 10: 24.)

The circumstances are not parallel, as the work of the disciples was extensive and their numbers small; therefore they were not to press their message on unwilling hearers. In the case referred to, it may be wise to refrain from continued pleading when it does no good, but why cease from prayer?

Eva Petty, Trenton, N. J. What are the seven modern wonders of the world?

According to one enumeration they are: 1, Printing; 2, Microscopy and Telescopy; 3, Explosives; 4, Electric telegraph; 5, Photography; 6, the Steam Engine and 7, Labor-saving machinery. Another is: Brooklyn Bridge, the Ocean Steamships, Suez Canal, Hoosac Tunnel, Pacific Railway, Submarine Cables, and Yellowstone National Park. There are still other lists, almost all of which have one or more features that compare favorably with the seven ancient wonders.

Constant Reader, Harper, Kan. 1. What do we understand by Paul saying, "I was free born?" 2. Where can I obtain German books of instruction for rapid learning in the German language?

1. Although a Jew, he had inherited from his father the rights of Roman citizenship which had probably been granted to some ancestor for services rendered to the Roman state. 2. Write to Estes and Lauriat, publishers, Boston.

Subscriber, St. Louis, Mo. Will you kindly give me some suggestions or methods that would help to interest and instruct a class of persons banded together for the mutual study of the Bible?

There is no aid to Bible Study to be compared with the "Helps" that are bound in with the International Teachers' Bible. These include Subject-Index, Concordance, Tables, Proofs of Genuineness of Old and New Testaments, Harmony of the Gospels, Chronology, Summaries of Bible Lands, Bible Dictionary, Glossary of Antiquities, and Scripture Atlas of colored maps—the whole forming a Bible Library indispensable to the student of the Word. Every subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sending $2 secures one of these Bibles as a premium.

M. G. H., Richmond, Va. I notice that you mention the presence of the mummy of the Pharaoh of the Oppression, in the museum at Bulak. Was he not drowned in the Red Sea?

The mummy in the museum is that of Rameses II., the great Pharaoh, who is believed by the majority of Egyptologists to be the king for whom the Israelites built the treasure cities and who made them serve with rigor. He is styled the Pharaoh of the Oppression. His death is recorded in Exod. 2: 23. If any Pharaoh perished in the Red Sea, it was probably his son Menephtah, but it is more likely that he did not venture into the sea, but placed his army under the command of one of his generals when that passage was made, as he was an old man and noted for his timidity. This opinion is confirmed by certain inscriptions still legible, which appear to have been made after the Exodus. His mummy, we believe, has not been found.

A. A. Hart, Hernwood, O. Has any search been made for the Ark of the Covenant? When was it last heard of? Is it likely that it will be found?

No reference is made to the Ark after that of II. Chron. 35: 3, when Josiah ordered it to be restored to the Temple. It may have been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar with the other sacred articles when he plundered the Temple. No reference being made to the Ark by Ezra, Nehemiah or Josephus subsequent to the Captivity, it is believed that there was no Ark in the second Temple and that the Holy of Holies was empty. The Jews, however, have a tradition that before Nebuchadnezzar plundered the Temple, the priests hid the Ark and that its hiding-place will be revealed by the Messiah at his coming. His knowledge of it will, they declare, be a proof of his claims. No specific search is being made for the Ark, but the Exploration Society would be little likely to neglect a clue to its hiding-place, if one could be furnished.

W. P. Odell, Arcadia, La. Who was Theophilus, referred to in Luke, chap. 1, and Acts, chap. 1.

Theophilus is variously regarded by commentators, some holding that it was a name applicable to every lover of truth. Thus, Origen, Salvianus, Epiphanius and others held that all who are beloved of God are "Theophil." Others assert that he was an actual person in high official position, some contending that he was a Roman Governor or Senator at Antioch or Achaia, with whom Luke was intimately acquainted and whom he had baptized. It is obvious that he was a Christian. Another view is that he was addressed by Luke as the head of the Jewish nation. Later commentators reject the impersonal view and hold that Theophilus was a native of Italy, probably a convert of Luke or Paul, to whom the former dedicated his beautiful Gospel history. He lived about 56 A. D.

Mrs. M. A. Norcross, Atlanta, Ga. Yes; a letter addressed to him at Bristol, England, will find him.

Constant Reader, New York City, replying to Kate M. Loomis, Buchanan, N. Y., sends the words of the hymn: "None of myself and all of Thee," which we give in another part of this issue.

Miss E. S. Moore, a reader in Newark, N. J., writes feelingly of the loss by fire of the Gospel boat "Good News," and encloses a little tract "Soplie's Sermon," by H. B. Gibbald, Founder of the Syracuse Mission, whose contents she says have been blessed to many.

B. J. Kling, Larned, Kan. There is no truth whatever in the statement.—H. H. S. Green, Camp O. 1. There is no such passage. 2. Fully 80 per cent. on an average in all denominations.

T. H. Stafford, Snapee, N. H. We are unable to do what you ask.—Z. Pees, Yorkville, Ill. 1. Indefinite, though some contend that we are to accept Gen. 6: 4, as conveying that it took 120 years in building. 2. Paul.—C. E. Raymond, Norwalk, Ct. He publishes a weekly paper giving accounts of his mission work.

Mrs. H. M. Rower, Rochester, N. Y. Write to Rev. D. M. Heydrick, City Mission, Brooklyn, N. Y. He may be able to place her in a home.

N. L. Loecherer, Duluth, Ia. It will be published in book form shortly.—Ministerial Subscriber, Davenport Centre, N. Y. They will not be published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—C. A. C., Marietta, O. Good in ideas but defective in rhyme and poetical form.—Miss Frankie Flynn, Merrillan, Wis. 1. We cannot. 2. Presbyterians.—Robert Gunther, La Crosse, Wash. All Sunday work, except it be work of necessity or of mercy, is a sin against God.

PLAGUE-SMITTEN CHINA.

FROM Hong Kong, China, come reports of the appalling ravages of the plague in that city and its suburbs. Since the first outbreak early in June to July 1, no less than two thousand deaths from the disease had been registered in Hong Kong alone, beside the deaths in other cities and those which had been concealed by the Chinese. At the time the dispatch left, the mortality was on the increase in the city, and then averaged a hundred deaths a day. There was a general panic among the citizens, notably among the natives, who were leaving the city by thousands, and probably carrying the seeds of the disease to other localities. European physicians in Hong Kong declare that the scourge is the genuine Asiatic cholera, with all the characteristics of the disease that are seen among the Moslem pilgrims from Mecca. The same high fever, running rapidly to blood-poisoning, and speedy death, marks the course of the attack. The danger is increased by the prejudices and superstitions of the Chinese, who thwart sanitary measures of the authorities and resist all efforts to stamp out the disease. They believe that the European physicians practise inhuman torture on sufferers and use portions of their bodies as ingredients of medicine. Placards have been issued in Chinese warning sick persons against permitting a European physician to visit them, and especially against going to a hospital for treatment. This suspicion has led to hundreds of unnecessary deaths. A house-to-house inspection of the city was resisted so fiercely that soldiers had to be sent to protect the inspectors, and the excitement increasing, the inspection was abandoned, lest there should be an insurrection. How urgent was the need of the inspection is evident from the fact that in one house, which the Chinese declared was vacant, the inspectors found five bodies of persons who had died of the plague and four persons in an advanced stage of the disease. A proclamation has been issued by the Chinese Governor warning the people against interfering with the doctors, but the popular prejudice is too deep-rooted to be removed by official acts. The sufferers cannot be convinced that they are more likely to recover under skilful treatment in the foreign hospital, and that their isolation is for the general good. Thus absurd prejudice is causing the loss of hundreds of lives which might be saved if the people exercised ordinary intelligence. Unhappily, the same disposition causes the loss of many souls, and not alone among the Chinese. Even in our own land, people who are in danger of eternal death, suffer preconceived notions and prejudice against religion to influence them more than considerations of their everlasting salvation. Christ has reason still to complain, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." (John 5: 40.)

The Painter's Model.

An interesting fact is published by a Washington journal relative to the beautiful frescoes on the walls of the room on the Senate side of the Capitol in which are held the meetings of the Committee on Naval Affairs. They were executed by Brumidi, the famous Italian artist, and are the admiration of visitors from all lands. Conspicuous on the walls are half a dozen or more female figures. The form in each instance is perfect, the face is sweetly attractive, and is marked by a repose and gentleness that is typically Italian. Whether the woman is pictured as carrying an anchor, or grasping a flag, or intently studying a scroll, the pose is easy, natural, and full of grace. Sometimes it is the full face which looks down from the walls; sometimes a glance is half turned toward you; sometimes it is only the curve of a symmetrical neck which is visible. But no matter what the pose or how the woman is pictured, it is always evident that upon her form and features the artist has lingered with a loving touch. Although the pictures are so varied, from an ulcer in the foot and was admitted to the hospital. He was operated on several times and suffered more pain than he expected. When he became convalescent, he found that on one of his legs there were several long places that were very sore and sensitive. He could not understand how these sores were caused and made inquiries which the doctors and nurses evaded. With some difficulty, he ascertained that during his sickness a patient had been admitted who had been badly mangled by an accident and the doctors had decided that the only way to cure him was by grafting healthy skin on the wounds. He asserts that the skin needed for the purpose was taken from his body while he was under the influence of anesthetics and he assesses the damage at $25,000. It may be hoped that the man who places so high a value on his skin has realized the value of his soul. Sometimes the soul is overlooked altogether when a man estimates what he is worth, yet it is the most precious of his possessions, as it survives them all. As Job said: "After

The result will be awaited with intense interest by thousands of naturalized Russians now in this country, who are anxious to know whether this Government will protect them if the Czar should claim them as his subjects. Many Christians who once were subjects of Satan and served him, but have renounced him and have become by adoption sons of God, are haunted by similar fears. But they need be under no apprehension while they are faithful to Christ, for he has said that no one can pluck them out of his hand. John 10: 28.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Sir Austen Henry Layard, the Pioneer Explorer of the ruins of Nineveh and the author of many famous works on Oriental monuments, died on July 5. He was seventy-seven years old.

Rev. Francis A. Bortome, D.D., the Well-known Methodist Episcopal minister, formerly of New York, was killed on June 29, in a carriage accident while on a visit to England. His wife, Mrs. Margaret Bortome, is President of the Order of King's Daughters.

Dr. Daniel McGilvary, who translated the Bible into the Laos language, sailed from New York for the Laos country on July 7, after his brief vacation. A formal meeting to bid him farewell was held the previous evening in the Presbyterian Mission House.

A Committee for Benevolent work on the East Side of New York, has been organized. Churches of all denominations are represented and there is one Jewish member. The object is to relieve distress and help the poor no matter to what church they may belong. The Chairman is Rev. John E. Devins, 339 East Fourth street.

The New Auditorium at Ocean Grove, N. J., a building of immense size, capable of accommodating 9,000 persons, was opened on July 1. Dr. E. H. Stokes, President of the Camp Meeting Association, preached in the morning to a large congregation. The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former. Dr. Hanlon conducted the afternoon service and Rev. C. H. Yarnall preached in the evening.

Miss Anna Melton, the American missionary, who was the victim of a murderous attack recently in the Koordish Mountains, on the borders of Persia, arrived in New York on July 4, for a vacation, in the hope of regaining her health. She was brutally beaten by robbers and barely escaped with her life. Her assailants were caught, but the native court at Bagdad has acquitted them.

The Practice of having Separate cups for the Communion service which was introduced at Rochester, N. Y., has been adopted by the George Road Baptist Church, New Brunswick, N. J. Each communicant is handed a cup containing a small quantity of wine, and all drink together at a signal from the minister. The change from the chalice passed from hand to hand has long been urged by physicians on sanitary grounds.

The Tabernacle Christian Church of Columbus, Ind., has been notified of the murder of a Christian boy, the expenses of whose education in the Missionary College of Antioch, Syria, the church was defraying. His name was Jacob Fillan. He was fourteen years old and was being trained for missionary work. His murderer was a boy in the school who was provoked by Fillan refusing to yield to temptation.

The Famous Northfield Conference for the Promotion of Christian Life and Service, will hold its twelfth annual session this year from Aug. 1 to 13. The following subjects will be taken up, one day being devoted to each: The Bible, Atonement, Justification, Repentance, Faith, The New Birth, The Kingdom, The Holy Spirit, The Second Coming, Prayer, Separation, Resurrection. Among the speakers will be Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston; Dr. A. T. Pierson of Philadelphia; Rev. F. B. Meyer of London; Dr. David Gregg and Dr. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn; Major D. W. Whittle and Rev. George C. Needham of Northfield; Prof. W. W. White and Rev. R. A. Torrey of Chicago Bible Institute. Mr. Ira D. Sankey and Mr. George C. Stebbins will have charge of the singing. All particulars may be obtained by addressing Mr. Ambler G. Moody, East Northfield, Mass.

The Itinerating Gospel Work in Irish Fairs and markets, which the trained agents of the Irish Church Missions have carried on during the last few years, has been greatly prospered and blessed of late. Two hundred fairs and markets were visited during the past year without molestation.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in New York State is to have two new bishops. A committee appointed early this year to consider the state of the diocesan reports in favor of relieving the burdens of the Bishops of New York, Albany, and West New York by making two new dioceses out of counties now under their charge. New York will therefore in future have seven dioceses.

A "Door of Hope" has just been opened in Philadelphia for the same purpose and on the same principles as the New York Institution of the same name which is managed by Mrs. Whittier. The Philadelphia Door of Hope is situated at 1221 Dauphin St. Miss Jane Trahe of Boston, Mass., is its manager. It has been established by the efforts of the Philadelphia Rescue Fund which has done a great deal of good in reclaiming the fallen.

it is evident that they were all painted from the same model and it is now learned that the model was Brumidi's wife. In her he found his ideal of grace and beauty whether in action or repose and whatever the thought he was seeking to express. So has it been with the believer's love for his Lord. Men of all races, of all conditions and all occupations have found in him a perfect model which cannot be surpassed. (Heb. 1: 3.)

Skin at $300 an Inch.

The "Examiner" of San Francisco, says that a novel suit has been commenced against that city. The plaintiff, is an Irishman, who was a free patient three months ago in the City and County Hospital. He states in his complaint that he was deprived in the hospital of about eighty inches of skin and he claims twenty-five thousand dollars as compensation. He sues the city because the hospital is a public institution, maintained and controlled by the municipality for the cure of indigent persons who are diseased or injured. He was suffering

An American Citizen in Siberia.

The Washington Government has an interesting case of international law on its hands. The Russian officials have seized a naturalized American citizen and have sent him to Siberia. The man is a native of Russia, but had been twenty-seven years in this country, and was naturalized in 1874. His son, who lives in New Jersey, has informed the State Department of his father's predicament, and has forwarded to it certified copies of his naturalization papers and of his passport which was issued to him when he went back to his native country on a visit last year. It is reported that our Government welcomes this strong case as an opportunity it has not had before of settling a question which is most important as both Russia and Austria have avoided giving assent to the principle of naturalization. It is understood that Mr. Gresham will insist not only that the man

RELATION OF FOOD TO MORALS.

A Sermon Preached in the First Methodist Episcopal Church, Auburn, N. Y., by Rev. J. F. Clymer. Text: Deut. 21: 18-20, "If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father or the voice of his mother, and that when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them, then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gates of his place; and they shall say unto the elders of his city: This our son is stubborn and rebellious; he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton and a drunkard."

WE have had much teaching that has left the impression on our minds that the soul is the only source and seat of all the vice in human life. Because it is written "The imaginations of the thoughts of the natural heart, are only evil continually," total depravity has been fixed on the spirit nature of man; that is, all the bad or immoral elements entering into human life have been attributed to the innate or inborn ugliness of the soul. Accepting the Scriptural truth that "the soul that sinneth, it shall die," we have come to think that sin has its centre, seat, source and circumference in the soul, or the immaterial nature of man. Hence we readily admit the fact that influences, good or bad, may pass over from the soul to the body, but we do not readily admit that other fact, equally true, that influence good or bad may go over from the body to the soul. The road over which vicious thoughts and lustful imaginations pass from the soul to the body is the highway over which unbridled appetites, unrestrained passions and unsubdued lusts in the body may go to the soul, goading it to the wildest conceptions of vice and lecherous imaginations. The warm rays of the sun may gender rottenness in the muddy pool; so also will the effluvia from the pool poison the sunlight near it. The soul by its vicious thoughts and imaginations will entail an immoral tone on the body; so also by its passions and propensities, increasing the viciousness of the soul by pushing it to courses of vice not directly and immediately its own. In our text is found an illustration of this thought. A father and mother bring their stubborn and rebellious son to the elders of the Jewish church. They assign, as the cause of his stubbornness and rebellion, gluttony and drunkenness, than which there are no vices that demoralize the body more, or goad the soul to greater crimes. Hear it: "This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice, he is a glutton and a drunkard." That is, bad conditions of the physical nature, wrought by gluttony and drunkenness, have made him stubborn and rebellious. It will not help the case to say that his stubbornness and rebellion caused his gluttony and drunkenness, for if they did, then his soul must act on the body. His morals must influence his manners, and therefore his manners must reflect on his morals; they must interact, which is just the point we make; that is, appetite and lust fire the temperament or disposition, and a fiery disposition provokes appetite and lust to wilder indulgences.

A remarkable fact, in this day of advanced science and revelation, is that Christians and moralists in their work of reform have paid so little attention to the influence of the body on the soul. Jesus Christ more than any other teacher or reformer recognized the demoralizing and debasing influence of bad bodily conditions. Hence he almost always healed maladies of the body before he inculcated his principles upon the soul. It is true that his many miracles on the bodies of men were primarily intended to reveal his divinity; yet divinity in its manifestations always runs over the whole line of the natural before passing into the supernatural; therefore Christ's miracles on the bodies of men had a sanitary side to them. The man with the leprosy was in the poorest condition bodily to hear favorably any talk about moral greatness; hence Christ healed his diseased body, in connection with his moral teachings. His example with the blind and hungry and deaf in this respect ought not to go for nothing with those of us who seek to save men in our day. Philanthropists and Christians for the most part have overlooked the power of a debased body on the soul. They forget that Paul likens a body that has sinful habits to a thing of death, as compared with the soul that seeks to live the new life in Christ Jesus. Therefore good men have labored to create in themselves and those whom they seek to reform, certain emotional conditions of the spirit, by a tenacious adherence to creeds, or the patient performance of a set round of religious duties, and all this regardless of bad physical conditions begotten by and drinking. While they have been struggling to bring their own souls and the souls of others into holy attitudes, all the basilar forces of the body have run riot within, and perhaps beyond, the pale of human customs and human laws. If you want to empty a boiler of steam, it will not help you much by lifting the safety valve if you still keep water in the boiler and fire in the furnace. Prayer, Bible reading and Psalm singing will not help a man much to get rid of his sins, if he keeps up a set of bodily habits which fire the body and inflame the soul to continue its sinning. That you may see the connection more clearly between vice and victuals, let me show you how food may damage our bodies and demoralize our souls.

I am fully aware of the difficulties I encounter in presenting this thought to your minds. Because religion has been considered as having little or nothing to do with the body, I shall encounter the settled opinions of good men to this effect. Because our popular methods of eating have the sanction of custom, I may not criticize them without losing the favor of those who are content with things as they are. Because I shall call in question many indulgences of appetite hitherto considered sinless, I shall run the risk of being called a fanatic or fool. Because I shall preach the New Testament doctrine of self-denial many will say, "this is a hard saying—who can bear it?" But with the hope that I may unfold to you a glorious realm of liberty from the bondage of bodily propensities, I cheerfully do my duty and leave the consequences to God.

Very few of us are aware of the great physical demoralization and spiritual weakness, brought on us and our children, by bad habits of eating, as to the kind of food, the mode of its preparation, and the manner and times of taking it. We refuse to think of our indulgences of appetite as the cause of our physical ailments and premature death, and much less will we allow ourselves to believe that these indulgences have anything to do with forming our morals or shaping our characters or determining our eternal destiny. Yet I aver that three-fourths of all our bodily ailments or diseases, and many of our immoral acts, are the legitimate results of Improper Dietetic Habits.

If these habits do not effect us directly, they do so indirectly by lowering the tone of the whole system, physical and moral, causing us to break down prematurely into some disease or sin, under the pressure of legitimate toil or immoral provocation. How is it possible to account for the death of one-half the human family before five years of age, unless we trace it to the violation of physical laws in some way connected with the eating habits alike of parents and child? Many children enter the world with such a low state of inherited physical vitality and so little moral tone, that they are unable to resist the attacks of bodily disease, or throw it off when on them, and much less able to throw off moral disease and rise above their immoral heritage, if spared to pass through childhood to years of maturity. Such children not only carry in their little bodies the physical weakness of their parents, but also the specific immoral tendencies found in the conditions of their parentage. And more than this, should their endowment of vitality be sufficient to carry them over the death-line for infants, they are subject to such unnatural relations to dress and diet that it becomes a natural impossibility for them to live. In this way many children die prematurely, not by the arbitrary edict of God, but by the violation of law. I know it is a common custom to ascribe all sickness and death to the direct and arbitrary action of Divine Providence. If these laws were obeyed in us and in our ancestry, most of us ought to live beyond three score years and ten, and drop from this life into the other in a ripe, mellow old age, just as ripe fruit drops from its bough in autumn time.

But you ask where is God in the many untimely deaths that occur? I answer he is present in his great hearted goodness to help the dying to an eternal victory over death, if they will only let him. He is present to bind up the hearts that are breaking with sorrow for the departed, and to make a sudden, untimely, and needless death a monument of warning to those still living, thus making the wrath of man to praise him. If therefore our children die in infancy, because we have entailed on them feeble bodies by our violation of law, God does not kill them, but they die through violated law, and he in his goodness takes the little ones to his bosom, the seat and source of all law. Let us not then charge our sorrows to the wilful enactment of our Heavenly Father. He taketh no pleasure in the death of him that dieth. When he gives life to us, he intends that we shall keep it as long as possible. Having given us life, all the forces of his boundless nature are engaged to maintain it in us until he is ready to harvest us as the farmer does the ripened grain. The God of nature and the God of grace are not in antagonism. "The one God is in all and over all." If, therefore, we die this side of three score years and ten—seventy years—we die untimely. It is high time that good men were awake to this fact, and ceased charging over to Divine Providence what legitimately belongs to ourselves. "Jesus Christ came to destroy him that hath the power of death, that is the devil;" and when the philosophy of Jesus is wrought up into human lives by obedience to physical laws, over our bodies will be very much broken. The victory over death can be so far achieved by men in the body that they need not die until their minds and hearts have received all the development in this world that infinite love ordains. That is, men may so baffle the monster of death by obedience to law as to keep him at bay until their souls have taken on such Christly ripeness that they shall burst and break their bodies, as the ripening chestnuts break their burrs under the frosts of autumn. We have, therefore, no right to ascribe to supernatural agency any phenomena which can be explained on natural principles. Disobedience to law brings penalties. There is nothing that men need to see more in their efforts at reform than the connection between their suffering and their disobedience. Now, disobedience to the laws of life brings the penalties, sickness and premature death. There is no field where our disobedience manifests itself more frequently and with so little thought of consequences, as in our false and unnatural habits of eating and drinking, which damage the body and demoralize the soul.

The Power of Disease and Death

"The Blood is the Life." This is the declaration alike of revelation and of science. Evolutionary processes may induce a variation in the form or number of the blood corpuscles, but they cannot set aside the law that the building and rebuilding of all the organs involved in bodily or mental acts come from the blood alone. The physical, mental and moral natures are so intimately connected that that which affects one, affects the others. So that a man's mental and moral nature, as well as his physical, can very largely be determined by the quality of his blood. Now it is a physiological fact that our blood is made out of the food we eat. That food which enters the mouth and is assimilated, makes blood. By the marvelous processes of digestion and assimilation, our food is transformed into blood; and the blood passing through the veins and arteries repairs the waste tissues and forms new ones, thus building up our bodies and sustaining life. It follows then that our bodies are made of the food we eat. Evidently it was the design of our Creator that the prime object of eating should be the building up of tissue—muscles, bones and brains. That this may be a pleasure to us, he has associated with eating the delights of appetite. But most of us have so far perverted the divine order as to make the pleasures of appetite the chief object of eating. "Give me something good to eat," is the great cry of humanity, and the goodness of food is gauged by the sensations of the palate, and not by the law of nutrition. Most of us determine the goodness of our food by the amount of sensual delight it imparts to the palate, no matter how much damage it may do beyond to the delicate and intricate structure of the stomach and viscera. Hence a vast amount of food enters the mouth that makes bad blood, blood that in itself is corrupt, and carries poisonous particles to every organ in the system, putting us in ripe condition to be easily provoked to some outburst of anger, passion or revenge. My hearers, there is a sure and vital connection between Bad Blood and Bad Morals.

Blood always tells in human morals as well as in muscles. Blood has power throughout the whole realm of life, whether it be in a human body, in society, or in the body of a horse on the race course.

You ask, what kind of food makes bad blood? I answer, very much of the flesh of animals, that forms the staple diet of most of us. Sty-fed pigs and stall-fed oxen are fattened under the most unhealthful conditions possible; shut up in the dark, cut off from exercise, the fat deposited on their bodies is made up of the waste matter that the life-forces of the animal have been unable to expel. This waste fatty matter, surcharged with unexpelled excretions, is liable to induce disease in all who consume it. It has established tuberculosis in captive lions, and in cats and dogs, and in other carnivora; and it were folly to assume that mankind, feeding upon such poisonous food, should wholly escape. Even in the living animal this effete unexpelled poisonous waste breeds vermin, such as have been found on pork, which live and generate in the human body, producing disease and death. I am not making a plea for the absolute disuse of animal food, but against the bad quality of very much of it, and also against the inordinate use of that which may be good in quality. A certain amount of animal food is useful for our nourishment, especially in winter time, because of its heat producing quality. But meat in the quantities and with the frequency common among us is in no way necessary for the proper sustenance of the human system.

The use of large quantities of animal food, however free from disease germs, as a staple article of diet, makes the blood gross, coarse and corrupt, filling the body with scrofulous elements, sending poison to every part of the system, producing an inordinate appetite, throwing every organ of the body into frictional relations to every other organ. It is a matter of every-day surprise to me that any human being will consent to eat the flesh of pigs. Consider their uncleanness, their selfish, greedy habits, the vast amount of corruption that enters into their bodies, their want of exercise, their impure breathing, their lack of sudorific glands through which effete tissues and morbid accumulations may be expelled; and think, when you eat pork, of the elements which enter into your body.

God's Bill of Fare

in the 11th chapter of Leviticus excluded from the tables of the Jews the hog and all water denizens except those that had fins and scales. This bill of fare was given to the Jews not only for the preservation of their health, but, as God's great purpose was moral reform, he had an eye single to their moral condition in the matter of their eating. Does any one doubt that the unhealthy, ugly, and vicious elements that make up the flesh of most of the animals we eat, enter our blood, and in that way affect the disposition or carriage of the soul?

We forget, my hearers, that the great law of nature, "Like produces like," is universal. "Every seed after its kind is the law of all creation." There is no exception to this law. This principle obtains not only in the production of life, but in the processes of its development. If my position about the intimacy of soul and body is true, then, if a man's body is made up chiefly of flesh taken from diseased animals, and his whole physical frame is saturated with the irritating and exciting condiments of what is popularly called good food, the whole bias of his bodily powers will be toward animalism. All the impressions and impulses that the soul receives from such a body are debasing. Like produces like in the formation of physical tissue out of food, as well as in the generation of stock in the stall.

If, therefore, our meat has something to do with our morals, or if our food in some way affects our faith, it seems to me that many of our efforts at moral reform ought to be preceded by instruction in hygiene. In other words, efforts to make a man genuinely devotional ought to be prefaced by efforts to correct bad dietetic habits. A father, by prayer and precept and flogging, had done his best to reform his boy, whose staple diet was meat and sausage and pie and cake at his meals, with lunch between. The family physician said to the father, "If you will put a leech back of each of your boy's ears once a week for a month, you will do more to reform him than your preaching and pounding will do in a year." The father asked for the philosophy of this prescription. "Why," said the doctor, "your boy has bad blood, and too much of it; he must be bled badly or he would burst." "Then," said the father, "I'll change his diet from beef and pie to hominy and milk." In three months thereafter a better boy for his age could not be found in the neighborhood. The acrid, biting, evil blood had not become food for leeches, but it had done its wicked work and passed away, and a cooler, blander, purer, safer blood had been supplied from sweeter, gentler food sources.

My friends, when will we fast-living, fast-eating, fast-working, and fast-dying Americans learn the great lesson, that that the Divine Trinity in us, namely, the physical, intellectual, and spiritual, is one life, with different phases of expression; and whatever mars one mars the whole, and whatever builds up one most surely builds up the others? All our powers are many members in one body, with an interdependence which is eternal. Slight your body, and you smite your soul and enervate the mind. Corrupt the mind, and you debase both body and soul. When will those who profess to be God's children by the adoption of the Holy Ghost, catch the Spirit of his great Apostle Paul, who, more than any other sacred writer, maintained the sanctity of the human body and its subservience to the mind and soul. Hear him: "I beseech you, brethren, by the mercies of God that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." I admit the power of the Holy Ghost in the work of regeneration, but is there not something for us to do, in keeping our bodies under, "lest we become castaways?"

I do not say that all human evils and ills have their primary origin in physical habits, but I do say that the great mass of impulses from the excited, inflamed, overstimulated body toward the soul, are in the interests of sin. The economy of salvation orders otherwise. By the Gospel the body may become the temple of the Holy Ghost. By the law of self-denial of the New Testament, our bodies, with all their fiery elements, may be made an inspiration to our souls. It is not the purpose of God that a life-time warfare shall be kept up between the body and the soul. There ought to come to every true Christian a day of final victory over his bodily powers, in which they will cease their rebellion, and come into the sweetest union with the soul in its great work of developing a likeness to Christ.

Regeneration does a mighty work for us; but regeneration has also much to do with our highest and best development. The sins of the fathers must cease, so that the sons may be spared their terrible visitations; the accumulated virtues of parents must roll over on their children in purer, stronger, and better bodies until by a blessed economy the whole race shall be exalted to heirship with Christ through loving obedience to all the laws of physical as well as moral life.

Why may we not now, under the laws of redemption, begin to build a new heaven and a new earth, new souls and new bodies. If our souls are redeemed and renewed by obedience and faith, why not secure also the redemption of our bodies? I know it is slow work to teach the subtle but mighty elements of self-restraint. I know the flesh lusteth against the spirit. Yet I thank God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

"Some of self and some of thee,"
And my wistful heart said faintly:
"Some of self and some of thee."

Day by day his tender mercy,
Healing, helping, full and free,
Brought me lower, while I whispered:
"Less of self and more of thee,"
Brought me lower while I whispered:
"Less of self and more of thee,"

Higher than the highest heaven,
Deeper than the deepest sea,
Lord, thy love at last has conquered,
None of self and all of thee,
Lord, thy love at last has conquered,
None of self and all of thee.

THE COMING REGENERATION.

What the Scriptures Teach about the Characteristics of the Millennium.

BY REV. CHARLES K. IMBRIE, D.D.*

WE have already seen that, depending for information about the millennium entirely on the Scriptures, we are justified in expecting two events to take place:

First, the spiritual and physical renewal of the earth and the human race, and second, that the earth itself will be the scene of the kingdom of God promised by the prophets. A third fact disclosed is that this regeneration of the earth is to take place in the visible presence of God's King, the Lord Jesus, who "shall reign in Mount Zion and before his ancients gloriously." For to his presence, not only Isaiah witnesses but Daniel also and Jeremiah and Zechariah. So does Christ himself witness, for he says he will personally come to the earth and will cast out of the kingdom all that offend: and "then the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." And none can mistake the apostle John's declaration that it is in the visible presence of the returned Christ that the reign on earth shall take place.

4. That the saints of God from all ages shall reign with Christ over the nations of the saved, the dead saints being raised in the first resurrection, the living saints changed, and both caught up and glorified. For so the prophet Zechariah declares: "The Lord my God shall come and all the saints with him." So Enoch testified before the flood (Jude 14; 15). And so Paul declares: "If we suffer we shall reign with him"—that is, reign when he reigns. So Christ declares: "He that overcometh shall sit with me on my throne." So John declares: "They lived and reigned with Christ."

5. That this regeneration is to be preceded by a sweeping away of all moral evil from the earth—the almighty act of vengeance on the part of the King against the wicked powers of earth. (See the prophecy in Isa. ch. 24 to ch. 27). So also Christ testifies, that at his coming, "he will send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them who do iniquity." And so Ezekiel shows at length (ch. 39). And so the Revelation testifies that Christ, attended by heaven's army, shall go forth in battle against the Beast and the False Prophet and their armies (Rev. ch. 19).

More especially, that these enemies shall be gathered with intent against Jerusalem and the people of Israel (possibly in the hope of proving the Scripture untrue by the annihilation of that people), and that, there, shall be witnessed the Lord's judgment against them. So Zechariah testifies (ch. 13 and 14). And so the apostle Paul testifies to the Thessalonians (II Thess. 2: 8).

6. That the earth is to be purified by fire. Isaiah the prophet testifies: "The Lord will come with fire and with his chariots, like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many" (ch. 66: 15, 16). The apostle Peter also testifies "that the elements shall melt with fervent heat," hence the new heavens and new earth shall emerge. And lest any should doubt whether God can save any alive under such circumstances, the apostle points, in his second epistle, to Noah saved and to Lot saved amid a general destruction, in order to show that "the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of trial, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." (II Pet. 2: 4-10).

7. That after the desolating judgments with which the returning Lord and King will visit the nations, there will still be some left when the storm has passed by, who will doubtless form the source from which the nations will spring who shall dwell on the earth during the Millennial era. For so Isaiah testifies as to this spared remnant in the midst of the widespread destruction on the earth (ch. 24: 5, 6, 13, 16, 21, 22). And so Zechariah declares, also, that some shall escape of the nations destroyed of the Lord when they come against Jerusalem, and that these shall afterward serve him (ch. 14: 16). And so John declares in the Revelation: That, after the desolating judgments foretold in ch. 19; 13, 21, there will nevertheless be nations living during the Millennial era, who are not deceived by Satan then bound.

THE LAW OF GROWTH.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning July 29.
Ephesians 4: 11-32.

RIGHTLY understood, Christianity is in its very essence a growth and a development. Any conception of it which does not include growth and progress as vital elements, is mistaken and mischievous. There is little doubt that the formalism and lifelessness of many churches to-day is due to the fact that their members have not apprehended this principle. When a pastor or an evangelist urges men to accept Christ and assures them that by believing on him they may be saved, he is right and it is the glory of Christianity that in that way the most depraved may become sons of God. But the message should not end there. When it does, and the convert thinks there is nothing more for him to do, the result is fatal to Christian life. The convert is apt, after a few months or years, to come to the conclusion that either he was never converted, or that Christianity is not what it was represented as being. He finds himself in spirit and in life so like those who have never been converted that he cannot perceive any benefit that he has derived from conversion. Conversion is the turning of the man's face in a new direction, as when a traveler having the option of pursuing his path in the valley is incited to turn aside and climb the mountain. It is not sufficient that he should be convinced that the mountain path is the better road, that he should be enraptured with what is told him of the purer air, the glorious prospect, the grandeur of the mountain top as he stands at its base—he must climb. He must not wait in expectation of some mysterious power which shall waft him easily heavenward without effort of his own. He must toil upward often painfully with many a stumble and many a hurt, but unhesitatingly and resolutely. Alone and unassisted he can never do this, but he is never alone on that path. One goes with him, who cheers him, imparts strength and courage, lifts him up when he falls and points ever upward. This is the Holy Spirit whom Christ promises to all who try to live the Christ life on earth. But he helps only those who try. None are compelled in this effort. To the man honestly and earnestly striving after holiness of thought, speech, and life, the Holy Spirit comes, strengthens his longing, gives him new perceptions of the beauty of the thing he is seeking to attain and imparts to him new power in his unequal battle against his own animal nature and the temptations around him. And the man grows stronger, his thoughts are clearer; he flings off the weights that hinder his progress; he overcomes obstacles; and the joy of progress and development comes into his life. It is not an easy life; it demands self denial, constant vigilance and strenuous effort. In no other way can growth come, and in that way, only as the man learns to use power placed at his disposal. It is in religion as it is in nature, success is achieved by those who are in harmony with the law of the kingdom, which is the law of God.

THE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION.

The event of the week for thousands of our readers will be the great International Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union which assembles on July 19, at Toronto for a four days conference. This is the fourth of these Conventions that has been held: the first convened at Chicago in 1891, the second in Detroit, Mich., in 1892, and the third at Indianapolis, Ind., in 1893. Three years ago the Union was in its infancy and the presence of twenty-nine hundred enrolled delegates was considered a remarkable evidence of vitality and development. But this year provision has been made for not less than six thousand delegates, a number which will probably be exceeded. As all these come from societies of one denomination, the fact speaks volumes for the consecration and devotion of the young people and their enthusiasm in fraternal religious work.

On this page are pictures of the interior and exterior of the Massey Music Hall in which the meetings of the Convention will be held and a portrait of Mr. John Urquhart, the Chairman of the Executive Committee. The Massey Hall is a magnificent edifice only just completed.

THE B. Y. P. U. A. CONVENTION—VIEW OF MASSEY MUSIC HALL, TORONTO—CHAIRMAN JOHN URQUHART.

It will accommodate four thousand persons and it has another large room which will hold an overflow meeting of one thousand more, beside other rooms which can be used for Committee rooms and offices. The acoustic qualities of the hall are of the best and the ventilation perfect. It is a fine three story building of brown stone and brick and the main audience room, as shown in the picture, has two galleries which sweep around three sides of the room and afford good stations for hearing and seeing. The building cost $150,000 and is the gift to the city of Toronto of one of its philanthropic citizens, Mr. Hart A. Massey, the head of the firm of the Massey Harris Co., whose works for the manufacture of agricultural implements are located at Toronto, Brantford and Woodstock, where 1500 operatives beside clerks and other helpers are employed.

The evening of Wednesday, July 18th, will really be the most vital of the convention exercises though not included in the programme. On that evening there will be prayer meetings in the churches or Toronto for a blessing on the Convention and a large number of delegates have arranged to reach Toronto in time to attend them. The opening session of the Convention proper will commence on Thursday at half past ten with an address by Mr. John H.

Chapman, President of the Baptist Young People's Union of America. This is to be followed by addresses of welcome and responses, and the reading of the annual report. The afternoon session will be devoted to praise and prayer and an open Parliament on subjects connected with the work of the Union. Three "Workers' Conferences" in three of the Toronto churches follow this meeting at which the officers of the various departments of work will discuss special features. Two sessions will be held in the evening. One in the Massey Hall and the other in the Metropolitan M. E. Church.

Friday's sessions open with a sunrise prayer meeting. At the morning session the State and Provincial Unions will muster in sections. There will be a salutation of flags and addresses will be given on departmental topics. In the afternoon the four prize banners will be presented. These have been matters for competition in local unions during the year. One of them is for excellence in the Junior Bible Course; the second for Bible Readers' Course; a third for the Missionary Conquest Course, and the fourth for the Course on Sacred Literature. Seven Workers' Conferences in as many churches follow the presentation meeting, each with a special subject for consideration. At the two meetings of the evening, held as on Thursday, the Educational Plans for the ensuing year will be announced and discussed.

Saturday's proceedings will be mainly devoted to the rallies of State and Provincial and Sectional Unions in various church-

The papers to be read by officers and members of the Union all deal with subjects of practical interest in relation to aggressive Christian work or to the Christian Culture Courses which fit the young people to engage in it. These courses, familiarly known as "the three C's," have been very popular during the past year and an effort will be made at the Convention to render them still more effective and practically helpful.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Each of Guthrie's daily papers contributed ten dollars toward Endeavor work in Oklahoma. Twenty societies in the Territory suffered the loss of every member as a consequence of the movement into the Cherokee Strip.

The C. E. Society at Wessington Springs, S. D., gave $125 for home missions during the past twelve months, and it is now taking its first step in aiding foreign missions by assuming a share in the support of a young missionary of the board in China.

A model Junior Pledge of the Epworth League has been adopted in the Oskaloosa District. It runs: "I promise to do unto others as I would wish them to do unto me. I promise to read the Bible and pray each day. I will not swear or use any bad language, smoke cigarettes or drink intoxicating liquor."

The Iowa Conference Epworth League has been holding its fifth annual convention at Ottumwa, Iowa. The report showed 160 Leagues in the District with an aggregate membership of nearly 15,000.

An interesting feature of the convention was the response to a call for one minute addresses on "One good thing the speaker's league had done during the year."

The B. Y. P. U. of Brooklyn, N. Y., held its anniversary this year in Calvary Church. Mr. S. W. Kent was elected President for the year.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of the New York Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends (Orthodox) have decided to pay the expenses of one of their members as a missionary to Inland China. The Ohio Yearly Meeting has a station there. Miss Holmes of Brooklyn has volunteered to go, having recently graduated from Rev. A. B. Simpson's Training School in New York.

From the president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor of Japan, Mr. Tasuke Harada, comes the following encouraging report: "New societies are gradually added. Now fifty-seven are reported to me. It has been decided to hold the second national convention in Tokyo, July 11-13. There are not yet so many societies in this part of the country as in the southwest, so the numbers of the delegations may not be so large as last year, but there is every reason to expect a good convention."

Miss Antoinette P. Jones, Secretary of the Floating Society of Christian Endeavor, writes: A Floating Christian Endeavor sailor, who had previously experienced ill-treatment from captains, sadly entered a shipping office, wondering who his next shipmaster would be. A captain entered in search of a man, and advanced toward the waiting sailor. Each in the same instant discovered the other's Christian Endeavor badge. To the captain's question, "Do you want to go with me?" the sailor instantly replied, "Yes I do." Later on the captain and sailor gave their testimony, in Christian fellowship, in a meeting in the same Bethel.

Australian Scenes.

The Royal Park, Melbourne, and its Natural Beauties—Dr. Talmage's Visit.

WHEN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of our readers, its editor, Dr. Talmage, will be a sojourner in the Antipodes. From San Francisco he proceeded over a month ago to Hawaii, in the Sandwich Islands; thence to Samoa, and on to Tasmania, New Zealand and Australia, where he now is. In the great Southern Continent, it is his purpose to visit the larger cities, including Melbourne, Adelaide and Sydney, and probably Ballarat, Brisbane, Bathurst and New Castle.

There are many very beautiful scenes in and around the leading Australian cities, especially in the suburbs of Melbourne and Adelaide. The Royal Park in Melbourne (a glimpse of which is shown in the illustration on this page), is one of several extensive and handsome public parks and gardens in that growing city. It contains about six hundred acres, and is lightly timbered with grand old gum trees. Some of the land is used for recreation, and about thirty acres in the center are laid out to accommodate a rare zoological collection. The scene here around the mountain is very attractive. The foliage is semi-tropical, the ferns reaching a great height. In Melbourne there are four gardens, each decorated at great expense. Melbourne Bay is quite stormy and exposed, so the lakes in the numerous gardens are much used for pleasure boating. The Australian climate is remarkably fine, the only drawback being occasional hot northerly winds.

Winter in Australia is a mild season, and in Melbourne, at least, snow is unknown. The city, which was first located by white men fifty-nine years ago, has now a population of about 160,000, and many very fine public buildings. It is a port of considerable consequence, and the Yarra-Yarra river which flows into the harbor, is navigable for large vessels for a long distance.

Dr. Talmage is assured of a warm welcome by our Antipodean friends, who have long been acquainted with him through his sermons, which are widely published in the Australian press. He has received many very cordial invitations in past years to pay that country a visit, but not until this season has the opportunity presented itself. On leaving Australia, he will proceed to Ceylon and India, visiting many points of interest in Queen Victoria's Eastern Empire before setting his face homeward. His globe-girdling tour will bring to him a new and rich experience, which will not fail to add to the interest of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the years that are to come.

Songs in the Home.

Music should be well cultivated in the home circle. The power of holy song in family life is great. It should form a part of family worship, morning and evening.

Sunday breakfast should be later, the Sunday dinner more leisurely than the other days, and as a treat, the little ones ought to be allowed to sit up longer on Sunday night. If there is a dessert the little ones like very much, then have that on Sunday. In homes where the mother can play and sing, the children should have their hour of song on Sunday—an hour to remember in other years and in after life and to make these Sundays precious.

Pretty Child Fancies.

Children have the poet's gift of personification. Their vivid imagination endows everything with life, and they make companions of bird and tree, bush and flower, writes Harriet A. Farrand. A little girl was walking with her mother one day when they saw in the grass the first dandelion of spring. "Run, pick it," said the mother. The child ran, but presently came back without it. "Where is the dandelion?" asked the mother. "Oh!" answered the child, "it looked right at me and said, 'Please, little Helen, don't pick me. I want to stay right here.' So I didn't pick it." To her little sensitive heart the impression was just as if the flower had actually spoken the words.

A little fresh-air child, who was seeing the country for the first time, would throw her had likened the flaming clouds to the "vestibule of heaven."

THE CHILDREN.

ONLY to keep them so.
Soft, warm and young;
The wee, feeble fingers,
The babbling tongue,
Tears that we kiss away,
Smiles that we win;
Careless of knowledge,
As guiltless of sin.

Only to keep them so,
Sweet hands that cling,
Sweet lips that laugh for us,
Sweet tones that ring;
Curis that we train to wave,
Feet that we guide;
Each fresh step a wonder,
Each new word a pride.

Tenderly copying
Old thoughts and ways,
That scarcely keep measure
With life's rapid days,
Good to us—waiting,
Our sunset shows fair!
But, only to have them so,
Just as they were!

THE IDEAL YOUNG WOMAN.

The ideal young woman, says a writer in "Word and Work," helps the church in every possible way, teaches in Sabbath school, works on committees, willingly acts as organist or precursor in case either is absent, conducts a meeting if the appointed leader is detained. She has a warm welcome in her heart and a hand shake, and room in her pew for the stranger. No member of the family can do as well in the sick chamber as she. She shortens many of grandma's hours of pain by her attentive, cheery manner. Sacrifices her own pleasure so that she may minister unto her and give her mother some rest. She is just as each one with glad heart and voice participating. In many a dark and sorrowful hour the mother finds solace in singing one of the blessed hymns of Zion. And as the children, too, gather around the instrument in some quiet evening hour, while one is leading, and the other sweet voices uniting in strains of praise to the great Redeemer's name, the scene is one of peculiar interest, and indeed it is a miniature heaven on earth.

A SCENE IN THE ROYAL PARK, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA

Sunday Atmosphere in the Home.

There should be a bright atmosphere about the house on Sunday. It ought to be a gala-day, because it is often the only day in which papa and the babies can make each other's acquaintance with any freedom. Many men are obliged to go to business so early, and they return from it so late, that the children are asleep at both ends of the day, and papa is necessarily somewhat a stranger to their lives and interests. The herself upon the grass, face downward, and fondle and talk to each separate blade as she lay there, and the sight of a growing flower would throw her into an ecstasy of delight. One morning she came stealing down as soon as it was light. "Why didn't you sleep, Bertha?" called the house-mother as she heard the child coming down. "The leaves talked to me and I couldn't," answered Bertha, looking with eager eyes toward the open door.

A little boy stood with hushed breath and parted lips, listening eagerly to the twitter of a robin in the apple-tree.

"Don't make a noise," he softly said. "Birdie is telling a story to the apple-flowers."

A little girl was watching a gorgeous sunset, when with awe-struck face she exclaimed:

"O mamma, God has opened his door and I can see right into heaven!"

She did not know that some poet before mindful of father and her brother, two years her senior. She prepares their favorite dishes often, sees that their shirt fronts, cuffs and collars have the laundry finish, that the sitting-room is in order and the children presentable upon their return from work. She finds time to go with father to entertainments, or to hear a favorite speaker, if mother cannot accompany him. Anecdotes told by her brother bring forth the same merry laughter as those told by some other girl's brother. Intemperance she regards as the worst evil in the world. From observation and wide reading, she knows that in nine out of ten cases, drink, either directly or indirectly, is the cause of all disaster, wreck or crime. She knows that nothing consumes so much time or money, that nothing ruins so many men. She knows that nothing fills so many almshouses, breaks so many hearts, fills so many graves. In trying to reform men, she is guided by her Christian common-sense. Nothing less than a Christian can tempt her to take the marriage vow.

CHAPTER IV. THE BLIND SLAVE.

IT was in Rome. The city of the Cæsars, the city of palaces is all brightness and glory and magnificence. It is a festival day when there is to be an ovation to a successful general returning in triumph to the imperial city of the Seven Hills, and great and honored men will come to cheer him and do him honor. Into which of the palaces shall we enter, that we may hear of the glorious deeds of this great warrior? Wonderful they must have been to so stir the hearts of Rome's proud magnates. Prowess and martial genius are not so rare among the Emperor's generals that some small conquest should be thus honored. It must be some achievement of wondrous brilliance that procures its hero this ovation. The streets are in gala attire, and there are preparations for welcoming him by ladies proud and beautiful, and by aged generals now reposing in honored state after great campaigns, and by statesmen and high officials of the court. Who is he? So much it is easy to learn. His name is Corbulo, and it is on the lips of the hurrying crowd, and on the lips of the proud patrician, and on the rosy lips of the maiden as she is giving merry jest or laughing retort to her companions, and on the tongue of the majestic matron as she speaks to her sons. But what has Corbulo done? What new province has he added to the Empire, what strange people has he subdued? We may hear in the forum or the palace. But it matters not. Our business is not with him, or with the triumph. We are in Rome on very different business. We want to learn the fate of a beautiful Jewish maiden, a kinswoman of the dead Teacher of Nazareth, whose life-giving words are quoted reverently by humble people here and there in the poorer districts of great cities throughout the Roman Empire. It is four years since we saw the lovely face of that girl framed in the rippling black hair, in the roadway outside the Damascus gate of Jerusalem. Four years since, stepping gracefully out of the house of her humble kinsfolk in the southern quarter of the city, she bade them farewell and started for her home in Nazareth. It was in the hands of cruel and remorseless men that we saw her last—men who, unknown to her, had just stoned Theon, her lover, to whom, supposing him to be a stranger, but a Nazarene and a brother, she would have ministered as became one of her faith. They had thwarted her, made her a prisoner, and instigated by Saul, the persecutor, and Karmes, the implacable Egyptian, were hurrying her to a cruel fate. Where is she now? She is in Rome, the capital, the centre of the known world, where all women who are beautiful, and all men who are great and brave, long to go, that they may see Cæsar in his glory and the men who have made the name of Rome a power in the earth. Well, there is no woman in the brilliant throngs more beautiful than Zerola, though we see her not in those places of gaiety and fashion.

Zerola? To find her we must go below ground in the subterranean dungeon of a frowning fortress. We cannot see any one, but we hear a voice, soft and tuneful, but in a minor key, as of one who has suffered much.

"Perhaps this flower may be a blossom from the orchards of some peasant dwelling in peace beyond the Palatine," the voice is saying, "for it has the fragrance of humility. It may have slept on the fair bosom of some maiden of Rome, perchance the daughter of the Emperor—for it has the form of beauty. Or it may have dropped from the strong hand of some conqueror returning in triumph to his native land. Better still, it may be a hily from the grassy slopes of Palestine or the quiet valleys, from the hills of Bethlehem, or the groves of Nazareth. No, it cannot be! That loved land lies too far away across the blue waters of that waveless sea. And yet, O sweet flower, I thank thee for the message from the Father thou dost bring this lonely slave. Thou art crushed, as I, but thy spirit is not broken—nor mine! I cannot see thy tinted petals, yet I kiss thee for thy beauty, I love thee for thy purity."

It is Zerola's voice, and as it ceases, we hear the low regular breathing that tells us that she has fallen asleep. It was already night, although she did not know it. To her all nights were days, all days were nights, all time an infinite calm of eternal darkness.

Sometime after the voyage from Jerusalem to Rome, whither she had been sent the morning after her imprisonment, as the slave for the wife of a Roman general, by name Corbulo, who had been on a visit to Pilate from the capital of the Empire, Zerola had seemingly become quite blind. Doubtless this was from the principle that if any part of the body is not used it soon loses its strength.

The dark beauty of her large bright eyes remained, but sight was gone. Blind! No more to wander in waving woodlands and see in caverns of the arching pines the temples of the Father. No more to follow the crooked curves of noisy brooks and see in their winding waters a picture and a prophecy—the history of nations, the destiny of mankind!

And yet this very blindness kept Zerola from seeing some of the gloom amid which she seemed doomed to die. But why conceal the truth? The girl knew it all. Four yearning years had she languished in those cankering chains. Four years slept with frowning stones above on colder clay beneath, a pile of mould having been heaped in one corner of the dungeon for a bed. Each pillar though gaunt and hard, each slab though dead and heartless, was a friend. Full well the captive knew the weary way around that lonely tomb, for years and years ago her prison had been a sepulchre—as if it were not now! No windows dispelled the dreary darkness of that dismal grave. True there were crannies and cracks in the walls, but only one let in the light; and over it had been placed bars of iron—to keep a demon out—but surely now to keep an angel in! Every day through this narrow crevice the sunbeams used to come and try to bring some hope from the great world outside.

Zerola waited for their coming and knew the moment of their going. Beneath their beckoning cheering rays her rusty shackles grew golden. But chains of gold hurt just as much as chains of iron.

Those visitors from the skies were strong, yet very weak. How could a few wandering sunbeams alter the foulness of her cell, the hardness of her crusts! The single meal a day lowered on a rattling chain through a hole in the dungeon ceiling was ample enough, but of such repulsive food, that Zerola sometimes could not touch it, and was glad to hear the distant echoes of the footfalls of the guard dying away beyond the bolted doors of brass and iron hanging in the long corridors of stone, ever death-like in their stillness.

On this morning she knew there had been a triumph in Rome. The brightness and glory of the sun, coming in splendor towards the Campagna, had been almost rivalled by the magnificence of chariots plated with gold and silver, drawn by spirited horses prancing beneath robes of purple bedecked with jewels, trophies of the war. For Corbulo, who had bought her in Jerusalem as a present for his wife in Rome, had returned from abroad crowned with victory and glory, and was now marching in triumph through the proud portals and crowded streets of the imperial city.

He rode beneath the arches of flowers which kept dropping their blossoms to the pavement, and the people, as the chariot of the conqueror rode on eagerly picked them up and carried them to a thousand homes, patrician and plebeian, to be treasured as memorials of this triumphal day. In his hands the victorious Corbulo carried a cluster of the rarest flowers of Rome's most beautiful gardens, a present from the Senate.

Several of these shaken from their fastening by the motion of the chariot had fallen to the stones of the roadway. And it was one of them, blown by chance winds from the route of the procession, passed through the crack in her dungeon wall, and brought the kindly smile to the sorrowful face of the beautiful prisoner.

How many chapters of the volume of her life were now written the captive could not tell; but often, with comforting hand, did memory turn back the beloved pages of her youth and the blind slave wasting, though not pining, in the sepulchre-dungeon saw in a book that needed no light of taper or of sun, the pictures of her girlhood days. And again the child of Palestine lived in Nazareth; for so it seemed to her—she thought so often of the loved days that now were past and gone.

"How happy were those bright hours," Zerola would remind herself in order to chase away some of the gloom of her damp cell athwart whose dismal darkness would sometimes glance a gleam of joy, "when with my brother, my loved brother, I played beneath the waving palms and ran among the groves in my native land. No freer flew the birds!"

"And in the evening when my father had finished his work and my mother could leave for a short time our two baby boys, the younger merry, as the elder gentle, would we three walk along the hillside slopes sleeping in the twilight, along the darkening shores of quiet waters lulled to rest by softest winds, and speak together of the folding past and opening future, speak of that dark night when two travelers from Nazareth lodged in Bethlehem, and lo, at the dread hour—yet the angels' hour—above the green fields, above the blue hills, in the dark and silent sky the star of Christ was shining to tell the children of men that a man was born who, by a life of sacrifice and self-devotion was to show them the golden way of life—love to man the holy light that guides the soul to God—who was to be the Saviour of mankind, who was to teach by word and deed that wondrous truth whereby are fused the human and divine, whereby the sins and sorrows of earth shall be wiped away, whereby justice and harmony shall be king and queen of every nation and ruler in the world-wide empire—the Creator a Father, humanity a family, the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, universally acknowledged and realized."

Zerola moved restlessly. In that awful stillness of her dungeon, the stillness of death itself, she usually slept long and deep. Perhaps that was the only reason why she had survived. The sweet calm of one who trusts in God, of one who had seen the Lord in the days of his flesh and heard that wonderful voice speaking peace and love with the majesty and confidence of assured knowledge, kept her in peace. "Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness sake," he had said, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." And Zerola was finding it so. The kingdom of heaven was within her and it is always a kingdom of peace. So sleep gave her oblivion and she was spared the racking mental torture which men who have passed years in solitary confinement describe as maddening and insupportable. But on this night, the loud huzzas of the crowds in the streets penetrated to the subterranean dungeon and disturbed her rest. There must be life and movement there, she thought, those shouts must come from people who are free and happy. She was resigned to her lot, knowing that he whom she loved and worshipped had declared that the very hairs of her head were numbered and therefore this cruel fate had not come to her by chance; but youth and natural vivacity would assert themselves and force upon her thoughts the grim contrast between her lot and that of other girls in Rome. For a moment after waking she felt resentful and then reproaching herself she forced her thoughts into a channel where as experience reminded her, there was always peace.

"Let me recall that morning," she said, "when the clouds of a threatening storm kept the struggling sun-rays from shining on one of the cohorts of Rome, marching through the streets of Nazareth dragging into exile a young man who, for some crime against the oppressors of his native land, an accident the people said, had been condemned to toil the remainder of his life as a galley-slave. Such a look of mysterious sadness darkened his countenance, so torn were his garments, so harsh were the soldiers, that when Jesus gave him a cup of water and a word of compassion, the smile of human gratitude upon the captive's face which thanked him for his kind deed, was enough to soften the scowls and sweeten the curses of those heartless Roman warriors who seemed to think it an insult to the glittering eagles of their haughty Emperor that a Nazarene should dare to give a cup of cold water to a slave!

"O, Jesus, the slave in his chains in Nazareth thanked thee for thy compassion; and now the slave in her dungeon in Rome thanks thee for thy lesson."

"On that fatal day in Jerusalem when I saw the mob and the priests scourge and stone that helpless man, who by his many wounds would have been even to his mother unrecognizable, then in my soul rose the remembrance of thy noble deed on the streets of Nazareth, then I resolved that I, too, would give a cup of cold water to one of the children of our Father."

"And for that I am separated from my mother, from my father and from my lover, and buried in this sepulchre—I fear forever!—Yet I had rather die in this dayless damp, this lightless gloom and know that I have walked in thy holy footsteps of sacrifice and self-devotion—than roam forever in some paradise of serene beauty with cloudless and starry skies and have in the haunted chambers of my memory such ever-crying spirits as the bitter remorse and clinging guilt of a brother's blood. But, wrong is bitter, too, and stinging! Why should I be the victim of such injustice?"

Just then the clanking of chains was heard on the stones of the silent corridors above her tomb and Zerola recognized the footfalls of the sullen slave whose duty it was to bring her food and lower it through the aperture in the ceiling of her dungeon; a slave whom she had of course never seen, yet near whom she seemed to feel a presence not unknown.

Could Zerola have seen this jailer-prisoner she would have understood her sensations. Look closely at him as he moves stealthily about the prison. Those sinister features, those scowling brows belong to Karmes, the Egyptian. He, too, then is a prisoner of Rome with a lot, by one remove only, better than that of his victim. For Zerola was his victim. Saul had promised him that Zerola should be his slave, that he should have the first right to purchase her; but he could not keep his promise. He had not taken into account the presence of Corbulo at the governor's palace, and could not foresee that the wealthy Roman general would be struck with Zerola's beauty and would determine to present her to his wife as a slave. But so it was; and what Corbulo wanted, Pilate would take care should be done. Karmes had no influence that would weigh against that of a man so distinguished as Corbulo. So his coveted prize that Karmes had plotted and sinned to gain, was snatched from his grasp. But the crafty, intriguing nature of the man would not accept defeat without a struggle. He meditated on, and being unable to devise any means of getting Zerola into his power while she was under Pilate's jurisdiction, finally took passage to Rome in the vessel by which she was to make the journey.

It was a rash thing to do, for of all the cities in the world, Rome was the one in which it was most dangerous for Karmes to set foot. He had committed more crimes than he could remember, but there were some that were well known to men in Rome who would never forgive, and were well able to punish them. Karmes was taking his life and liberty in his hand when he sailed for Rome, and he knew it. He was a master in the art of disguise, and he trusted to his skill in that art to escape recognition; and, like all men who have suffered their passions to gain the mastery over them, he was heedless of consequences. Zerola had scorned him, had given her love to Theon, and there would be no rest for Karmes till he had inflicted vengeance upon her. He hoped that during the voyage he could prevail on the Captain to join him in a plot against the beautiful slave, and in this he was not disappointed. When Zerola landed in Rome, it was not to the wife of Corbulo that she was delivered, but denounced as a Nazarene and an evildoer, she was consigned to the dungeon where for four years she had languished. But this could not be achieved without Karmes coming out of the concealment that was necessary to his safety. He was recognized and thrown into prison to await his trial. So, all unknown to him, as to Zerola, the duty of attending to her wants was relegated to her enemy.

THE YOUNG PREACHER.*

THE youthful preacher mounted the pulpit, and after a short prayer gave out his text—"The world by wisdom knew not God." Every eye was fixed eagerly upon him, as he felt to his inmost soul, though he gazed all the while at the open page of the Bible. His face grew crimson, and then became deadly pale. Mrs. Unwin, who watched him anxiously from a side seat, thought he was going to faint, but he recovered himself, and in a voice only slightly disturbed, proceeded to divide the coming discourse into heads. Here he got along quite fluently, and taking up his first division—the world—he was about to picture the state of things in the first year of our Lord, when all of a sudden, his mind became an utter blank. He mechanically repeated his last words. He looked wildly at his tiny paper of notes, hoping it would give him help. All it said was—"condition of heathen world at coming of Christ." He sought in his memory for the facts he knew so well: not one could he recall. For what seemed to him an age, but was really only a couple of minutes, he stood, his knees shaking under him, while the congregation stared at him in open-eyed amazement. Covering his face with his hands he gasped out—"O, I have lost all my ideas!" and then he sat down in the pulpit, which was tall enough to hide him completely from view. In the merciful shelter he heard, as if in a half dream, the minister's voice speaking apologetic words; there was something about youth and inexperience, but what, he was too bewildered to understand. He heard the people moving away, and did not know how full of sympathy and of hopeful prophecies were many of them.

"Matt, my boy," said the minister, coming into the vestry, and perceiving the state of matters "you will not be cast down by this sudden nervous seizure. Many a most eloquent and gifted preacher has experienced the same."

Matt looked up in his guardian's face, grasped his hand, and then, turning to Mr. Masters with a haughtiness which sat oddly on his graceful person, said—"I shall preach next Sabbath evening." * * *

As the important hour drew near, he became a little restless, but he never faltered in his resolve, and presently he boldly mounted the pulpit stairs, and gave out his last Sunday's text. After a few moments, fear was turned to admiration. With the second part of his text—"The wisdom of the world"—he seemed delightfully at home. In simple and interesting language he told his unlearned hearers about the grand literature of the Greeks—about poets, historians, philosophers; ending with a eulogium of him whose conceptions of the soul and of wisdom were on a level with those of Scripture itself. He then spoke of the art which accompanied this literature—of the painting, the sculpture, the building—as unsurpassed and unsurpassable. He now went on to tell how the letters and arts of Greece became the study and model of Rome. "And yet," he cried, "we have seen that all this learning, all this art, all this admiration for noble and beautiful things, all this appreciation of the sage's wisdom, the worker's skill, did not save Roman society from corruption." Matt's train of thought led naturally to the third division of his text—to Him who, hidden from the knowledge of the world, was yet its only salvation; and in words so heart-moving did the young preacher speak of the God and Father of all, as to bring tears to many eyes, and to fill the old minister's breast with a holy joy.

Almost for the first time during his sermon, Matt, sensible of the effect he was producing, looked steadily at his congregation. As he did so there flashed into his mind the remembrance of another weeping audience. It only added force to his peroration, which was an appeal to his hearers to choose the heavenly wisdom.

The sermon over, he hurried down the pulpit and into the vestry, much to the disappointment of the people, who longed first to take a good look at him, and then to compliment him to his face.

Later in the evening, however, he had to bear some discussion of his sermon, for the minister's joy must needs find words.

"My dear lad," he said—the usually subdued light in his face changed to radiance—"you have astonished us all. There can be no doubt that an excellent gift is in you. Strive, then, to bring it as near perfection as may be; and yet always acknowledge it to be a gift, not a thing of your own achieving. And now, if you will allow me to act as your divinity tutor, I will say a word about your sermon. It was excellently thought out, and super-excellently worded; but one thing I must question, which is your view of the utterly God-forsaken state of the world before the coming of Christ. I often think there is a deep truth in Augustine's words—'What is now called the Christian religion has existed among the ancients, and was not absent from the beginning of the human race.'"

"Sir, you are good enough to commend my preaching, but I, for my part, feel as if I could never preach again."

VALUE OF MEDICAL MISSIONS.*

An English missionary in China was sent with his young wife into the far interior. He was 800 miles from the nearest doctor, a medical missionary. A time was approaching when a physician would be needed. They did the only thing they could do: started on the journey by wheelbarrow and boat. When half way from home, 400 miles, a doctor was needed, but none was near. Fortunately the case was a normal one, but the only help obtainable was that afforded by a poor old Chinese woman. They were utterly ignorant on the subject of medicine. Is it to be wondered at that that man, when he arrived home again, left his wife and children in England while he studied medicine in New York, ere he returned to China, where he is now laboring as an M.D.? Recently one of the leading dailies of New York contained an editorial article nearly a column in length commenting upon the marvelous success of his efforts since returning to China. Drs. Cameron, Douthwaite, Soltau, Randle and Anderson, all of the China Inland Mission, have so returned to study.

Other cases might be cited, but these are probably sufficient to show the value of this agency in this direction. Many valuable lives have been lost on the mission fields from diseases usually amenable to proper medical care, because such was not to be had; and many have no doubt succumbed in spite of the best medical skill and attention. But surely we ought to do all we can to save life, and certainly none the less so in the case of a noble and efficient worker in the mission field.

DIFFERENCES IN CHRISTIANS.*

The difference that obtains between Christians is not one of grace, but of the use we make of grace. That there are diversities of gift is manifest; and there will always be a vast difference between those who have five talents and those who have two, in the amount of work done for the kingdom of God. But as far as our inheritance of God's grace is concerned, there are no preferences, no step-children's portions, no arbitrary distinctions. It is not, as under the laws of primogeniture, that one child takes all, while the younger children are dismissed with meager allowances. Each soul has the whole of God. God gives himself to each. He cannot give more; he will not give less than himself.

If then you would want to know why it is that some of God's children live lives so much fuller and richer than others, you must seek it in their appropriation of God. Some have learned the happy art of receiving and utilizing every square inch—if we may use the expression—of that knowledge of God which has been revealed to them. They have laid all God's revealed character under contribution. They have raised harvests of bread out of the Incarnation; and vintages of blood-red grape from the scenes of Gethsemane and Calvary; and pomegranates and all manner of fruit out of the mysteries of the Ascension and the gift of the Holy Ghost. In hours of weakness they draw on God's power; in those of suffering, on his patience; in those of misunderstanding and hatred, on his vindication; in those of apparent defeat and despair, on the promises that gleam over the smoke of the battle, as the Cross before the gaze of Constantine; in death itself, on the life and immortality which find their home in the being of Jehovah.

The analogy that we have quoted, however, fails us utterly in its final working out. The emigrant at last covers his estate, its mines become exhausted, its forests leveled, its soil impoverished; but when a million years have passed, the nature of God will lie before us as utterly unexplored and unexhausted, as when the first-born son of light commenced like a Columbus in the spiritual realm to explore the contents of the illimitable continent—God.

INQUISITION TORTURES.*

They brought forward an instrument arranged for the victim to be fastened upon it in such a way that, when certain screws were turned, the ligaments and tendons of the body were gradually stretched, each turn of the screw increasing the strain. While the torture induced by this was agonizing, it was by no means equal to some of the others, such, for example, as enclosing the knees between strong horizontal supports, and then driving, one by one, small wooden wedges between the same, already as close together as possible without employing actual force. These wedges, thus driven between the bones forming the knee-joint, gradually shivered them to pieces, and when the victim was removed he was far beyond any surgeon's skill. If he did not die from the shock, he became a cripple for life. Others there were of still more fiendish device, and from the great variety of instruments, the Inquisitors were able to choose the one best adapted to the individual. Not the one which would give the least pain! By no means! But that which could be used without fear of inflicting actual death, racking the body with a physical agony which should stop just short of destroying life outright. No tongue can do justice to the description of the suffering inflicted, even upon delicate, sensitive women, as well as upon men. Think of some tender sister or friend, or lover, oh! reader! and then picture to yourself the scene wherein you are forced, by an irresistible power, to stand by and witness that person, gentle and innocent, unused even to a harsh word, in the act of being placed upon an instrument of torture, transcending an hundred-fold the most agonizing pain inflicted by the knife of the surgeon, or the most exquisite suffering induced by neuralgic spasm, or, in short, any physical agony to which the most unfortunate accident of life could subject her.

A POLICEMAN'S ADVICE.

A GENTLEMAN who recently visited the Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago heard a testimony there which he sends to the "Mid-Continent." "It was that of a young newspaper man who was formerly a sceptic. He came from Denver and had been seeking in vain for employment, and had gone upon a bridge intending to drown himself. His hurried step and maddened face attracted the attention of a policeman, who accosted him, and asked him what he was going to do there at that time of night. He told the policeman that there was no room for him in Chicago, but there was in Chicago river. "Now look ahere, young feller," said the burly, big-hearted policeman; "you'r a talkin' tro' yer hat, see? You aint going to jump into no river. You come along wid me, and I'll start you over to de Pacific Mission. Des got grub and fire fer such fellers what's down in dere luck like you are, see? And dey sing hymns and read de Good Book, and dey'll give you a warm place to sleep. Now come along." The young journalist went along. To make the story brief, he received the hearty Christian welcome promised. He was first warmed and fed, and then given an opportunity to hear good singing, short prayers and the common sense Christian talks he needed. It resulted in his conversion. In the testimony meeting before 800 men, he asked them, in his remarks, the question which he said had come home so strongly to him the night he tried to drown himself. "Does Ingersoll establish such missions as this? Do his followers? What makes these people care whether I drowned myself or not? Isn't there something in this Christianity I always doubted?"

A Relic of Handel.

The "Spinnet" Used by the Great Master in Composing his Famous Oratorios.

PROBABLY no elaborate musical production has ever been so widely heard or delighted greater audiences than the "Messiah" of Handel. At the Handel Festival, recently celebrated in England, several interesting relics of the great master were displayed, the finest and most attractive being the "spinnet" or the instrument at which many of his most famous works were composed.

Any lover of sacred music, looking at the old instrument (which is shown in the illustration on this page), must wonder at the genius and versatility that drew from so crude a form of the modern grand piano those noble and elevating strains that run through all of Handel's scores. Doubtless, the old "spinnet" looks to-day precisely as it did when it last responded to the inspired touch of the greatest musician of the earlier part of the eighteenth century.

Another relic of interest was a quaint, old, gothic book-case, which Handel presented to the son of his amanuensis, John Christopher Smith, and which, at the time of the gift, contained a collection of M. S. musical scores by the great maestro. The medallion, also among the relics shown at the Festival, is said to be the only youthful portrait of Handel extant.

THE SILOAM TABLET.

The famous "Siloam inscription," which ranks high in the list of Semitic relics, has been stolen. The inscription was in the purest Biblical Hebrew, and told how the tunnel was excavated which conveyed the water from the so-called "Spring of the Virgin"—the only natural spring in Jerusalem—to the pool of Siloam. The work and the inscription, according to Professor Sayce, date from the reign of Hezekiah, or, perhaps, from that of Solomon. The inscription was accidentally discovered ten years ago by a young man who fell into the water. It was in a dark place on the side of the tunnel, about nineteen feet in from the pool, and was only deciphered after an incrustation of lime deposited by the water had been removed by acid. The inscription has now been cut bodily out of the rock—being broken in the process—and the fragments are said to have been sold to a Greek in Jerusalem.

A PENITENT'S GIFT TO A PRIEST.

One of the converts to Protestantism at Florence is Pietro Petroni, a young priest of Lucca, who was attending the Florentine University with a view to a professorship. In a statement of his experiences, Signor Petroni says: "A Bible, given me by a poor sick man, imparted the first impulse towards conversion. In Buggiano, near Pescia, this young man was seriously ill. He wished to be confessed by me, the Lent preacher, and from a scruple of conscience, desired to get rid of the Bible, as a prohibited book, and to give it to me. I took it, and disdainfully threw it among a lot of other books which I never read. In tidying up my study and seeking for one or another book, this Bible somehow always came into my hand. I was struck by this circumstance, but it did not then weigh upon my mind. Having to go on a journey, and wishing, among other serviceable books, to take the four Gospels translated by Martini, I took instead as equally serviceable, this Bible translated by Diodati. It was in this way I began to read it. The first words which I read were these: 'There is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.' I thereupon ceased to recite the Roman Breviary. The worship of Mary was still in my heart, though I did not find 'Mother of God' in the Bible. Other words which comforted me were: 'Be ye justified by faith, we have peace with God.' This was like manna to my heart, agitated by remorse for sin. In reading this Bible, I experienced joy, but did not as yet reflect deeply. A sermon I heard in the Evangelical Italian Church touched me, as also the simplicity of the service and the sweet melody of the hymns. I thought myself already converted. In the absence of Cav. Fera, on a visit to the churches, I went to Signor Lenzi, who gave me a book on the Virgin Mary. Precisely here, in the worship of Mary, lay the difficulty in the way. Reflection and further knowledge of the Bible helped me to overcome this difficulty, but the help of God was still wanting. I proposed always to read the Bible, and to go and hear the Gospel, but in plain clothes and by night, like Nicodemus. My heart was not yet changed! What brought spiritual life into my soul was the reading of the Psalms, and I was forced out of Babylon by the words of Christ: 'Come unto me!' 'Abide in Me!' Petroni is now a minister of the Evangelical Church but his mother and his uncles, who are wealthy, have cast him off and disinherited him.

the past seventeen years in mission work in the slums and dives of New York, was instrumental in the rescue of three girls two weeks ago, whose cases are typical of thousands of others yet to be reached. Passing along Third Avenue at night she met two girls, one of whom was intoxicated. After talking with the other, the latter broke down in tears and decided to abandon her sinful life. Accordingly, she accompanied Mrs. Williamson to the Bethany on Ninth Street, where she stopped three days, and was then transferred to the Bethesda Home in Brooklyn. This girl, Kate —, is quite young and remarkably intelligent and prepossessing. She is a native of Cairo, Egypt, born of white parents. Left an orphan at fourteen, for the past few years she has been cared for by an aunt until recently, when she took to a vicious life. Margaret H— and Maggie W—, two other outcasts, were rescued in the same week, and after being temporarily sheltered at the Bethany, were transferred to the Bethesda. All were very glad and thankful to be taken in and evinced genuine sorrow for their sinful lives, and a desire to reform. "I was praying for somebody to come to my rescue when you came," said Kate to the missionary. "Will you—will you take me in?" cried Maggie W., when the offer of help was extended. "Yes," replied Mrs. Williamson, "we will take you in, poor girl, and help you to a better and happier life."

At the Bethany, which is a rescue receiving station, the girls are fed and sheltered until work can be procured for them, or until they can be permanently housed in some other institution. Such institutions are

BUDDHIST ENMITY IN JAPAN.

Writing to the Baptist Missionary Society from Tokio, Japan, Rev. C. H. D. Fisher says: At our Nihon-bashi-ku place we have had services Sundays and three evenings of the week. The house has been enlarged and its arrangement improved, so that many who have heretofore heard only while standing outside, have been induced to come in where they could hear with less interruption. Mrs. Fisher has gathered quite a little Sunday School. In the evenings, as the place is a very public one, in spite of the throwing of stones, the breaking of our lantern, and occasional satanic hootings outside, very many from a distance as well as from that immediate neighborhood have listened to the Gospel.

As an illustration of interesting cases I may cite that of a young man, who last year so far disobeyed his employer, a zealous Buddhist, as to listen while standing outside this chapel. After a time, like Nicodemus, he came by night to study, and then gave his heart to Christ and united with the Church, though he knew by so doing he would lose his employment. Being thus compelled to go elsewhere, it was but a little time later that in Northern Japan he had gathered together a little company to study the Bible. He sends back money for a hymn book that he may teach them to sing, and with it comes also money toward the support of his loved church here. This is one of many illustrations, also, of the manner in which work done here reaches far into the country, and they afford us no small encouragement to make the most of our opportunities here.

A Unique Charity.

The Philadelphia Sunday Breakfast Association and its Fifteen Years of Philanthropic Effort.

N EARLY sixteen years ago, a party of men met together in the city of Philadelphia to discuss a subject that lay very near to their hearts. There were twenty in the gathering and all, without exception, were men who had tasted the bitterness of life and whom sinful dissipation had reduced at different times to straits that were far from agreeable. But these men by God's grace, had become reformed: they had cast off their sin and taken on the righteousness of Jesus, and now they had come together to devise, if possible, some practical way of extending help to those who were still as they once had been, in the slough of misery and the wretched bondage of sin.

At that meeting, it was decided that the quickest and most practical way of reaching unfortunate idle men was by giving them a free breakfast, and thus, by first touching them with kindness, opening a way to reaching their hearts with the Gospel. This was the origin of the Philadelphia Sunday Breakfast Association. None of the original founders are now directly or actively connected with the Association; several of them have passed to their reward, many are remaining firm in their reformed life, while some have been lost sight of. The Association was reorganized in November, 1882. Its declared objects are the promotion of Christianity and Temperance, and the amelioration of the condition of the poor and of fallen humanity, by giving a free breakfast on Sunday morning, the holding of religious services and the use of such other means as it may consider wise to adopt. The five first years had given a practical experience, with an assurance of great good done and a permanency of the organization. A valuable property was purchased for the work, and a Board of Trustees was appointed. The present officers of the Association are: Lewis U. Bean, President; M. V. B. Allen and L. H. Suits, Vice-Presidents; David F. Dimon, Secretary; Halsey J. Tibbals, Corresponding Secretary, and Dr. A. H. Henderson, Treasurer. There is also a full Board of Directors.

Since its incorporation, the Sunday Breakfast Association has done much good work among a class very similar to that reached by the Travelers' Club, established in New York by Rev. Stephen Merritt several winters ago, and whose interesting history has already been fully told in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The original plan of a Sunday breakfast has widened out extensively, and the work of the Association is now on a broad, evangelical basis, including Sunday morning services, 8.30 to 10 a. m., and 10 a. m. to 12 m.; Bible School Sundays, Tea Services every Sunday evening, Apollo Union for Redeemed Men, Monday evenings; Society of Christian Endeavor, Fridays; Girls' Sewing School, Saturdays; Monthly Prayer Meeting and special religious meetings from time to time. The work has outgrown its original quarters in an old church on Twelfth Street, and a building with an audience chamber to accommodate 1,500 to 2,000 is contemplated. It is also hoped to be practical, at no distant date, to establish an Industrial Temperance Home in connection with the work, where unfortunate and homeless men can be lodged until some more permanent arrangement is made for them, and where they can earn their lodging by labor.

During the year 1893, the Association served 26 Sunday breakfasts, 52 Sunday suppers, 14 week-night lunches; the material used being 61,400 sandwiches, 1,354 pounds coffee, 137 pounds tea, 1,484 pounds beef, 2,260 pounds sugar, and 2,111 quarts milk. The total number of individual meals was 48,079. At times as many as 800 or 900 have been served with breakfast or supper, each person receiving two double beef sandwiches and three cups of coffee for breakfast, or four rusks and three cups of tea for supper. Brief Gospel services are held at all the meals. Encouragement is held out to all who wish to do so to declare for Christ and enter upon a new life, and many conversions have been the result. In fifteen years, 27,780 men have taken the total abstinence pledge under the auspices of the Association. The total attendance at all the meetings last year was 88,580, of which 3,476, or 4 per cent. of the whole number, came forward for prayer. Of the beneficiaries (48,079), 7 per cent. came forward, while thousands arose in their seats, and thus indicated a wish to be remembered at the throne of grace.

There is no doubt in the minds of those who have watched the work, that the movement begun so modestly fifteen years ago has been during these years a power for good in Philadelphia. Nor is it confined to men alone, for many excellent Christian ladies have labored in the field, and now, in the prosperity of the work under their hand, they see the blessing. The Sewing School was organized ten or twelve years ago at Wood and Eleventh Streets, when a few waifs, not more than a dozen or two, were gathered in and taught Christian principles as well as needlework. At the present time there are 102 names on the roll. Some of the original teachers have been with the school almost continuously to the present time. Its officers are: Mrs. H. J. Tibbals, President; Mrs. A. Barrow, Vice-President, and Mrs. J. W. Hastings, Treasurer.

On this page we present a portrait of Mr. Bean, President of the Sunday Breakfast Association, under whose energetic management, with the co-operation of his earnest Christian associates, the work has been pushed forward to its present condition.

A TEST OF THE GOSPEL.

Cannibalism has vanished wherever the Gospel has been proclaimed. When Rev. James Calvert was asked to give in one sentence a proof of the success of missions, he said: "When I arrived at the Fiji group, my first duty was to bury the hands, feet, heads and bones of the arms and legs of eighty victims, whose bodies had been roasted and eaten in a cannibal feast. I lived to see the very cannibals who had taken part in that inhuman festival gathered around the Lord's table." The cannibalism of Fiji was not simply the result of an impulse of passionate hate or revenge, but an institution inwoven with the very fabric of social life, and even religion."

Dr. Seeman suggests that cannibal feasts belonged to the ceremonies of religion. The ovens were never used for any other purpose, and whereas fingers are the only forks used in eating ordinary food, for human flesh a peculiar fork with three or four prongs, made of hard wood, and each fork known by its peculiar name, was used. Under Gospel preaching, these horrid practices have disappeared.

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

The Fate of the Once-Powerful Lunda Kingdom in Central Africa—A Royal Embassy to the Governor of Angola—Fetichism on the West Coast.

FEW African pictures possess so much interest for the average reader as the photograph presented on this page, which comes to us from Mr. S. John Kuno, an independent Christian mission-stationary stationed in Angola, on the West Coast. The photograph, which was taken at Loanda, the principal city of Angola, represents an embassy sent by the King of Lunda to the Angola Governor General on important business of state. Lunda was formerly a great tropical empire, and is still an extensive and important State. Its ruler was called Muata Yamvo, or Muat-yamvo, and when his power was at its height his domains extended from Lakes Tanganika and Nyassa to the banks of the Kuango river. It included the vassal States of Muata Kazembe on Lake Bangweolo (on whose shores the great explorer, Livingstone, died), of Kasongo, on the Luabala River, of Muene Putu Kasongo, King of the Ma-yaka, on the Kuango River, and the nation of the Makioko.

Accounts of the Muata Yamvo reached Europe through the medium of the Portuguese, with whom the Lundas had commercial relations, both on the West and on the East coasts. Several of the early African explorers came in contact with the Lunda rulers. As early as 1806, two Portuguese traders passed from Angola eastward through their territory. In 1846 another Portuguese trader, named Graca, succeeded in penetrating the Muata Yamvo's country, and he was followed next year by a Hungarian explorer, named Ladislaus, after which considerable attention was devoted to it by the great explorers in later years. Lunda embraces a great area of South Central Africa, and its people belong to the Balunda race of negroes.

Like the great native kingdom of Congo, the kingdom of Lunda has practically ceased to exist as a political State, and its territory has been divided between the Congo State, Portugal, and also Great Britain; but the Lunda nation, and the nations once under its sovereignty, continue to live as nominal subjects of a European power. For the last quarter of a century, Lunda has been in a state of anarchy, due to rival factions of Lundas, each of which the same exclamation: "It is no use; Lunda is dead; it cannot revive!"

If the destruction of the native Lunda state is chiefly due to suicidal dissensions among the Lundas, the quasi-annihilation of the Lunda nation is due to the raids of the Ma-Kiokos, its nominal vassals, who, equipped with fire-arms obtained from the whites of the coast, slaughtered the Lunda bow-men like sheep, and sold their captives to the middle-men, who provide the homes and plantations of Angola and St. Thomas with "redeemed servants" and "contract laborers."

Our illustration is specially interesting as exhibiting the style of dress that is regarded as appropriate for ceremonial visits to royalty, or to the governor of a great state. In the central figure—a prince, and the son of Muatvamvo—the headdress is one worn by royalty, and the peculiar horn-like projections mark it as distinct from the others.

of Lunda, but of Angola, and would indicate that they have been thus equipped after arrival, that they might make a presentable appearance before the Governor General.

There is a wide field for Gospel effort among the Lundas. Much progress has already been made among the Angolans, their neighbors, and a few devoted pioneers have carried the Gospel far into the interior; but the Lundas are yet to be evangelized. Although their country has long been a bone of contention, the outer world of civilization knows little of the people themselves, their customs or traditions. Mr. Heli Chatelain ex-United States Consul at Loanda, and an authority on African ethnology, has written most instructively concerning these people and their Balunda kindred. In Lunda, as elsewhere in "Darkest Africa," fetish-worship has been a feature of the religion of the inhabitants, and an interesting photograph given in this issue, shows a native prostrating himself before the fetish.

ing himself before the fetish.

The West Coast of Africa on the Congo, and eastward to the interior, is the very home of fetishism. The negroes believe in a good and evil principle, both supposed to reside in the sky, and the fetishes are used to appease this mysterious agency. Thus there is a fetish for the wind, and against thunder, for sea-fish, for river-fish, against thorns in the feet, against ill health, evil fortune, and bad bargains in trading, etc. When a man is about to commit a crime, he lays aside his fetish or even covers it up, so that it may not know of his act. The fetish in the illustration on page 467 is the figure of a man, stuck over with bits of iron, feathers, rags, etc., but usually it is a much smaller object, which can be readily carried about on the person.

Fetichism is one of the lowest forms of human worship, and consecrates "by a vague and mysterious reverence" the crudest objects fashioned in wood or stone, representing men, birds or beasts. The word itself is of Portuguese origin, being derived from "feiteico," a term used by the negroes of Senegal to denote an instrument or object of witchcraft. The fetishes used tried to put its own chief on the throne while none was strong enough to save him from being assassinated almost as soon as installed. The Muata Yamvo, whose son or nephew headed the embassy of the picture, was the protege of the Portuguese explorer, H. de Carvalho, who endeavored in vain to have him installed at the Mussumba (capital), and to reunite Lunda under a Portuguese protectorate. As Carvalho himself states it, all his efforts were frustrated by the despair of the starving Lundas, who everywhere met him with His sword is of the pattern worn by the Lundas, and his seat is a nebluz chair, such as are made on the Quanza River, Angola. On either side of the group are drummers, that on the right with a "dancing-drum," of the type used at festivals, while the one on the left has an odd-looking war-drum, a native with another dancing-drum squatting at his feet. In the background to the right stand three women, and a fourth kneels beside the prince. The Makuale swords and the drums and the attire of the men and women are not characteristic

WORTH LIVING.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Lamentations 3: 39, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?"

IF we leave to the evolutionists to guess where we came from and to the theologians to prophecy where we are going to, we still have left for consideration the important fact that we are here. There may be some doubt about where the river rises and some doubt about where the river empties, but there can be no doubt about the fact that we are sailing on it. So I am not surprised that everybody asks the question, "Is life worth living?"

Solomon in his unhappy moments says it is not. "Vanity," "vexation of spirit," "no good," are his estimate. The fact is that Solomon was at one time a polygamist, and that soured his disposition. One wife makes a man happy; more than one makes him wretched. But Solomon was converted from polygamy to monogamy, and the last words he ever wrote, as far as we can read them, were the words "mountains of spices." But Jeremiah says in my text life is worth living.

In a book supposed to be doleful, and lugubrious, and sepulchral, and entitled "Lamentations," he plainly intimates that the blessing of merely living is so great and grand a blessing that though a man have piled on him all misfortunes and disasters he has no right to complain. The author of my text cries out in starting intonation to all lands and to all centuries, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?" A diversity of opinion in our time as well as in olden time. Here is a young man of light hair, and blue eyes, and sound digestion, and generous salary, and happily affianced, and on the way to become a partner in a commercial firm of which he is an important clerk. Ask him whether life is worth living. He will laugh in your face and say: "Yes, yes, yes!" Here is a man who has come to the forties. He is at the tip-top of the hill of life. Every step has been a stumble and a bruise. The people he trusted have turned out deserters, and the money he has honestly made he has been cheated out of. His nerves are out of tune. He has poor appetite, and all the food he does eat does not assimilate. Forty miles climbing up the hill of life have been to him like climbing the Matterhorn, and there are forty miles yet to go down, and descent is always more dangerous than ascent. Ask him whether life is worth living, and he will draw out in shivering and lugubrious and appalling negative, "No, no, no!"

How are we to decide this matter righteously and intelligently? You will find the same man vacillating, oscillating in his opinion from dejection to exuberance, and if he be very mercurial in his temperament it will depend very much upon which way the wind blows. If the wind blow from the northwest and you ask him, he will say, "Yes!" and if it blow from the northeast and you ask him, he will say, "No." How are we then to get the question righteously answered? Suppose we call all nations together in a great convention on Eastern or Western hemisphere, and let all those who are in the affirmative say "Ave" and all those who are in the negative say "No." While there would be hundreds of thousands who would answer in the affirmative, there would be more millions who would answer in the negative, and because of the greater number who have sorrow and misfortune and trouble the "Noes" would have it. The answer I shall give will be different from either, and yet it will commend itself to all who hear me this day as the right answer. If you ask me "Is life worth living?" I answer, it all depends upon the kind of life you live.

In the first place, I remark, that a life of mere money-getting is always a failure, because you will never get as much as you want. The poorest people in this country are the richest, and next to them those who are half as rich. There is not a scissors-grinder on the streets of New York or Brooklyn who is so anxious to make money as these men who have piled up fortunes year after year in storehouses, in government securities, in tenement houses, in whole city blocks. You ought to see them jump when they hear the fire-bell ring. You ought to see them in their excitement when some bank explodes. You ought to see their agitation when there is proposed a reformation in the tariff. Their nerves tremble like harp-strings, but no music in the vibration. They read the reports from Wall Street in the morning with a concernment that threatens paralysis or apoplexy, or, more probably, they have a telegraph or a telephone in their own house, so they catch every breath of change in the money-market. The disease of accumulation has eaten into them—eaten into their heart, into their lungs, into their spleen, into their liver, into their bones.

Chemists have sometimes analyzed the human body, and they say it is so much magnesia, so much lime, so much chlorate of potassium. If some Christian chemist would analyze one of these financial behemoths he would find he is made up of copper, and gold, and silver, and zinc, and lead, and coal, and iron. That is not a life worth living. There are too many earthquakes in it, too many agonies in it, too many perditions in it. They build their castles, and they open their picture galleries, and they summon prima donnas, and they offer every inducement for happiness to come and live there, but happiness will not come.

They send to be harnessed and postillioned equipage to bring her: she will not ride to their door. They send princely escort; she will not take their arm. They make their gateways triumphal arches; she will not ride under them. They set a golden throne before a golden plate; she turns away from the banquet. They call to her from upholstered balcony; she will not listen. Mark you, this is the failure of those who have had large accumulation.

And then you must take into consideration that the vast majority of those who make the dominant idea of life money-getting fall far short of affluence. It is estimated that only about two out of a hundred business men have anything worthy the name of success. A man who spends his life with the one dominant idea of financial accumulation spends a life not worth living.

So the idea of worldly approval. It that be dominant in a man's life he is miserable. The two most unfortunate men in this country for the six months of next Presidential campaign will be the two men nominated for the Presidency. The reservoirs of abuse, and diatribe, and malediction will gradually fill up, gallon above gallon, hog-head above hog-head, and about autumn these two reservoirs will be brimming full, and a hose will be attached to each one, and it will play away on these nominees, and they will have to stand it, and take the abuse, and the falsehood, and the caricature, and the anathema, and the caterwauling, and the filth, and they will be rolled in it and rolled over and over in it until they are choked, and submerged, and strangled, and at every sign of returning consciousness they will be barked at by all the hounds of political parties from ocean to ocean. And yet, there are a hundred men to-day struggling for that privilege, and there are thousands of men who are helping them in the struggle. Now, that is not a life worth living. You can get slandered and abused cheaper than that! Take it on a smaller scale. Do not be so ambitious to have a whole reservoir rolled over on you. But what you see in the matter of high political preferment you see in every community in the struggle for what is called social position.

Tens of thousands of people trying to get into that realm, and they are under terrific tension. What is social position? It is a difficult thing to define, but we all know what it is. Good morals and intelligence are not necessary, but wealth, or the show of wealth, is absolutely indispensable. There are men to-day as notorious for their libertinism as the night is famous for its darkness who move in what is called high social position. There are hundreds of out-and-out rakes in American society whose names are mentioned among the distinguished guests at the great levees. They have annexed all the known vices and are longing for other worlds of diabolism to conquer. Good morals are not necessary in many of the exalted circles of society.

Neither is intelligence necessary. You find in that realm men who would not know an adverb from an adjective if they met it a hundred times a day, and who could not write a letter of acceptance or regrets without the aid of a secretary. They buy their libraries by the square yard, only anxious to have the binding Russian. Their ignorance is positively sublime, making English grammar almost disreputable. And yet the finest parlors open before them. Good morals and intelligence are not necessary, but wealth, or a show of wealth, is positively indispensable. It does not make any difference how you got your wealth, if you only got it. The best way for you to get into social position is for you to buy a large amount on credit, then put your property in your wife's name, have a few preferred creditors, and then make an assignment. Then disappear from the community until the breeze is over, and then come back and start in the same business. Do you not see how beautifully that will put out all the people who are in competition with you and trying to make an honest living? How quickly it will get you into high social position! What is the use of forty or fifty years of hard work when you can by two or three bright strokes make a great fortune? Ah! my friends, when you really lose your money, how quick they will let you drop, and the higher you get the harder you will drop.

There are thousands to-day in that realm who are anxious to keep in it. There are thousands in that realm who are nervous for fear they will fall out of it, and there are changes going on every year, and every month, and every hour which involve heart-breaks that are never reported. High social life is constantly in a flutter about the delicate question as to whom they shall let in and whom they shall push out, and the battle is going on—pier mirror against pier mirror, chandelier against chandelier, wine cellar against wine cellar, wardrobe against wardrobe, equipage against equipage. Uncertainty and insecurity dominant in that realm, wretchedness enthroned, torture at a premium, and a life not worth living.

A life of sin, a life of pride, a life of indulgence, a life of worldliness, a life devoted to the world, the flesh, and the devil is a failure, a dead failure, an infinite failure. I care not how many presents you sent to that cradle, or how many garlands you sent to that grave, you need to put right under the name on the tombstone this inscription: "Better for that man if he had never been born."

But I shall show you a life that is worth living. A young man says: "I am here. I am not responsible for my ancestry; others decided that. I am not responsible for my temperament; God gave me that. But here I am, in the afternoon of the nineteenth century, at twenty years of age. I am here, and I must take an account of stock. Here I have a body which is a divinely constructed engine. I must put it to the very best uses, and I must allow nothing to damage this rarest of machinery. Two feet, and they mean locomotion. Two eyes, and they mean capacity to pick out my own way. Two ears, and they are telephones of communication with all the outside world, and they mean capacity to catch sweetest music and the voices of friendship—the very best music. A tongue, with almost infinity of articulation. Yes, hands with which to welcome, or resist, or lift, or smile, or wave, or bless—hands to help myself and help others.

"Here is a world which after six thousand years of battling with tempest and accident is still grander than any architect, human or angelic, could have drafted. I have two lamps to light me—a golden lamp and a silver lamp—a golden lamp set on the sapphire mantel of the day, a silver lamp set on the jet mantel of the night. Yea, I have that at twenty years of age which defies all inventory of valuables—a soul, with capacity to choose or reject, to rejoice or to suffer, to love or to hate. Plato says it is immortal. Seneca says it is immortal. Confucius says it is immortal. An old book among the family relics—a book with leathern cover almost worn out, and pages almost obliterated by oft perusal, joins the other books in saying I am immortal. I have eighty years for a lifetime, sixty years yet to live. I may not live an hour, but then I must lay out my plans intelligently and for a long life. Sixty years added to the twenty I have already lived, that will bring me to eighty. I must remember that these eighty years are only a brief preface to the five hundred thousand millions of quintillions of years which will be my chief residence and existence. Now, I understand my opportunities and my responsibilities.

"If there is any being in the universe all wise and all beneficent who can help a man in such a juncture, I want him. The old book found among the family relics tells me there is a God, and that for the sake of his Son, one Jesus, he will give help to a man. To him I appeal. God help me! Here I have yet sixty years to do for myself and to do for others. I must develop this body by all industries, by all gymnastics, by all sunshine, by all fresh air, by all good habits. And this soul I must have swept, and garnished and illumined, and glorified by all that I can do for it and all that I can get God to do for it. It shall be a Luxembourg of fine pictures. It shall be an orchestra of grand harmonies. It shall be a palace for God and righteousness to reign in. I wonder how many kind words I can utter in the next sixty years? I will try. I wonder how many good deeds I can do in the next sixty years? I will try. God help me!"

That young man enters life. He is befetted, he is tried, he is perplexed. A grave opens on this side and a grave opens on that side. He falls, but he rises again. He gets into a hard battle, but he gets the victory. The main course of his life is in the right direction. He blesses everybody he comes in contact with. God forgives his mistakes, and makes everlasting record of his holy endeavors, and at the close of it God says to him: "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joys of thy Lord." My brother, my sister, I do not care whether that man dies at thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, or eighty years of age; you can clasp right under his name on the tombstone these words: "His life was worth living."

Amid the hills of New Hampshire, in olden times, there sits a mother. There are six children in the household—four boys and two girls. Small farm. Very rough, hard work to coax a living out of it. Mighty tug to make the two ends of the year meet. The boys go to school in winter and work the farm in summer. Mother is the chief presiding spirit. With her hands she knits all the stockings for the little feet, and she is the mantuamaker for the boys, and she is the milliner for the girls. There is only one musical instrument in the house—the spinning-wheel. The food is very plain, but it is always well provided. The winters are very cold, but are kept out by the blankets she quilted. On Sunday, when she appears in the village church, her children around her, the minister looks down, and is reminded of the Bible description of a good housewife—"Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

Some years go by, and the two eldest boys want a collegiate education, and the household economies are severer, and the calculations are closer, and until those two boys get their education there is a hard battle for bread. One of these boys enters the university, stands in a pulpit widely influential, and preaches righteousness, judgment and temperance, and thousands during his ministry are blessed. The other lad who got the collegiate education goes into the law, and thence into legislative halls, and after a while he commands listening Senates as he makes a plea for the down-trodden and the outcast. One of the younger boys becomes a merchant, starting at the foot of the ladder, but climbing on up until his success and his philanthropies are recognized all over the land. The other son stays at home because he prefers farming life, and then he thinks he will be able to take care of father and mother when they get old.

Of the two daughters, when the war broke out one went through the hospitals of Pittsburg Landing and Fortress Monroe, cheering up the dying and homesick, and taking the last message to kindred far away. So that every time Christ thought of her he said, as of old, "The same is my sister and mother." The other daughter has a bright home of her own, and in the afternoon of the forenoon when she has been devoted to her household, she goes forth to hunt up the sick and to encourage the discouraged, leaving smiles and benediction all along the way.

But one day there start five telegrams from the village for these five absent ones, saying: "Come, mother is dangerously ill." But before they can be ready to start, they receive another telegram, saying: "Come, mother is dead." The old neighbors gather in the old farmhouse to do the last offices of respect. But as that farming son, and the clergyman, and the senator, and the merchant, and the two daughters stand by the casket of the dead mother taking the last look, or lifting their little children to see once more the face of dear old grandma, I want to ask that group around the casket one question: "Do you really think her life was worth living?" A life for God, a life for others, a life of unselfishness, a useful life, a Christian life is always worth living.

I would not find it hard to persuade you that the poor lad, Peter Cooper, making glue for a living, and then amassing a great fortune until he could build a philanthropy which has had its echo in ten thousand philanthropies all over the country—I would not find it hard to persuade you that his life was worth living. Neither would I find it hard to persuade you that the life of Susannah Wesley was worth living. She sent out one son to organize Methodism and the other son to ring his anthems all through the ages. I would not find it hard work to persuade you that the life of Frances Leere was worth living, as she established in England a school for the scientific nursing of the sick, and then when the war broke out between France and Germany, went to the front, and with her own hands scraped the mud off the bodies of the soldiers dying in the trenches, with her weak arm—standing one night in the hospital—pushing back a German soldier to his couch, as, all frenzied with his wounds, he rushed toward the door, and said: "Let me go, let me go to my 'liebe Mutter.'" Major-generals standing back to let pass this angel of mercy.

Neither would I have hard work to persuade you that Grace Darling lived a life worth living—the heroine of the lifeboat. You are not wondering that the Duchess of Northumberland came to see her, and that people of all lands asked for her lighthouse, and that the proprietor of the Adelphi Theatre in London offered her a hundred dollars a night just to sit in the lifeboat while some shipwreck scene was being enacted.

But I know the thought in the minds of hundreds who read this. You say: "While I know all these lived lives worth living, I don't think my life amounts to much." Ah! my friends, whether you live a life conspicuous or inconspicuous, it is worth living, if you live aright. And I want my next sentence to go down into the depths of all your souls. You are to be rewarded, not according to the greatness of your work, but according to the holy industries with which you employed the talents you really possessed. The majority of the crowns of heaven will not be given to people with ten talents for most of them were tempted only to serve themselves. The vast majority of the crowns of heaven will be given to people who had one talent, but gave it all to God. And remember that our life here is introductory to another. It is the vestibule to a palace; but who despises the door of the Madeleine because there are grander glories within? Your life if rightly lived is the first bar of an eternal oratorio, and who despises the first note of Haydn's symphonies? And the life you live now is all the more worth living because it opens into a life that shall never end, and the last letter of the word "time" is the first letter of the word "eternity!"

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE LEPERS.

IN the course of a recent address, Rev. G. M. Bullock said that after fourteen years' work in India, he was called to take up a special term of missionary service—that in connection with the leper work in Almora, in the north of India, where work of this kind had been carried on for thirty-eight years by a good man who had now been called to his reward. It was good to be able to say that the grace of God had been manifested amongst these most miserable people; and, for himself, he could say that he had learned most of the riches of that grace in living amongst them than among many far more happily situated. In that village he had the joy of seeing—among 850 suffering under this loathsome disease, to whom he had been thankful to show in a small measure the sympathy which their Lord had never failed to show to lepers—some 450 of them return to give glory to God.

The Gospel message delivered to them had been greatly blessed. It was an affecting although harrowing sight to see a vast number of these poor people handless and footless. It was not surprising to find these people greatly wondering when told that God loves them. They have been taught by their priests and others that the disease under which they are suffering is the mark of God's hatred toward them, and that there is no life for them in heaven above or on the earth other than that to which they have been doomed. When they come to hear that God really does love them, then their hearts are overwhelmed with astonishment! Some of those, said the speaker, have said in my own hearing, "I do not know what the Lord can make of me, but since he says to me that he loves me, I will let him do what he likes with me." And that is just what all people have to say who are really brought into Christ's mind. It is very encouraging to know that in China and India there are two missionaries who are lepers and they are well qualified to declare the Gospel.

Scattered, Starved and Slain.

by the unevangelized tribes of Africa are sometimes natural objects themselves, such as birds, beasts, serpents and fishes, or the skins or claws of beasts. Stones even are sometimes used. In Dahomey, the tiger was a fetish for a whole tribe, while among the Whydahs, the serpent occupied a similar position. In Benin, it is said, some of the natives even made a fetish of their own shadows.

Besides tribal fetishes, each individual usually has his own particular fetish. The method employed in their selection varies. One choice may be the result of a dream. Whenever a man has a fetish which is supposed to possess unusual powers, he is envied by his neighbors, and efforts are made to get it from him. One writer declares that a Guinea negro of some importance in his tribe had a collection of fully 20,000 fetishes. At Cape Coast there is a peculiar shaped rock that projects into the sea, and which is held as fetish by the native priests and people. Sacrifices were formerly made to it each year, and whenever a response was brought to the devotee, through the medium of the priests, a present of some sort was expected by the priests as a reward.

To all intents and purposes, fetishes are essentially idols, although undoubtedly often used as mere instruments of sorcery, or for the purpose of producing fear. They are always approached with respect, and offerings of spice, milk and other articles are made to them. They are supposed to protect from rain, wild beasts, violence, storm, and sickness, as well as to protect property. Yet as soon as anything happens to make the worshiper distrust it, it is generally discarded or broken, while another takes its place. Slowly, but inevitably, the darkness of heathenism is giving way before the Gospel light, and the idols of Africa are falling at the advance of the kingdom of Jesus.

A GOOD SAMARITAN.

MISSIONARY of the American Missionary Society relates the following incident of his work: One Saturday afternoon as I wended my way along the bridle-paths that led through the mountains, my attention was attracted by the presence of a mule and dog in the bushes by the roadside, and as I came on closer I discovered a man lying flat on the ground face downward. I roused him somewhat, and said: "What can I do for you, my friend?" With great effort he braced up a little, uttered a groan, saying: "Nothing, I'm sick, but you can't help me; O, I'm so sick." "Well," said I, "I will get the doctor or do anything to make you comfortable." "Me? You spend your time with me, taint no use. I only a miserable wretch, drunk, and not worth bothering with." "But," said I, "I'm a missionary, I want to help you," and he said: "What's your business?" I said, "To help men who are sick, and I want to help you," and he muttered, "Be you a Christian?" I answered in the affirmative; then he asked, "Where you going?" I told him nearly as I knew, guessing it to be about seven miles away. "Why that is close to my home, pard—right close by the little church—we got them Christians over there, but they don't want to help a man like me," and off again into a stupor he went. His hat lay on the ground, and I selected some temperance cards from my outfit and slipped them under the inside band of his hat, leaving the ends in view so he could see them when he sobered. As it was an out-of-the-way place, I felt it a duty to get him somewhere, and finally succeeded in helping him on his mule, but his whole body was so limp I could not hold him on. I had to hold him to save him from falling. I worked with him as best I could until it was almost night, and succeeded in getting him to a cabin where he could be cared for. As I left him he said "Pard, if you come this way I want you to come to my home. I'm going to be a better man and want you to know it. You have been mighty good to me." I bade him good-bye promising to meet him at his home. The following Sunday I left my home before daylight to meet my appointment. I had a few moments to spare after reaching the place, so I called at the home, was met by the wife, to whom I introduced myself, after which she told the story of her husband's escape and return, and their interest in the one who had been kind to him. At this point she introduced the children. He had gone home and told his wife and neighbors of the man who was interested in him, showed them his hat with his cards to corroborate his statement, saying,

"this man was the good Samaritan." Presently her husband came in and seemed very much pleased to find me, told the story over again, went with me to the service and promised to go to the meetings of the Christian Endeavor Society where they will look after him."

A DREAM OF RATS.

Great potentates have sometimes found it difficult, as we read in the Bible, to find a man with skill to interpret their dreams. It appears, however, that a Scotchman recently had the good fortune to find such an interpreter in his own family, and the interpretation, like some others we read of, was just as useful and as unacceptable as theirs. A Dundee journal says that a laborer on the docks of that city told his wife, on awakening, a curious dream which he had during the night. He dreamed that he saw coming toward him, in order, four rats. The first one was very fat, and was followed by two lean rats, the rear rat behind being blind. The dreamer was greatly perplexed as to what might follow, as it had been understood that to dream of rats denoted coming calamity. He appealed to his wife concerning this, but she, poor woman, could not help him. His son, a sharp lad, who heard his father tell the story, volunteered to be the interpreter. "The fat rat," he said, "is the man who keeps the public house that ye gang till sae often, and the two lean ones are me and my mother and the blind one is yerself, father."

THE BAPTISM OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 5. Mark 1: 1-11. Golden Text, Mark 1: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ACCORDING to the Gospel of Mark, "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ" was the preparation for it in the work of John the Baptist. "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Even as it is written in Isaiah, the prophet, Behold I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way." May not also "the beginning of the second coming of our Lord be the preparation for it in the hearts and lives of his people, which is being carried out, as the Holy Ghost goes round with them and succeeds in conforming them to the image of God's Son? The coming of John the Baptist was God's preparation for the coming of Jesus. Those who have not learned the great lesson which John came to teach and have not been baptised with the baptism of repentance,—a complete change of mind toward God—are not really ready for the remission of sins unto which this baptism led (ver. 4, R.V.). To be forgiven sins which we have not learned to abhor and to flee from, is to make it easier to sin, and to countenance the horrible idea which existed even in Paul's day, to continue in sin that grace may abound, thus to "make Christ a minister of sin."

John was unsparing in his dealing with sin. A form of godliness without the power was prevalent then as now: there were those who were exact, even to the greatest minutia, in all the forms and observances, which could attract attention to themselves, and gain them credit for piety, while the broken and contrite heart, which God will not despise was utterly lacking. Their only idea of religion was "a something that should minister to them, even in that which they would give to God: all their works they did "to be seen of men," to gain applause, it was all outside, all empty, all vain. Into the midst of such a religious atmosphere there came the rumor that a prophet had appeared. It was nearly four hundred years since a prophet had lifted up his voice for God in the midst of his chosen people Israel. Perhaps, at first it was the novelty, later on it was the power of his testimony, which drew out the inhabitants of Jerusalem to an improvised camp-meeting, in the wilderness of Judea, and there, in unsparing faithfulness, the unworshipful herald of a coming Messiah denounced the sins of his time, until his axe, which was laid to the root of the trees, had brought down some of the stoutest hearts of the dwellers in Jerusalem. God himself gathered the audience: "Thee went out unto him all the country of Judea and all they of Jerusalem," and they were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins. Priests and Levites, rich and poor, learned and ignorant. It was a tremendous movement, taking in, as it did, an entire population. It was a most unwelcome thing to hear even the ecclesiastical dignitaries, overpowered by the wave of conviction which swept over the awakened multitudes, confessing their sins.

John Lived for His Vocation.

Like Elijah of old, he was a man apart, a silent man, a man of one idea. Food and clothing, which take up a very large portion of the time and thoughts of some people, did not occupy John. Just what the desert could supply, without his holy solitude being interrupted to obtain it was sufficient for the prophet of the desert, the garment of camel's hair, with a girdle of the skin around his loins, was the only garment he cared for; appearance was nothing to him, he lived to eternity and not for time, for God and for the coming Messiah, not for the eye of man. His message was un-form "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," "Repent ye," "There cometh after me he that is mightier than I, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose. I baptize you with water, but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." The faithful forerunner of Christ aimed at a preparation for his coming, not external but in the hearts and consciences of his hearers. His vocation was to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and the obedient to walk in the wisdom of the just, to make ready, for the Lord a people prepared for him; and the man of repentance did not rest until those who heard him were awakened and said: "What must we do?" Master, what must we do? John the Baptist is not to blame if the twelve apostles mistook, and imagined all the time that Christ would set up a temporal kingdom. He never dealt with externals, and he cut ruthlessly at the root of all which was unreal and superficial. "Think not to say within yourselves: We have Abraham to our father, for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham."

It was while his ministry was at its height that Jesus came from Galilee to the Jordan unto John to be baptized of him. But John would have hindered him saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? Our Lord did not contradict him, but reminded him that his vocation was To Fulfil all Righteousness.

What others needed for their own sinful life, he went through for their sakes. "And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens rent asunder and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him; and a voice came out of the heavens, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased." We cannot, with our finite minds, dive into the mystery of the union of the Divine and the human in our Lord. As a Son (in his human nature) "though he were a Son [in his Divine nature], yet learned he obedience by the things he suffered," (Heb. 5: 8). As man he must have sought and found directions from his heavenly Father while still in Galilee, as to the part he had to take in the wonderful movement going on in Judea through the preaching of John. And now it was revealed to him that he must take the journey to the Jordan, and join the company of those to be baptized. But what a moment that must have been to him, when his physical ears heard the testimony of his heavenly Father and his human eyes saw heaven open and the Spirit descending upon him! Now he knew that the time of his ministry must begin. He had taken the lowest place in coming to be baptized, and there he had received the Father's witness to him. And what a moment for John the Baptist! It had been revealed to him when he was first sent to baptize with water: "Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending and abiding upon him, the same is he that baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." (John 1: 33). All through his ministry, John's eyes had been looking out for the Messiah; he knew that he was in existence, that one day he should see him. All the years in the desert were a preparation for that moment; he existed to bear witness to God's Christ; he was born for no other purpose; and now he was sure that this was he! His ministry was nearly fulfilled; he had now only to bear witness to him, and then his life work would be completed! It was a tremendous moment for the Son of Man; it was a tremendous moment for this faithful forerunner. Jesus knew, and John knew, that the ministry of the Messiah had begun. There have been some in the history of the world, and each of them has concerned the Son of Man. There is another intense moment, perhaps very near at hand: it is the moment when Jesus will appear a second time, apart from sin, to them that wait for him unto salvation. The preparation of the Lord's return is exercising many hearts: like the ministry of John the Baptist, it has nothing to do with externals in churches or in politics; it deals with the hearts of men. When the day dawns, the day of his coming, the Daystar arises "in our hearts." As the fear of the Lord, justice, righteousness among men, formed the preparation for his first coming, so the study of the word, and the learning Christ and Christlikeness of heart and life, and the yielding to the Spirit who seeks to conform us to the image of God's Son, forms the true preparation for his second coming. He comes to seek his Bride, but his wife must have made herself ready, and the fine linen in which she is arrayed is "the righteousness of the saints;" it is the holy lives, Christlike lives, which hasten the Lord's return. John recognized Jesus by the witness of the Father from heaven; those who like John are intent on the true preparation for the coming of our Lord, will not be taken unawares, they will know him when he comes: "Ye are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief."

THE PLACE OF BAPTISM.

Judea, proclaiming, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The message was startling to the Jews of that day. They were under the dominion of Rome, but they were restive and unsubdued. In their past history they had been conquered again and again, but their God had always delivered them by the hand of some man specially raised up and commissioned for the purpose. A deliverer was needed at that time, and some thought he would be the long-expected Messiah. At this juncture the people in Jerusalem heard that some man was preaching in the wilderness which stretched between the city and the Jordan. Although connected through his father with the priestly class, he was no priest, and the Pharisees, the religious leaders of the day, sent a deputation to hear him and find out what authority he had to preach. Many people had gone already, and they had been so deeply affected as to submit themselves to baptism, a rite not included in the Temple ritual. It was a strange, weird figure that the deputation saw. A man whose home was the wilderness, his food such as he could find there, his dress not a priestly robe, but merely a camel's hair garment, with a leather girdle. A fanatic, they doubtless thought him, as the people of our day would have called him. He put aside all their questions as to his credentials, and even his individuality, declaring that he was only "a voice." His commission like that of the ancient prophets was to deliver a message. God needed that the people should hear a word from him and this man was the voice pronouncing it. The answer was perplexing and unsatisfactory, but we may suppose the deputation carried it back to those who sent them. Meanwhile the crowds of listeners increased. The kingdom of heaven was at hand; the Jews would understand the phrase to mean the rule of God, that God was about to resume his place at the head of the nation. Preparation for such an advent was necessary and John defined it. Repentance was the first duty. To each class he prescribed the duty of the class. The tax-gatherer was to cease extortion, the soldier was to cease unlawful violence, every man was to be generous and compassionate. The people heard and heeded and in token of their resolve to reform underwent the rite of baptism. But as John told them, all this was only preparatory. Reformation was merely to be the prelude to a deeper work. One was coming who would be more thorough and would lay the axe to the very root of the tree. To John in the wilderness Jesus came for baptism and John protested. Whether he had any previous acquaintance with him we are not told, but John said he did not know him as the Messiah until he saw the descent of the dove, which, as he had been informed, would be the sign by which he might recognize the Lord. He yielded to the request of Jesus and the token was witnessed. His work was done and he decreased as the new Teacher increased.

The Spirit like a dove. John had spoken of Jesus as a mightier than he, baptizing with the Holy Ghost and with fire; but when he saw the Spirit descending it was like a dove, the gentlest of God's creatures. Julius Hare compares it to the sunlight. He says: Oftentimes, when walking in a wood near sunset, though the sun itself be hid by the height and bushiness of the trees around, yet we know that he is still above the horizon, from seeing his beams in the open glades before us, illumining a thousand leaves, the several brightnesses of which are so many evidences of his presence. Thus it is with the Holy Spirit, he works in secret, but his work is manifest in the lives of all true Christians. Lamps, so heavenly, must have been lit from on high.

One mightier than I. It would be deeply interesting to learn what John's conception of Christ was. He had stirred the hearts of the people by his denunciation of the sins of society and all Judea was moved. What did he think one mightier than he would do? The Jews, too, were hoping for a mighty deliverer, and they refused to recognize him in Christ, yet to-day Christ's dominion is wider and greater than John or the Jews ever dreamed of. The gentle influence has done more than force ever could. Workmen in stone quarries sometimes find a very hard kind of rock. They pick little grooves for the iron wedges, and then, with great sledge-hammers, drive and drive the wedges into the flinty rock. And yet once in a while, they fail to divide the solid mass. The iron wedges and the sledges prove useless. But there is yet another way. The iron wedges are removed from the narrow grooves. Then little wooden wedges of a very hard fibre, are selected. The sharp well-made wooden wedges are inserted in the grooves tightly and water is kept in the grooves. The workmen just let the wet wedges alone. The damp wood swells; the particles must have room to enlarge, and the granite hearts of the rocks cannot withstand this silent influence. In a little while the solid rock parts from top to bottom, and the work is done. The wood accomplished silently what the iron wedges and the heavy blows failed to do.

Confessing their sins. This must be done to God. He alone can give pardon. The confession must be accompanied by real sorrow, and all the greater sorrow on account of the free forgiveness promised. A right-minded child whose father forgives his wrong-doing, is all the more sorry on account of having sinned against so kind a father. But the sorrow must be real, not lip sorrow only. It is related that in an Italian church, under the influence of a powerful sermon, many professed repentance. The preacher asked every one who was really penitent and meant to quit his sin, to hold up his right hand. Hands went up all over the building. Then the preacher said, "O, mighty Gabriel, angel of God, cut off every hand that has been held up hypocritically." Instantly every hand dropped. The ruse showed that there was none of the true repentance which includes reformation.

Baptize you with the Holy Ghost. The baptism of the Holy Spirit brings power for the salvation of souls as it did with the Apostles on the day of Pentecost. Mr. Moody says: There was an old deacon in a city in Michigan who was connected with a church in which there had been no conversion for sixteen years. He came to his death-bed and felt that he could not die in peace. He sent for the minister, but he had been too long accustomed to the darkness to be easily awakened. Failing with all the male members of the church, he sent for the ladies and pleaded with them to pray for a revival. They prayed, and in a little while the whole church was moved. I received a dispatch from the minister. On my arrival he took me into a room filled with these ladies praying that the Lord would reveal his power. I felt, as soon as I entered, that God was there. The next night the power came, and in forty-eight hours there was scarcely a young man or young woman who was not either converted to God, or anxious to be saved.

Greeting From Mr. Moody.

The Great Evangelist's Heart Touched by the Gifts of God's People—The Fund Growing Apace and Interest in the Gospel Crusade Spreading Daily.

EVIDENCES are multiplying on every hand which show that the appeal of Evangelist Dwight L. Moody, through the medium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has set thousands of hearts on fire with zeal for the new Gospel crusade. His letter, which we publish to-day, expresses in a few simple, direct sentences, the gratitude he feels for this widespread co-operation, and it also gives utterance to the conviction, which will find echo in the hearts of believers everywhere, that the work is one of God and that a blessing will surely result to all who aid it in the right spirit.

There is not to be found anywhere, at the present time, a grander or more deserving work than this effort on the part of the Lord's people to so extend the facilities of the Bible Institute that it shall be able to train, equip and send forth in the near future a great army of home mission workers, to reach the thirty millions of churchless men, women and children in America. Our Master, himself, gave us the key to this very situation: "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in." And if those Christians who have read the Moody appeal will respond to the extent of their ability, the army will be supplied and the battle waged successfully. When the hands of Moses were heavy, Aaron and Hur stayed by him and upheld his hands, so that Israel prevailed against Amalek. If the children of the Master unite in holding up the hands of this trusted and honored servant, who has devoted his life and energies to the cause, the battle for souls will be won and under Divine guiding, many thousands of those who are now out of Christ may be redeemed and brought into the Gospel fold.

Daily Work at the Institute.

As many of our readers inquire regarding the nature of the training at the Bible Institute, we give in outline, a sketch of the routine daily work of the average student: On Monday, which is "rest day," the work is arranged for the entire week, affording ample time and opportunity for necessary special preparation. As an illustration of such assignment of a week's work for the individual students, we take the case of a young woman, who has the following programme: "Tuesday" afternoon, conduct a children's meeting on Larrabee street. Wednesday evening, attend a Gospel meeting at Institute Hall. Thursday afternoon, street visitation. Friday evening, cottage meeting on the street. Saturday evening, home prayer-meeting." This programme, of course, takes no account of the regular daily Bible and music studies of the Institute.

In view of the fact that the young women of the Institute take their part in street work, house-to-house visitation, conducting services in police stations, halls, tents, and homes, coming in daily contact with the rough side of life, the anxious question has sometimes been asked: What is the effect of all this training upon them? Does it not make them bold, coarse, rude, unwomanly? The answer is: It seems to work just the other way. The atmosphere in which this Institute life and activity unfold themselves is too pure and vital for such evil germs to develop. There is there no encouragement for anything to grow save that which is true and pure and of good report. It is the custom to assign the section of some street to an individual student; but two usually go together in the work of visitation. Many a woman is found by these visitors hidden away in the midst of household cares, neglecting church and losing all care for better things. Such visits are greatly blessed. These mothers in the midst of their cares are encouraged to come to the Wednesday mothers' meeting. They can bring all their little ones, as these are cared for in the kindergarten room. There the weary mothers have a restful hour, and their souls are awakened to their deepest spiritual needs. Then they come to the Sunday afternoon Bible class, the little ones being taken to the primary department in adjoining rooms. They will then be inclined to attend the Sunday evening service of the church, and perhaps their husbands will join them. Then follows the Sunday morning service, and during all this the street visitor is doing her precious work in the home, and arranging to open a cottage meeting, it may be. Finally, we see these mothers enter the fold of the church. This is the history of many a woman who to-day says from a full heart: "I do not know where I should have been but for the Institute workers."

House to House Visitation.

All the students attend the classes for Bible study in the morning. Afternoon and evenings are devoted to practical work. Those who are out in the afternoon are expected to spend the evening in study, and evening workers have had the afternoon unbroken for the same purpose. Afternoon work consists of house-to-house visitation, conducting children's meetings, women's meetings, and calls for Sunday School classes. Evening work is mainly devoted to Gospel meetings and cottage meetings.

The meeting for women, on Wednesday afternoon, is made up from women gathered from house visitation, with the workers on those streets, who are there to welcome people of America have come to the rescue, however, there is a promise of a glorious future when every available worker can be thoroughly trained and qualified as only Mr. Moody can train them, and sent out to win souls for the Master.

Every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should have a share in this blessed work. Each gift, no matter how small, will help to educate and equip these messengers of love and mercy, and even the smallest offering may ultimately become the means of bringing some poor wandering sinner back to the path that leads to happiness and heaven.

Gifts Sent With Prayer.

A reader in Vineland, N. J., ($5), writes: "This was a present to me from a very dear friend, who has more means than I have, although an old man, like myself. I am now in my eighty-fourth year, and am obliged to live very economically; but there is a Scripture which says: 'There is that scattereth and yet increaseth, and that withholdeth, but it tendeth to poverty.' Knowing the object and the man so well, to whom it is going, as well as for the good cessful," Mrs. B. Jeffers and Miss Annie Jeffers, Kalamazoo, Mich., ($2). "It is sent in his name. May the Spirit of God rest on all who are engaged in this glorious work of bringing this world to a knowledge of the Saviour." A young reader at Hudson, Mass. ($1), writes: "Please accept this contribution from a boy who hopes, with the help of the Lord, to go to the Bible Institute."

A most touching letter is that of Mrs. Eveline M. Dick, of South Boston, Mass., which accompanies a beautiful gift presented to the Moody Gospel Fund. She writes:

Reading about the good work that Mr. Moody is engaged in, and wishing to have a share, I send the "widow's mite." With this letter I send you, by express, a white-shelled bed-spread. There are 447 pieces in it—each piece of work in each shell, three or five minutes in the half-shells; all knit by my own hands. Please sell it and give the proceeds to Mr. Moody for his work. "Cast thy bread upon the waters and thou shalt find it after many days."

This beautiful gift, the product of several months' loving labor, is something that tells more eloquently than words how earnest and sincere is the desire of God's people for the success of the work committed to Mr. Moody's hands. It will be disposed of as the donor desires and the proceeds applied to the Gospel Fund. Our next issue will contain an illustration of a section of this beautiful gift, and all our readers will have an equal opportunity of securing the prize.

Dear Mr. Klopsch:-

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your check for one thousand dollars for the Bible Institute of Chicago. Permit me to thank you for your kindness in allowing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to become the vehicle for presenting to the public the claims of the Institute, and to thank your readers through you for their prompt and generous response to the appeal. To every one of your readers who has contributed to this fund, I wish to express my sincere gratitude. They are helping the Cause of Christ more than they know. The doors of the Institute are besieged by earnest, consecrated, intelligent men and women, who need only such training as is given in the Institute to become successful soul-winners. This money that comes through you enables us to receive some of them; but there are many others, still waiting. For them I appeal. Christ waits for their service, the world waits for their life-giving message. I long to send them forth properly equipped for their work. May I hope that you will continue to receive contributions for the purpose? And may God bless you and your noble journal and your generous readers.

them and introduce them to others. Five police stations in the city of Chicago alone are in charge of the workers, who conduct a brief service of singing, exposition of Scripture, and prayer, once a week, before roll-call. This can be done in other cities also. The sailors are not forgotten in the ministrations of the Institute. Hospitals also have their welcome visitors.

The training of the students is by no means limited to the Bible study or the practical Christian work, though these are large elements in it. The development of a symmetrical Christian character, the "coming behind in no gift," is the aim before those in charge for each student.

Developing Christian Character.

Many a student has come to the Institute young and immature, with crude ideas of Christian service, and little knowledge of the possibilities wrapped up in each redeemed soul, who, under the influence thrown around him, has gone out to fill a place of wide influence and large opportunities, and to fill it well. Hundreds of consecrated young men and women are now on the applicants' list, but the Institute has been unable to receive them, and its usefulness has been greatly impeded for lack of means. Now that the Christian work of our common Master, I can only wish I might be able to increase the amount a hundred-fold." "May God open the hearts of his people," writes Sarah E. Coover, Pittsburg, Pa., ($1). "I am greatly indebted for the lasting good I received during Mr. Moody's evangelistic services given in this city," writes "A Methodist Sister," Philadelphia, ($3). "This dollar, with others, will help in the education of one worker for Christ," is the language of A. C. M., Cochranville, Pa., ($1). C. Z. D., Elmore, Minn., ($1), writes: "I have to earn my money at the loom; but as long as the blessed Jesus will send me work and give me strength to work, I will help the needy all I can." "I am glad to be a helper, though it must be in a small way as I am poor," writes a lady at Lebanon, N. H., ($2). "Our prayer is that it may be like bread cast upon the water," write Mr. and Mrs. R. Peebles, West Point, Ia. ($2), "and that it may increase a thousand-fold." A friend in Morristown, N. J. ($1), writes: "What an excellent work Mr. Moody is engaged in! Truly the stars will be many in his crown." "God bless you and Mr. Moody," writes Geo. E. Batchelder of Lynnfield Centre, Mass., ($5). "I pray that this grand effort to reach the masses may prove highly suc-

WAR AND ARBITRATION.

MOST wars do not pay. A poor way to make up for the destroyed lives of five or six men would be to kill 5,000 men. A poor way to pay for a few thousand damages would be to destroy property worth millions of dollars. What cannot be settled by pen cannot be settled by sword. It is so long now since the Christmas star twinkled through the Bethlehem sky that the world is becoming opposed to bloodshed. Men die too fast by grip, by consumption, by pneumonia, by railroad smashups, by boiler explosions, to make any wholesale murder by battle desirable. Arbitration has already done the work which in earlier days would have been attempted by cannonade. The fishery dispute between Canada and the United States and the Behring sea difference, if they had occurred seventy years ago, would have put our fathers in the sea with loaded musket and English man-of-war would have met American man-of-war on the high seas and their decks would have been slippery with the carnage.

War is a relic of barbarism, and civilization will yet have no more to do with it than with thumb screw and iron boots of torture and martyrs' stakes. The time is coming—it is not in your day and mine, then in the days afterward—when wandering in some museum of antiquities a child shall take hold of a sword and say, "Father, what was that for?" and the answer will be, "My child, that is what was called a sword in the barbaric ages." "What did they do with it?" the child will ask. "Cut people's heads off and thrust their bodies through and through," will answer the father. "Is it possible?" will say the child. "What are those round pieces of iron?" "Bullets," "What were they for?" "Well, those were shot out of guns to break human jaws and put out human eyes and make people go limping through life, while others were tumbled into graves, and the land was filled with widowhood and orphanage." Then the child will ask: "Were there any good people in those days?" "Oh, yes," will say the father. "Well, why didn't they stop it?" Then the father will say: "Oh, they couldn't stop it."

We are coming near the close of this nineteenth century. No doubt it has been the most enlightened and the most kindly of all the centuries, but what a record of bloodshed and financial expenditure! In two score years over $12,000,000,000 spent in war, and 1,743,000 men killed in battle. And still we are building forts, and still Russia and Germany and England and France and Italy and the United States are talking about putting things on a war footing. How long, oh Lord, how long? May the God of peace take possession of all nations. Let us talk peace and write peace and sing peace and pray peace until the last quarrel in all the earth shall be buried and the question how to save life instead of how to destroy it, how to bless instead of how to curse, shall employ all the ingenuity of the nations. Do you not really think that it is time the cavalry horse stopped eating out of the manger in which Christ was born?

A FLOWER IDYL.

I AM glad that while the Summer is garlanded with blossoms, the Autumn though of browner cheek, has its appropriate array, and that the dying year has its catalogue covered with golden-rod and chrysanthemums. But what you see of the flowers you must see quickly, for they will all soon be gone out of garden and field. Have you heard of the funeral of the flowers? It was on a long slope, which at one side dipped into the warm valleys and on the other side arose very high into the frosty air, so that on one boundary line lived cactus and orange blossom and camellia, and on the other resided balsam pine and Alpine strawberry, and all kinds of growths between, that the funeral of the flowers occurred. Living midway that steep slope of land there was a rose that in common parlance we call Giant of Battle. It was red and fiery, looking as if it had stood on fields of carnage where the blood dashed to the lip. It was a hero among flowers. Many of the grasses of the field worshipped it as a god, the mignonette burning incense beneath it, the marigold throwing its glittering coin of beauty before it, the mistletoe crawling at its feet. The fame of this Giant of Battle was world wide, and some said that its ancestors on the father's side had stood on the plains of Waterloo, and on its mother's side at Magenta, and drank themselves drunk on human gore. But children are not to blame for what their ancestors did, and this rose, called Giant of Battle, was universally adored.

But the giant got sick. Whether it was from the poisonous breath of the nightshade that had insolently kissed him or from grief at the loss of a damask rose that had first won his heart by her blushes and then died, we know not; but the Giant of Battle was passing rapidly away. There was great excitement up and down the slopes. A consultation of botanical physicians was called, and Dr. Eglantine came and thrust a tourn for a lancet into the giant's veins on the principle that he had too much blood and was apoplectic, and Dr. Balm of Gilead, attempted to heal the pain by poultices; but still the giant grew worse and worse. The primrose called in the evening to see how the dying hero was, and the morning glory stopped before breakfast to see if it could do any good. Every flower or grass that called had a prescription for him that would surely cure. Neighbor horse-sorrel suggested acids, and honeysuckle proposed sugars, and myrrh suggested bitters, and ladies' slipper, having taken off her shoes, said that all the patient wanted was more quiet about the room. But too much changing of medicine only made the giant more and more sick, and one afternoon, while sitting up in bed with the cup of honeysuckle to his lips, and with the fan of the south wind fluttering in his face, his head dropped and he died. As the breath went out of him a demetrius that had been overlooking the sad scene said: "What time is it?" and a cluster of four o'clocks answered, "A little past the middle of the afternoon." The next morning the funeral bells all rang; the Bluebells and the Canterbury bells and the Foxglove bells and the Harebells and all flowerdom came to the obsequies of the Giant of Battle. He was laid out on a trelis and on a catalogue such as dead monarch never had—of dahlia and phlox and magnolia and geranium and gladioli.

There was a great audience of flowers. Solemnity came down upon them. Even the Cockscrow stopped strutting and Larkspur ceased her fickleness and Snapdragon bowed gently and Snowdrop seemed to melt, and Bachelors' Button wished it had some one to express its grief to. The Passion Flower came in and threw herself on the pale cheek of the giant with most ardent demonstrations of affection. Amaranth and Hydrangea and Daffodil and Spiderwort and Spirea, having come far through the night and dew, stood around with their eyes full of tears. The funeral services began. Rose of Sharon and Lily of the Valley took part in them. The Star of Bethlehem sang a hymn to the tune of "Bonny Doon." A Forget-me-not said a few words of commemoration. Then Hearts-ease arose for the work of comfort and read the lesson of the day: "As a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more." And all the bells, Foxglove bells and Bluebells and Canterbury bells and Harebells, prolonged the strain through all that day, tolling and tolling out: "No more! No more!" And thus ended the funeral of the flowers.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Reader: Who were the seven wise men of Greece?

Thales, the Milesian; Solon; Chiro, the Lacedæmonian; Pittacus of Lesbos; Cleobulus of Rhodes; Periander of Corinth; Bias of Priene, and Æsop, the Phrygian.

Kate M. Loomis, Binghamton, N. Y. I wish to acknowledge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the kindness of those who mailed me the verses "All of Thee." Replies came from Maine to Oregon, and from Canada to the Gulf States.

Earnest Reader, San Luis, Cal. Cannot a person who loves Christ and is sincerely trying to live a righteous life be a good Christian without being baptized or being a member of a church?

No one who loves Christ would wish to try the experiment. He would wish to obey Christ's command to confess him before men. (See Matt. 10: 32, 33.) The duty of a converted man to let it be known to the world that he is a Christian is imperative, and there is no way so appropriate as by baptism and church connection.

Constant Reader, Drakesboro, Ky. What is the meaning of there remaining no more sacrifice for sin? Heb. 10: 26?

That nothing further can be done for the persons referred to. That if they have heard the Gospel and yet continue to sin wilfully they cannot look for pardon. God has exhausted the treasures of his grace. Having given his Son to die to redeem the world, there is nothing that he can do more for their salvation.

A. Welbury, Oyster Bay, L. I. A friend of mine works in a machine repair shop; sometimes he has to work on Sunday, on a mail steamer or in a factory. Do you think it is right for him to work or not? If he does not work, he will lose his position.

We have repeatedly answered questions of this character by explaining that no Sunday labor is justifiable in God's sight, except such as can be properly regarded as a work of necessity or of mercy. It must rest with the individual conscience to decide whether the work is of that character. If not, the sooner it is exchanged for some other employment that does not involve a violation of the Lord's Day, the better.

Earnest Inquirer. 1. Is it possible that a man who cannot tell the time of his conversion has really been converted? 2. Is it a Christian's duty to confess and make restitution for a sin committed in his boyhood?

1. Yes; there are many who having been brought up in a Christian home and under Christian influences, cannot tell the time of their conversion, yet are true Christians. The change in their case has been gradual and not so likely to impress the memory as that which occurs in the case of men who have led an openly wicked life and have been converted. 2. Lapse of time makes no difference. If restitution can be made it should be done. Christ's observation respecting Zaccheus indicates his approval of that course (Luke 19: 8.)

Subscriber, Troy, Ill. 1. Is playing base-ball on Sunday sinful? 2. What does the Jewish Pass-over commemorate? 3. What authority do those who practise infant baptism claim for the rite?

1. No earnest Christian would be willing to spend the Lord's Day in such an amusement. The day is given for spiritual education and work for Christ. It is a small proportion of our time and no man can spend it in amusement with a clear conscience. 2. The passing of the Angel of Death over the houses in Goshen which had blood sprinkled on the lintel. (See Ex. 12: 13.) 3. Merely the authority of inference. The contention generally urged is that as the Apostles baptized the household when the head of it became a believer (Acts 16: 15, and Acts 18: 33), children were probably included.

A. H. Curtis, Richwood, O. When and by whom was the expression used in Matt. 7: 12, first called "The Golden Rule?"

The title "Golden Rule" as applied to the passage in question, is of comparatively modern date. There is no evidence in the writings of the early Church fathers to indicate that it was so designated in their time. It should not be mistaken for the "golden maxim" of Confucius, which, while dealing with the same idea, is of purely negative application, viz.: "What you would not wish done to yourself, that do not to others." It breaks the selfish spirit of human philosophy, whereas the injunction of Christ is positive, embracing all the world.

Alva Smith, Reading, Pa. We have had a discussion here regarding the true origin of the American flag. Please give us the facts.

The American flag at Bunker Hill was red, with the motto: "Come if you Dare." Washington's flag, known as the "Great Union," bore the St. George and St. Andrew's crosses in a blue ground in one corner, with a field of alternate red and white stripes. On June 14, 1777, Congress ordered that the flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes of alternate red and white, with a union of thirteen white stars in a blue field. The first flag was made by Miss Betsey Ross of Philadelphia, who made the stars five-pointed instead of six-pointed as the Congress suggested. The flag was adopted Sept. 26 of the same year as the national ensign, and was first used by Commodore Paul Jones on his flagship, the brig "Ranger." Some contend that it was first unfurled to the breeze at the battle of Saratoga.

Amos S. Plaff, Ashtabula, O. Who wrote the Epistle of James? Was it James the Less, or James the Just, or were they two names for the same person?

There appears to be little doubt that the Epistle was written by James the Just, a man of singular purity of life, held in high repute even among the Jews for his blameless life and his close observance of the law. Scholars have long disputed as to his identity. Some believe him to have been the Apostle mentioned as the son of Alphaeus, while others believe him to have been that brother of our Lord to whom Matthew refers (13: 55.) If the latter is the correct theory he was not an apostle. A tradition exists that he was not even a believer during our Lord's life, but was converted by the evidence of the resurrection and that Paul's statement (1 Cor. 15: 7) refers to him. It is significant that, in the opening verse of the Epistle, the writer does not claim to be an Apostle as would have been likely in an Epistle of that character if the writer had possessed the apostolic authority.

J. S. Linden, Indianapolis, Ind. We are greatly pleased at the work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing in behalf of the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. It is a work whose support ought to be a first tax on the liberality of every Christian man and woman among your readers. Is it true, as I have heard, that many of the graduates are Superintendents of Mission Schools and similar institutions here and abroad?

Graduates of the Bible Institute now hold positions as Superintendents of the Sailors' Institute, Montreal; Madison Square Church House, New York; Sunbeam Rescue Mission, Des Moines, Ia.; Peoples' Mission, New Brunswick, N. J.; Bacon Memorial Mission, Peoria, Ill.; Seamen's Bethel, Duluth, Minn.; Children's Mission, Buffalo; Institute of Industry, Boston; American Bible Society, Calcutta; Texas State Gospel Union; Pacific Gospel Union; Burnham Industrial Farm, Canaan Four Corners, N. Y.; Helping Hand Mission, Detroit, Mich.; American Baptist Missionary Union, Rangoon, Burmah; also responsible positions in American Bible Society, American Tract Society, Bible Training Schools, Industrial Schools, and various Christian Associations, here and abroad. This is wholly independent of the list of former students now engaged in various capacities in missionary and evangelistic work, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few weeks ago.

R. E. P., New York. Is it harmful for a Christian to read books that represent other views than Christianity—even trying to disprove our religion? If we refuse to be called bigoted and narrow-minded, slaves to a religion that prohibits freedom of thought and opinion. So, if one's faith in God is strong, can he not investigate in order to better understand both sides and thus talk intelligently and with more influence to unbelievers?

While it might not be harmful for those who are firmly grounded in the faith to do so, it is wiser for Christians, as a rule, to let such publications severely alone. They are snares set by clever, unscrupulous men for the purpose of robbing simple Christian souls of their faith and they can offer nothing in return. Christianity is not without its champions who, like David before Goliath, are specially fitted to meet and overcome foes under whose spear the untrained soldier would inevitably fall. Our advice is to stand by what your conscience approves and avoid all infidel and sceptical publications as you would avoid a pestilence. If you wish to inform yourself fully as to the arguments for and against Christianity read "Hours with a Sceptic," published by American Baptist Publication Society, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A UNIQUE BRIDGE.

ONE of the most remarkable bridges in existence is that just completed over the Thames in the Eastern district of the English capital. It is a combination of the cantilever, suspension and bascule principles, is 2640 feet in length and cost six million dollars. Of late years the number of merchants and clerks who spend each day in work in the east of the city and their nights on the Surrey side of the river, has enormous increased and a bridge at that point, which would afford them a sure means of crossing the river at all times, had become a necessity. The problem was to provide such a bridge without impeding the passage up the river of ships with high masts. The engineers, Barry, Brunel and Horace Jones have succeeded in solving it by an ingenious device. Two towers, harmonizing in their architectural design with the Tower of London near by, have been erected, two hundred feet apart, in mid-stream. They are connected by a permanent covered roadway, on the cantilever principle. The base of the roadway is 140 feet above the water at high tide, so that at any time the tallest ships can pass under it. Access to the roadway is gained by a spiral staircase of 200 steps in each tower, or by two elevators capable of holding thirty persons each. The most interesting part of the bridge, however, is another roadway only thirty feet above high water, which also connects the towers. This operates on what is known as the bascule principle. It consists of two leaves, each a hundred feet long, which join in the centre when the bridge is closed. At each tower the end of the leaf rests on a pivot, which serves the purpose of a gigantic hinge. When it is necessary to open the bridge to allow a ship to pass through, each leaf is drawn up from the centre by hydraulic power, so that its outermost end describes a quarter of a circle from the centre of the river to the side of the tower, where it rises to a place near the base of the upper roadway. Although each leaf weighs 950 tons, the power required to raise it is not great, as there is a short but heavy extension of the leaf beyond the pivot, into the pier on which the tower is built, and the extension nearly balances the leaf. About a minute and a half is occupied in raising the bascules. Between the towers and the banks of the river the suspension principle is applied. Huge cables are stretched from the tops of the towers to anchorages on land and from them chains hang, which support roadways with a gentle gradient from the banks to the towers. The cost of the bridge has been defrayed by the city and no tolls are to be charged for crossing it. To the enormous number of people living in the densely populated districts near the bridge, who must cross the river daily, the new structure will be a great convenience and the fact of its being free will not detract from its usefulness. Men will not act about that as they act in spiritual matters. Although every one knows that his footsteps lead to the dark river of death and although the majority believe that on the other side there is a glorious city where there is rest and happiness for all who reach it, comparatively few avail themselves of the only means of safe crossing, through Him who said, "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life; no man cometh unto the Father but by Me." (John 14: 6).

Children Tied Together.

The immigration agents at Ellis Island, New York, were interested in the appearance of a family of Norwegian immigrants, who landed there on July 4. The husband and father went ahead with a load of clothing and personal belongings; his wife followed with a baby in her arms; and after her came eight children, the eldest of whom was not twelve years old. This third detachment of the family was held together and connected with the mother by a clothes-line, which secured at one end around the mother's waist, passed around the waist of each child beginning at the youngest of the group and ending with the eldest. A similar arrangement is often made for the protection of mountain-climbers in Switzerland, but it is not often that it is seen in the streets of a city. It answered its purpose there, however, for the family left for its new home in the West, undivided. It may be hoped that a mother so careful of her children straying as to yoke them to keep them from being lost, knows of another means of yoking them, which is stronger than any external connection and which will continue to keep them safe when she can no longer be their guide. (Prov. 22: 6.)

His Life Saved by his Child.

A press dispatch from Wilkesbarre, Pa., says that on July 7, a miner living near want him run over." The conductor sent a man to remove the drunken sleeper and the little heroine was made much of by the trainmen and passengers. Her father came along presently, thoroughly sobered by learning of his narrow escape. He and his little girl went away together and the train proceeded on its way. Doubtless the man loved his child before but he will love her more now that he owes his life to her. There is no way in which he could show his love so well as in leading a better life. That is what Christ expects of every one who through him has been saved from death eternal. (John 14: 21.)

Slain by Electricity.

An extraordinary fatality occurred in a millinery store on Broadway, New York, a few days ago. The porter of the establishment was killed by the electric current which operates the fan used in cooling the rooms. The porter a strong, healthy young man noticed that the fan was running badly for lack of oil, and taking up an oil-can he sprang on top of the steam radiator over which the fan is placed and without turning off the current, poured some oil into the receptacle on the axis nearest to him. He leaned over to fill the farther receptacle when his hand slipped and touched the electric brush. Instantly the whole current entered his body and he fell over dead. Usually the current that turns a fan would not be sufficient to kill, but in this case the fan was operated by a wire which supplies the gauge. Thus, while the arrangement works properly, the lamp can never go out for want of oil although it never has more than enough for a night's consumption on hand. It is so with some of the human lights that God has lighted for the benefit of the world. Some of those which shine the brightest are conscious how little grace they have, but they are not fearful because they know that they have access to a boundless supply "wherein they stand." (Romans 5: 2.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The University of Chicago is to be congratulated on the successful completion, before July 1, of the effort to raise $1,000,000 for the general equipment and improvement of the institution.

The Report of the Mission to Lepers States that in India alone there are 100,000 lepers; in Japan, 200,000; and in China, probably 300,000! Cheering results have followed the spiritual ministry carried on in its numerous hospitals.

News has been received at Shanghai, China, that the tumult in Corea has been renewed, and that in the last outbreak several Christians were killed. French missionaries are now menaced, and a gunboat has been sent to the point nearest them to protect them.

Dr. George W. Chamberlain of Bahai, Brazil, reporting to the American Bible Society, says that among the twenty-five converts whom he received into fellowship last year ten had been secret readers of the Bible for years but had never seen or heard a preacher until within a few months of their making profession of faith.

Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, has received word from Uganda, Central Africa, that there is an opportunity for lady missionaries to do work there as a number of the daughters of the late King M'Tesa have joined the mission, and there is a strong desire among the women for the Bible and Christian instruction.

The Union Meetings at LaCrosse, Wis., conducted by Dr. J.W. Chapman resulted in a large accession to the churches. Over 1200 cards were signed by persons desiring to lead a Christian life. Two meetings were held simultaneously in different parts of the city and the attendance often reached an aggregate of six thousand persons.

M. Kyrtas, the Agent in Albania of the British and Foreign Bible Society, is dead. He was captured last year by brigands in the district of Ochrida, was carried to the mountains and there held a prisoner for six months until his friends ransomed him. His privations and hardships during his imprisonment undermined his health so seriously, that he died a few weeks after his release.

The Twelfth Baptist Congress is to be held at Detroit, Mich., Nov. 13-15, 1894. Among those who have been engaged to contribute papers or take part in the discussions are Drs. A. H. Newman, of Toronto; Lansing Burrows, of Georgia; A. S. Holart, of Vaucluse, N. Y.; President Andrews, of Brown University; Howard Osgood, of Rochester; President W.R. Harper, H. M. Sanders and Z. Grenell.

A Cowardly Assault on Two American lady missionaries is reported from Honan, China. Miss Bremner and Miss Halverstone, of the Presbyterian Mission at Canton, while helping a sick Chinaman whom they found lying helpless by the wayside, were set upon by a mob and severely beaten and stabbed. The mob accused them of poisoning the Chinaman. It is feared that Miss Halverstone will die.

The Gazette of Pittston, Pa.,

says of the services in the tent conducted by Evangelist E. W. Bliss: "The outfit is an excellent one for this work, and the marked success of the opening meetings under canvas proved the wisdom of the arrangement. It cannot but be productive of great good during the heated term." The opening meetings attracted an enormous audience.

Mrs. M. Baxter Sailed from Vancouver on July 16, for Japan, whence she hopes to proceed after a three weeks stay to Shanghai, China. She will return to England by way of India, after visiting the missionary stations occupied by men and women sent out from the Bethshan Training Institute. Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, has cordially invited her to visit the stations of the China Inland Mission.

The Mayors of Aberdeen and Watertown, in South Dakota, issued a request to the churches that prayers be offered for rain as the harvest was in danger. The churches complied and public meetings were held besides. Following this the whole State was visited with copious showers. Unbelievers call it a coincidence but the Christians of the State are thanking God for answering their prayers.

The Managers of the American Bible Society at their recent meeting made grants of Bibles to the value of three hundred dollars to the Zulu Mission of the American Board, and consignments to the Society's Agencies in Mexico, Cuba, Brazil, and Central America. Funds were also appropriated to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for Bible work in Germany and Switzerland, to the amount of $9,800.

A Remarkable Utterance by the Famous Ethical teacher, Felix Adler, is quoted by the Congregationalist. He is reported as saying: "I am, as you know, a Jew. For more than eighteen centuries my race has been shut out from its own. Even the name of Jesus was not mentioned among us. After these eighteen centuries I, and others like myself, emerging from this isolation, come face to face with one who was ours, of whom, strangely enough, we have been bereaved, of whose deep influence we have not felt the benefits. I hardly know whether you who have been nurtured under Christian influence, who have breathed the atmosphere of Jesus' thought since your childhood, can put yourself entirely into the place of one who comes to him as a new-comer, and is amazed and rapt at what he finds."

THE NEW BRIDGE OVER THE THAMES NEAR THE TOWER OF LONDON.

that city was saved from being crushed under the wheels of a train by the presence of mind and prompt action of his daughter, a child only eight years old. The man had been drinking and had fallen asleep across the track of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, which runs past his home. His little daughter, who was out looking for her father, found him there and tried to arouse him but he was stupefied with drink and would not be disturbed. As the little girl bent over him she heard the whirr on the rail that indicates the approach of a distant train. She had seen the train pass her home every morning and knew what it meant for her father. She pulled frantically at his coat calling to him with tears and sobs that the train was coming and he would be killed, but the man heeded not. The child was almost frenzied with distress, for the noise of the coming train was growing clear. A red bandanna handkerchief projecting from her father's pocket gave her a suggestion. She had seen trainmen stop a train by waving a red flag. She seized the handkerchief, and holding it above her head ran down the track as fast as her little feet could carry her. Fortunately there is a sharp curve just beyond the place where the man lay and the engineer had slowed down, to turn it when he saw the child running to meet the train, waving her signal. He applied his brakes sharply and brought the train to a standstill. "Please," said the child, "my papa is asleep on the track up yonder and I did n't the arc lights of the building and carries a thousand volts. Even this would not have caused his death had he not been standing on the iron radiator, the pipes from which run into the earth in the basement, thus completing an electrical circuit. It was a deadly combination of causes that caused the man to lose his life and it is often so that the soul is lost. An "Innocent game" or a "harmless amusement" may work disastrous results to one who, by mental or physical temperament or inherited propensity is in a position to receive fatal injury from that particular temptation. (Rom. 14: 13-15.)

An Automatic Light.

A scientific journal describes an arrangement adopted for reducing the work in light-houses. The lamp is of the ordinary kind, burning mineral oil. Its wick, however, is three times the usual thickness and it is surrounded with a cake of a secret chemical composition, in which the chief ingredient is carbonized tar. This cake has the property of cleansing the wick and eating away the burned edge. The reservoir containing the oil is of the ordinary dimensions, holding about sufficient to keep the lamp burning for one night; but it is fitted with a gauge which automatically opens a valve when the oil gets low. The valve is attached to a pipe leading to a large reservoir of oil at a distance, and when the valve is opened the oil flows in until it is again closed automatically by the rising of

On the House-Top.

Our Traveler Relates the Story of a Visit to a Charming Eastern Home—A Pretty Domestic Picture.

A WATER-CARRIER.

THE roof we gain by means of a succession of narrow stone stairways built upon the outside of the house. At the head of the last flight the host meets us, having heard our voices. A handsome, well-made man, in European costume except for the red turban which proclaims him a Turkish subject, he smiles genially at our approach. "You are welcome," he assures us in excellent English. "I am sorry my wife is not at home, but she will return soon. Will you walk in?"

"Presently," we reply. For a moment we must get our breath and look about us at the odd, charming place to which we have climbed, and fill our lungs with the delicious air, the sweetest we have tasted in Jerusalem. It pours in upon the enclosed house-top through geometrical patterns of short tiles set horizontally in mortar upon a stone wall six feet high. In the middle of the area, blocks of stone are built into a square platform with sloping sides, and this is surmounted by a box filled with earth. Flowers glow luxuriantly without; pots of flowering plants and vines stand against the sunniest side of the little courtyard and crowd a graded wooden frame up to the top of the wall. It is the bonniest nook our eyes have lighted upon since we left Beirut gardens, and we say it in frank admiration. Gratified by our appreciation of the advantages of his dwelling-place, the host enlarges further upon these.

"We are raised so high above the level of the city that we get no dust, no fog, no bad smells, no noise. And the view—ah! that you shall see when we go into the room. Here it is only to be had in bits, by peeping through these holes. You see this is one of the oldest houses in Jerusalem—very old and solid. The walls are thick, as you have noticed. It must be hundreds—yes, hundreds of years old. At that time the Moslems had entire possession of the city, and built their houses to please themselves. Their wives must have air and sunshine, and being women—and human beings—smilingly—they would not be contented without seeing something of the world. So, they made these walls high, that they should not look over, and that nobody could look in at them, and exchange signals, you know, but with peep-holes out of which the women could see what was going on outside."

"What does your wife say to this sort of prison?"

"She does not mind. It makes the place more private; in fact, gives us a pleasant sitting-room when the sun is not too hot. And on moonlight evenings when the weather is mild and the flowers in bloom, a man cannot wish for a nicer place for smoking his cigarette with his wife by his side and maybe, friends dropping in to help us enjoy it."

"You do not hide your wife away then behind curtains and lattices after the fashion of some of your countrymen?"

"I trust my wife!" drawing himself up unconsciously, yet with a good-humored laugh. "We of the Greek Church have generally more liberal views on some subjects than Moslems. Ali!"

We have heard nothing except the soft rush of the breeze through the "peep-holes" and the light rustle of the vine-leaves against the wall, but he turns expectantly toward the staircase.

Something white rises into sight in the doorway giving upon the flight, and a little woman enveloped from head to foot in an izzar, trips forward upon the stone floor, pauses abruptly at perceiving us, and raising the blue mendeel from her face, stands hesitatingly, holding nervously to the edges of the white mantle which is usually cast off the instant the wearer finds herself within-doors.

"My wife, madam! my wife, sir!" utters the proud husband. She kisses my hand, lays hers timidly into that extended by the masculine visitor, and looks in mute appeal to her mentor.

"She understands English when it is spoken to her, but she will not try to speak it herself," he says, indulgently. "She would say that she does not comprehend it, but I know better, and I am sure, too, that she could speak it, if she were not afraid to attempt it. She is what you call diffident."

At a word in Arabic, the little woman motions us to enter her dwelling, stands aside until her husband has passed in after us, slips off a pair of low shoes, with coquettish rosettes upon the instep, at the threshold, and follows us in her stocking-feet. They are pretty feet, we notice, and clad in scarlet stockings, and she looks very small for the loss of her slipper-heels.

"Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall, and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick; and it shall be, when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither."

We comprehend it all with one glance around the "little chamber." How the prophet might gain the retreat thus prepared for him without entering any other part of the house, and without speaking to any of the family. How welcome, too, was the absolute quiet of the exclusion thus offered the toot-weary, nerve-tired man of God.

The room is of fair dimensions and massive in construction, with a groined roof. The windows are deeply embrasured, and from one end projects an alcoved casement, raised two feet or more from the floor, and cushioned with red chintz, as is the conventional divan running around two sides of the apartment. Before we sit down we are invited to look at the view, and for this purpose we are told to step, although we protest, into the cushioned alcove. It hangs upon the outer wall, as we now perceive, and overlooks, beyond the nearer jumble of tiled roofs and chimneys, the Mosque of Omar, about which we can trace from this altitude the boundaries of the Temple Area. A sudden dip outside the city walls means the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and then arises the Mount that is called Olivet, with the church and campanile upon its level brow. Scopus joins it on our left. If the Jew householder of A. D. 70 built as high as his Moslem successor, what an observatory would this have been from which to mark the manoeuvres of the investing Romans! The free air sweeps gladly by us, the tranquil blue of the Syrian sky falls, an untroubled canopy, behind farther and bare hills. Titus levelled all the trees about the city, and Palestine has never stood firmly enough and long enough upon her feet since to clothe her desolate places with forests.

The floor of the house-top chamber is covered with Damascus rugs, and besides the divan, there are several light chairs; cupboards are numerous, and hidden by curtains. One is exposed because it is filled with books.

There are little stands here and there, and bits of bric-a-brac, for the master of the quaint abode is a popular dragoman and has traveled much. The wife, black-eyed and "sonsie," wears a blue cloth bodice and skirt, a gold chain and an embroidered "mendeel," and a bouquet of living flowers is pinned to the bodice. She is as neat and bright as her home, and steps noiselessly about making ready for our entertainment. A stand, bearing small glass went into the streets. So they fell into Moslem fashions in this and other things, and even now must wear the 'izzar' and the 'mendeel' in public."

The little wife still chats with the neighbor, the Syrian sunshine bringing out the gleam of every link of the gold chain, and blazing back from the broad golden bands upon her wrists. She looks so prosperous and happy that the question follows naturally upon our glance at the fair picture:

"How long have you been married?"

"Nine years."

"Is it possible!" for the wife does not look to be twenty. "She must have been a mere child at the time?"

"She was sixteen. But"—a half-embarrassed laugh—"I made up my mind that she should be my wife the first moment I set eyes on her—a girl of thirteen, and just home from school."

This is promising—and refreshing in a country where marriage is a synonym for batter and sale.

"Ah! love at first sight?"

He looks doubtful.

"As to that, madame, we do not think so much of love here as you do in your country. It is more a matter of business."

To prove the assertion he narrates how, having arrived late at night at his sister's house after a protracted tour with a party of English people, he had slept late, and awaking at noon, espied through the window a young girl passing back and forth to a well in the court-yard. How, after watching her for an hour or so, he had arisen, and breakfasted, and while at breakfast, asked his sister the name of the stranger.

"This was one o'clock in the day. By six that evening my sister had made application to the girl's parents for their daughter in my name."

The father insisted upon a truce of three months, and the lover waited, voluntarily, six, before renewing his suit.

"I told him that my mind had not changed; that it would never change, but that if he said 'Wait six years,' instead of six months, six years it should be. I was given leave to visit at the house twice a week, and talk with her father and mother."

"Not with her?"

"O, for that matter, customs have altered with us since the times when a woman was not allowed to look at her betrothed until she was his wife. When I went in, she did not run out of the room, as was the rule in her mother's young days. I would say 'Good evening,' and she answered 'Good evening,' when I went in and 'Good night,' when I went away. And now and then I pretended to be thirsty that I might ask her to get me a glass of water,"—a little shame-faced at the confession. "Further than this we never spoke together. It was three years after I first saw her before we were married. No! I had never seen her alone for one minute. I respected her too much to get her talked about. As it was, many thought our behavior very strange—quite a new fashion. They said it happened through my knowing so many Europeans."

"MY WIFE," SAID THE HUSBAND, PROUDLY.

outside in the elevated courtyard, talking with a neighbor who has called on a matter of housewifely business, when we draw from her husband the idyl of the house-top. It comes about through our comment upon the circumstances that the "izzar"—a cumbrons and not becoming garment, being, as I think I have always said, merely a square sheet draped and tucked, and banded about the figure—is worn by women of all nationalities and religions in most cities of Northern and Southern Syria. It is a Moslem custom, we opine, and marvel at the adoption of it by Christians.

"It happened in this way, you see," is the next step to the story we have set our hearts upon getting. "Many, many years ago, when, as I told you, the Christians—Greeks and Roman Catholics alike—were accounted as nothing by their masters, I have heard my father say that in his boy-

The wedding, too, caused great talk. Up to that time everybody was married at night, and it was the custom with us Greeks for the bride to stand just inside the door to receive the guests and to hold out her hand for whatever money, or other present had been brought to her. I said:

"My wife shall not play the beggar, and we will be married at noon and invite whoever will to come in the afternoon and wish us well, and have some refreshment, then go quietly away. There will be no drinking and feasting and singing and dancing all night and all day, such as is the custom with others, for maybe two or three days together. And so it was. And many have followed our example. The Patriarch of Jerusalem has expressed himself as greatly in favor of the new order of things."

"You served for her three years and six months, half as long as Jacob for Rachel," I remark, a little mischievously, as the wife, again leaving her sandals at the door, comes in to stand behind her husband's chair, laying her hand upon his shoulder.

"Yet you do not think so much of her as we do, you would have us believe? And you told us just now, that it would be accounted shameful for a woman to allow herself to love a man before she is married. I call yours a love match, out-and-out, on your part, and I more than half suspect, on your wife's also. Don't you believe she had learned to love a little in all those years of patient waiting?"

His hand steals up to that resting on his shoulder; leaning back to look in her face, he repeats the query in English—not Arabic—adding, merrily—"I believe it, myself!"

The dark, piquante face glows red as a Georgian peach; the plump hand falls smartly upon his cheek; the black eyes are full of confusion and conscious laughter:—"No! no!" she cries, unguardedly. "Never! never! not one bit!"

The hero of the idyl of the house-top flashes a triumphant glance at us:—"Didn't I tell you she understands English, and could speak it if she would?"

MARION HARLAND.

A LION IN A MISSION.

A PANIC was caused lately in the station of the American Board at Sakanjimbé, West Central Africa, by the visit of a lion. Rev. W. Lee writing from that station says: "Recently a lion paid our station a nocturnal visit. It evidently leaped over the fence of our ox-yard, and then stamped the cattle so that they broke a hole through the fence and rampaged around the station and finally off through the woods. As the ox-fence is from seven to eight feet high, and built of large logs set firmly in the ground, it must have been a grand leap the lion made, while the poor oxen must have been terribly frightened to have succeeded in breaking a hole in so strong a fence. I was first awakened by a great shouting and gun-firing by the natives of the nearest village. Such a shouting and uproar as they made I have not often heard."

"I quickly dressed, and taking my gun and lantern went out into our yard to ask the boys what was the trouble. I called and called for our boys, but in vain. Not a sound could I get from them for a long time. At last one of them summoned up courage to call out: 'It is a lion!' The poor boys! they were sleeping in little grass huts, which are a very poor protection from a lion, and they were afraid of attracting to themselves the attention of the animal if they answered me. They soon called out that there was a hole in the fence and all the oxen were gone. About this time the noise and excitement had somewhat quieted down, and we decided that we could do little or nothing in the dark, so retired to wait for daylight before hunting for the strayed cattle. What was our horror, in the morning, to find within about fifty yards of Mr. Woodside's house the remains of one of the oxen! All the inside of the body was completely eaten away! Just at the time we were running around to find out what was the matter, the lion was quietly enjoying his repast within a few yards of us! Later in the day we found another dead ox about one and a half miles from the station. This one had not been eaten, but the place showed plainly that the lion had lain down close beside it and had a nap. He was probably frightened off before his appetite returned. Toward evening all the rest of the cattle were found at a native village some miles off, safe and sound, but much excited."

PEACE AND LIGHT.

I DO not ask, O, Lord, that life may be
A pleasant road;
I do not ask that thou wouldst take from me
Aught of its load.
I do not ask that flowers should always Beneath my feet; [spring
I know too well the poison and the sting
Of things too sweet.
For one thing only, Lord, dear Lord, I plead,
Lead me aright—
Though strength should falter, and though heart should bleed,
Through Peace to Light.
I do not ask, O, Lord, that thou shouldst
Full radiance here; [shed
Give but a ray of peace, that I may tread
Without a fear.
I do not ask my cross to understand,
My way to see;
Better in darkness just to feel thy hand
And follow thee.
Joy is like restless day; but peace divine
Like quiet night;
Lead me, O Lord—till perfect Day shall shine,
Through Peace to Light.

RESIGNATION.

L ORD, it belongs not to my care,
Whether I die or live:
To love and serve thee is my share,
And this thy grace must give.
If life be long, I will be glad,
That I may long obey;
If short, yet why should I be sad
To soar to endless day?
Christ leads me through no darker rooms
Than he went through before;
He that into God's kingdom comes
Must enter by the door.
Come, Lord, when grace has made me meet
Thy blessed face to see;
For if thy work on earth be sweet,
What will thy glory be?
Then shall I end my sad complaints,
And weary, sinful days;
And join with the triumphant saints
That sing Jehovah's praise.
My knowledge of that life is small,
The eye of faith is dim;
But 'tis enough that Christ knows all,
And I shall be with him.

THE COMING REGENERATION.

What the Scriptures Teach about the Characteristics of the Millennium.

BY REV. CHARLES K. IMBRIE, D.D.*

THE seven facts already cited do not comprise all that we learn from the Scriptures of the character of the Millennium. We are told also:

8. That this Regeneration shall be attended by the national repentance and conversion of the Jewish people, their gathering to their own land, and their perpetual residence there, exalted as a people to be a blessing in all the earth. This, many passages already quoted, declare. (See Isaiah 61: 7-9; 60: 6-14.)

9. That in the "Regeneration," therefore, there will be living men in the flesh, distinct from the glorified saints who rule with Christ, and these men will be organized as nations. For so speaks Isaiah of the remnant who are escaped of the nations after the Lord's judgment of the ungodly. So John speaks of the nations of the earth (after the curse is gone) as walking in the light of the New Jerusalem.

10. That to bring about this blessed condition of things the Spirit shall be poured out in an unprecedented manner on all flesh. So the prophet Joel declares (ch. 2: 28-32) pointing, by his predicted signs to the end of this dispensation of the Spirit, and to the conversion of the Gentiles (that are spared) most probably by Jewish instrumentality, a pregnant prophecy that takes in the whole Messianic time, as one vast period, the beginning and end of which are foreshortened into one and the same picture. And so Isaiah intimates, as to the times of the new heavens and new earth (Isa. 66: 18-20). And so the Apostle James intimates (Acts 15: 15-18.)

11. That Satan, the arch-enemy, will be then bound so as to deceive the nations no more until the thousand years are past. So the Apostle John declares explicitly (Rev. 20: 1-7).

12. That then all the nations shall be holy. So Isaiah says to Israel: "All thy children shall be taught of God." "None shall say to another, know the Lord, for all shall know him." "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." "All nations shall come and worship before Thee" (Isa. 54: 13; Jer. 31: 34; Isa. 11: 9; Rev. 15: 4).

13. That the race, on earth then made holy, will continue on the earth in perpetual generations. For so Psalm 72 intimates, as already quoted (vers. 5, 7, 8, 17). So Psalm 145: 13 testifies that the Lord's kingdom continues, as an everlasting kingdom (Heb. kingdom of the ages) "throughout all generations." And thus generations continue as long as the kingdom continues. So Daniel also declares (chap. 7: 13, 14, 18, 27) that Christ's kingdom on earth is to be a kingdom wherein "all peoples, nations and languages shall serve him," and that this kingdom embracing all nations and languages, "shall not pass away nor be destroyed forever."

14. That the curse shall be removed from the earth itself, and inanimate creation will participate in the joys of the "sons of God." So testify the prophets. The waste places are to be made like Eden, and the deserts like the garden of Lord (Ez. 34: 27; 36: 11, 29, 30, 34-36; Isa. 51: 3; Ps. 67: 4-6). And so the Apostle Paul represents the case in his account of the Palingenesia, toward which the creature, "made subject to vanity for man's sake," looks forward with ardent expectation waiting for the redemption Rom. 8: 18-23).

Thus the Regeneration will be a blessed change affecting the whole earth and the race living upon it. The long winter has indeed stripped off the foliage and made it for a long time look like waste and barren. But the reviving spring is soon to come and bring forth a "summer" of glory forever. The race, as a race, is redeemed, and sees at length all nations of the earth walking with God. Christ's blood avails to the uttermost generation. "All thy children shall be taught of God and great shall be the peace of thy children." "From generation to generation they shall come up to Jerusalem to serve the Lord." "For all the ends of the world shall worship God." So testify Isaiah and all the prophets.

THE PERILS OF WEALTH.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 5. Mark 10: 23-31.

RICHES and poverty confronted each other in Palestine, in the time of Christ, as they do here in our time. Our Lord's parable of Dives and Lazarus implies that it was not uncommon to find near together a man who was clothed in fine linen and tared sumptuously every day, and a beggar full of sores. As he saw the two classes, the Saviour's heart was filled with compassion for the poor, but in the passage which forms the basis of the Topic, it is the rich for whom he expresses his pity. He had just parted from one to whom wealth was so precious that he could not part with it, even to obtain treasure in heaven and the companionship of the Master on earth. Jesus did not blame him; he was sorry for him, for he loved him. His next words are full of pity. The rich, he intimates, are pitiable, for it is harder for them to obtain true riches than it is for others. There was, in his estimate, only one thing in this life worth striving for, and the rich man was hampered in the struggle for it. He was like a camel trying to get through the low, narrow, postern gate of the city, which from its smallness had come to be known as the needle's eye. Our own observation confirms the Master's words. The possession of great wealth benumbs the higher faculties of the soul, and develops a spirit antagonistic to the law of God. The man who becomes rich is apt to become haughty, arrogant, conceited, self-sufficient, unsympathetic, proud and self-indulgent. His attitude toward God and toward men excludes him from blessing. Even God himself cannot help one who does not feel the need of his help. It is the humble, docile man who learns the truth and is helped thereby. He has everything and abounds in too well satisfied with things as they are to seek to learn truths which might embarrass him and enforce upon him disagreeable duties. Some have humbly tried to learn their duty and to do it, and have come to regard their wealth as a sacred trust to be administered under the eye of God, but the number is small, for as Christ intimated, this attitude is difficult of attainment. In his relations with men, the rich man is similarly embarrassed and by the same cause. The temptation to use the power that wealth gives for the advancement of his own interests is a strong one. He is in danger also of becoming intolerant. He realizes that in the one respect of money he is superior to others, and unconsciously he drifts into the opinion that he is superior to them in all other respects. Beseated with these dangers, it is not surprising that Christ said: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven."

A NEW ENGLAND Y. M. C. A.

On this page is a picture of the new building designed for the use of the Young Men's Christian Association of Melrose, Mass. The Association is only two years old, but it has grown in membership and usefulness with so extraordinary a rapidity that a new building of its own has become a necessity. A suitable lot has been purchased and the architects have made plans for the edifice, from one of which our illustration is taken. As it will be in some respects a model building, a description of its arrangements may be of value to other Associations. Its dimensions are seventy feet frontage with a depth of one hundred feet, fifty feet of which will be given to the gymnasium. The building is to be of brick with stone facings. The ground floor will be occupied by a bank on one side of the entrance and two stores on the other. On the next floor is the Secretary's Office, the Library and the Reading the Saengerfest Hall and in the tent. In the course of the address, which was largely devoted to an appeal for increased contributions to missionary and other evangelical work, and to more effort for the purification of municipal government, Dr. Clark wrote: "The year has been notable beyond every other year for its wonderful inter-denominational Endeavor conventions in all parts of the world. . . . In Australia the Methodists lead in number; in England, the Baptists; in the United States, the Presbyterians; but these are matters of little moment compared with the demonstrated fact that here we can all stand together. These thirteen years—particularly this past year—have proved that Baptists and Methodists and Presbyterians and Lutherans and Disciples of Christ and Friends and Congregationalists and Moravians, and every variety of these denominations, can find a common meeting-place in Christian Endeavor. No creed separates us, no form of polity disrupts us, no question of disloyalty exists to terrify us; for we have come together for service, for Endeavor."

"The suggestion has come from Australia, and has been seconded by England and China and India and Japan, of a World's Christian Endeavor Union, made up of individuals in all lands that believe in the the Mission Boards of their respective churches has been made up, which contains the names of 5,552 societies, and the aggregate amount of their gifts to the mission cause during the year was $138,205, and beside this sum, there have been gifts to other work covered by the motto of the Society, "Christ and the Church," which gifts amounted to $185,512. A still more significant showing, indicative of the value of the spiritual results of the Society's efforts, is the fact that there have been added during the past year to church membership from the Societies no less than 183,650.

The programme as sketched two weeks ago in these columns was carried out, all the meetings being remarkable for the enthusiasm displayed and the hearty cordiality of the various denominations represented. The next convention will be held at San Francisco, as arranged last year it a concession in rates of transportation can be secured. Otherwise a different meeting place will be selected which will be announced before Sept. 1st. The 1896 convention will be held at Washington, D. C.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Founding Fund of the B. Y. P. U. amounted at the end of June to $19,739.

At Highlandtown, O., there is a flourishing Epworth League which has raised $300 and has spent it in re-seating the church. It has also pledged itself to pay $100 toward the liquidation of the debt on the building.

Boston, Mass., has a second associational union of Baptist Young People. At a rally of the young people of the Boston West Association held recently in the Brookline Church the new union was duly organized.

Two Epworth Leagues of Washington, D. C., recently held a public debate on the question whether present indications point to a dissolution of our form of government. Waugh Church affirmed and Douglas Memorial Church denied. The debate was spirited and attracted large audiences.

Long Island City, N. Y., has a new Railroad Y. M. C. A. Its building is the gift of the Long Island Railroad Company, and was formally presented to the Association and dedicated on July 2 by Mr. E. R. Reynolds, the General Manager.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Bloomington, Ill., has commenced a series of services in the City Park on Sundays. Large crowds gather there for recreation on that day, and there is excellent opportunity for presenting the Gospel. A good quartette assists in the services.

A Christian Endeavor service was held on board the school ship "St. Mary," then in New London harbor, previous to her departure for a foreign cruise. The party of Endeavorers went at the invitation of several of the young men on the ship, who had belonged to societies at home, and every courtesy was extended them by the ship officers. After looking about the ship, a service was held on deck, in which the purpose of the meeting was explained, and seven active and fourteen associate members were enrolled.

Still another interpretation has been devised for the initials of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. It comes from Rev. T. D. Wallace. He likens them to the five fingers of the right hand. The fingers can only bend inward, and they suggest to him the loyal and loving grip of youthful Christian fellowship in the service of Christ and the church. He names the fingers "Youth, Personality, Sympathy, Conscientiousness, and Energy," the last being the strong and stalwart thumb, which closes down over the rest and holds them fast and firm with Christian purpose.

DESIGN FOR THE NEW Y. M. C. A. BUILDING AT MELROSE, MASS.

room, large double parlors which the Women's Auxiliary have undertaken to furnish and the Recreation room for the Junior Department. On the next floor is a spacious hall capable of holding five hundred persons. This is flanked by two rooms, one of which will be used as a kitchen and the other as a dressing, or retiring room. The Gymnasium occupies a large building, forty by fifty feet in the rear of the main building. On the floor will be the modern apparatus, parallel bars, spring boards, chest weights, striking-bags, Indian clubs, dumb-bells, etc. Opening out of the gymnasium, on the ground floor will be the baths, plunge and shower, beautifully fitted up and also a room for the reception of bicycles. The entire cost of the building will be $45,000, and the members are now busily engaged in collecting subscriptions and preparing for the commencement of the work.

THE GREAT C. E. CONVENTION.

The numbers attending the International Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies at Cleveland, Ohio, exceeded the expectation of the managers, who feared that the railroad strike might deter many from being present. Fully forty thousand persons attended the meetings on the first day, and a still larger number the later meetings. The President, Rev. F. E. Clark, was unable to attend through illness, and his absence was the occasion of many sympathetic remarks by the various speakers. He had, however, prepared his opening address, which was read to the two meetings in Endeavor Ideas, and will stand with us on the broad platform of Endeavor principles—a platform of thorough loyalty to our own churches and of hearty co-operation one with another. In my opinion the time has come for such an alliance, which will link many Christians of many nations together in ties of fellowship that they have never before known."

After an address of welcome by Gov. McKinley, Mr. J. W. Baer, the General Secretary, read his annual report. From this we learn that the number of societies of Christian Endeavor is greater by 7,395 than at this time last year. Of these, 2,740 companies are in foreign lands, 2,243 in Canada, and 28,696 in the United States, making an army of 33,679 companies. The actual enrollment of active and associate members makes up the astonishing aggregate of 2,023,800. There are thirty denominations represented in the Society. The Presbyterians still lead, with 6,652 companies; the Congregationalists have 5,488; the Baptists, 3,203; the Disciples of Christ and Christians, 2,895; Methodist Episcopal, 1,287; Methodist Protestants, 663; Lutherans, 851; Cumberland Presbyterians, 744; and so on through a long list. In Canada the Presbyterians lead with 842; the Methodists are next, with 812; the Baptists have 159; the Congregationalists, 128. In England the Baptists are in the van, with 391 companies; the Congregationalists have 353; the various Methodist bodies, 221; the Presbyterians, 85. Our Children at Play.

How the "House Mother" in the Children's Home at Nyack Amuses her little Charges — Many Merry Games.

No matter whether the weather be wet or fine, the hours fly with winged feet at Mont Lawn. The golden summer days are all too brief, although our children industriously continue to pack into each circuit of the old-fashioned clock on Housemother Faulhaber's mantel, all the enjoyment the moments can possibly hold. In these July days, the country is at its best, and each successive party of little city waifs, during their ten days' sojourn at the Home, extract more real, healthful pleasure from wood and field than they ever dreamed of before. One little fellow, while climbing a fence, fell and fractured his arm. It was the first casualty at the Home and after the injured limb had been set and the wee sufferer made comfortable, it was touching to witness the solicitude of his playmates. But the accident wasn't an unmixed evil. When the ten days' limit had been reached, it was decided to give him a further chance to enjoy some of the fun he had missed by his temporary disablement. So he was kept along another couple of weeks, envied of all the children.

"Say, don't ever wander go home, now yer arm is better?" asked a bigger boy who had come up with a larger group of arrivals.

"Naw!" was the supercilious reply. "What'd I wander go home fer? I's glad me arm was hurted, so I kin stay here. It's bully, dis is. Say, home ain't in it wid dis place."

There was a general chorus of agreement from the boys, as they turned around to one of the missionaries who stood smiling behind them.

A moment later, the entire group were skimming over the sloping lawn, some of the nimble urchins turning cartwheels on hands and feet at a rate to make a circus crobat envious.

A great and popular place at Mont Lawn is the playroom (shown in our photograph). Here the children resort whenever they have had enough out-door sport, and a merrier yet better-behaved crowd it would be hard to find. But even city children can be "tired-out," and so it happens that having exhausted all the attractions of baseball, croquet, swings, hide-and-seek, and such like games outdoors, they are led to seek rest and recreation simultaneously in the playroom. Here are checkerboards, dominoes, tiddle-de-winks, backgammon, jackstraws, picture books, scrap books, black letters and pictures, blackboards for original drawings; and such drawings as one sometimes sees there! Besides these, there are mottoes and a variety of other games and amusements to pass the time pleasantly. All the boys and girls love the play-room and patronize it liberally. It is the main room of the cottage formerly known as "The Lodge," which stands at the entrance to Mont Lawn, right opposite the chapel and about fifty yards distant from the main building.

Nearly five hundred children have now spent a ten days' vacation apiece at the Home and they are still coming. Full to its capacity, it is never uncomfortably crowded. Instances of disobedience or misconduct are rare, for our little ones quickly learn the few simple rules that govern the Home.

in honor and gratitude to do as much as they can for some other child when the chance offers itself. And we believe that most of them will loyally keep their word and "pass it along."

Dear little ones! Our prayers go with them and with every child who has been our guest at Mont Lawn. May the remembrance of their summer outing be a green and beautiful spot in the children's memories, during the years to come.

Customs About Rings.

From the earliest times rings have been regarded as symbolic, especially in connection with betrothals and marriages. In the marshes of the North Sea coast it was formerly customary in Germany for the bridegroom to give the bride, on the day of betrothal, instead of a ring, a valuable coin, called "Echlo," or genuine, as a pledge that the compact between them was binding. This is also a remnant of the time when wives were acquired by right of purchase; and the custom is still prevalent in some isolated places. Among un-Christianized nations betrothal rings are unknown. For example, a Mohammedan, instead of giving his bride a ring, bestows on her a "Maschkass," or square amulet of pure gold, which the girl hangs around her neck. In India a small amulet is worn by a woman as a badge of marriage. It generally consists of homes of the aged and sick, thereby cheering them with their smiles, making glad their hearts by their beauty, and giving out to them their rich perfumes.

"THY CHILDREN KNOW."

Thy children know thy sacred place,
Their refuge and defence;
They find the measure of thy grace
In thy Omnipotence.

Thy angels day by day have charge
Their guardians to be,
And difficulties small and large
They overcome in thee.

Thy secret place knows no mischance,
No perils thine appal;
Thy years are their inheritance,
And thou their all in all.

FATHERLY EXAMPLE.

THE father impresses himself, his tone, his feelings, his disposition, upon his children and his home. There are exceptions to this rule, but it is a rule founded in a deep-seated, philosophical principle. He may not design to do this, but he does it, even despite any efforts to do otherwise.

His smiles, his hopefulness, his good cheer, his kindness, his reverence of God and sacred things, his tender regard for "mother," all impress themselves on the wax-like minds of his children, as naturally and indelibly as the sun's rays passing through the camera's lens imprint the image from which they are reflected upon the sensitive plate. The same also is true of anger, irreverence, brutality, profanity, and inebriety upon the part of the father. He not only reproduces his own body in the person of his children, but his own habits and disposition as well; and this he does and will do, in a large degree, despite all the mother may do or can do to prevent it.

Especially is this true in regard to moral habits, says a writer in the "Religious Telescope." Is the father a churchgoer? So are the children. Is the father an attendant in the Sunday School? So are the children. On the other hand, is the father a loafer, a reader of dime novels, a theatre-goer, a smoker, a tobacco-chewer, a drinker, a reader of Sunday newspapers, a scoffer at religion? So are the children—especially the boys. In their case the old, familiar proverb, "As the old cock crows the young one learns," is eminently true. Some one, on hearing the younger Pitt's first speech in Parliament, remarked, "He is a chip out of the old block." "Nay," replied Burke, "he is the old block himself." While it is true that, in some instances, pious fathers have unconverted sons, it is equally true that most of the praverless fathers have praverless children. Why? Because the weight of their father's influence holds them down on the lower moral plane on which the fathers themselves grovel. How is it possible when the father is too deeply interested in the pleasures and sins of the world, in money-getting, horse-racing, gambling and politics, to give any thought to the Bible and any time to family devotion—how, we ask, is it possible for the children to step up into the higher realm of soul culture and upright, religious living?

"Flower-Socials."

The "Flower-Social" is a new and pretty idea, and one which at this season of the year, should be very popular among church societies. The social can be given in the lecture-room or school-room, evenings. Everybody is invited and requested to bring flowers. A large collection of most beautiful flowers is the result. During the social, appropriate hymns or other pieces in which flowers are mentioned, should be played or sung. The next day these flowers can be divided and carried by the workers into the Photographed from Life, specially for this issue.

With every child there are two notable days there: one the day of arrival, the other that of departure. They become so attached to the place that when they are about to leave it, their sorrow finds expression in tears and sobs, which gradually subside as they sail down the beautiful Hudson on the steamer "Chrystenah," on the homeward journey. Their young hearts are full of gratitude for the "good times" they have had and they are not slow to express it in their own simple way.

"Well, dear," said one of the missionaries, to an earnest little lad of nine, who was trying to tell how he had enjoyed the visit. "Since you feel that way, I can tell you how you can do something to show your gratitude. When you get a little bigger and older, if you have a chance to give other little boys a good time, don't forget to do it. Just pass it along."

"Yes'm, I will!" exclaimed the little fellow. And this is the lesson that is implanted in these young breasts, ere the children leave us. Every boy and girl—from the toddler of six to the twelve-year-old—is pledged

CHAPTER V. AMONG THE FLASHES.

ON the night of the day of triumph in Rome, Karmes, as he went back to his own room, paused for a moment at the grated window to listen to the noise of the city. But there were sounds nearer to him that arrested his attention. A man beneath the window was giving instructions to several others. Karmes listened and heard him say: "The third interruption is the signal. Gladiators, remember, to-night in the Forum!"

This was evidently the conclusion of his talk, but it was enough to make known to the guard at least the vocation of the conspirators. Well might it have been if he had known the conspiracy, and told it.

However, of what was about to happen at the close of this eventful day he little thought as the gladiators drew their daggers and took the solemn oath, saying:

"We swear, we swear, to-night in the Forum!"

Again that night Zerola's thoughts turned to a subject which often occupied her thoughts. In her moments of hopelessness, it was of her dear Lord she thought, because in him alone can those who despair of happiness in this life, have hope for happiness beyond the grave. But Zerola was too young to be always in despair even as to this life. In her brighter moments her thoughts turned to her lover and she imagined him seeking her through the world and at last coming to Rome and obtaining her release. She had been mercifully spared the knowledge that it was Thæon whom she had seen the people stoning on that dreadful morning in Jerusalem and she therefore imagined him well in body but distressed in mind by the loss of herself.

Nor was she so mistaken as may be supposed. On the outskirts of that crowd who outside the city gate witnessed the stoning were two members of the despised sect of the Nazarenes, who, as soon as the murderous throng dispersed took up Thæon's body to give it reverent burial. In washing it and preparing it for the tomb, signs of life were perceived. Thæon was not yet dead, though his wounds were severe. Careful attention and loving nursing brought him back to his wonted strength and he really began the search that Zerola imagined him making. It was to Egypt he went first, suspecting that Karmes was concerned in the plot and would naturally send her to his own country. But his search there had ended and on the very night when Zerola lay thinking of him in her dungeon, he was embarking on a voyage to Rome to seek her there.

During these four years Saul had become a Nazarene.

Hearing of Zerola's imprisonment in a way which will be mentioned further on, he earnestly set about the task of finding her. On a count of the record of her sentence having been destroyed by the jailer in Jerusalem, who was intriguing with the commander of the ship which conveyed her to Rome, the task of ascertaining her whereabouts was exceedingly difficult. A plotter, who was no other than Karmes, had succeeded in securing the co-operation of the captain of the galley which was to carry Zerola from Jerusalem.

Paul had searched in Athens, Corinth, and Ephesus, but without success. Now he enlisted the services of Pilate's friend, Corbulo, who was himself seeking the slave, and also the captain who had dared to set aside his will.

It was in the city of the Cæsars, Corbulo had received a letter from his friend. He had been slowly walking along one of the secluded avenues near the Tiber. Little had he thought that the subject of his reflections was then so near as to be listening to the great bell tolling in the Capitol, announcing, in mournful and muffled tones, the death of the Emperor.

The general had proceeded on his way but a short distance when he drew forth the letter, broke it open, and in the characters of the Grecian language read:

"Paul to Corbulo, Most noble friend, Peace;

"If the slave be not found before midnight, write to me at Nazareth. I thank thee for obtaining the permission of the Senate allowing me to visit my home. Have I not sworn? Never shall my pledge be broken. Before the noons of October Paul will come to Rome. E'er to-morrow's sun shall shine upon thy legions, thy swift galley will bear me leagues upon the water.

"But now I go to visit the Egyptian woman that dwells across the Tiber. Still she refuses to become a Nazarene. Friend to the followers of the Christ, forget her not.

She it was who sheltered the holy mother of Him who is now the Saviour of the world, when before the wrath of Herod, Joseph and Mary found refuge in that land where once their race were slaves. O, Roman, remember the Egyptians! But beware! Thou knowest the truth—the woman longs to slay thee. Her love is deeper than the Nile, but her hate is stronger than the pyramids.

"Soon, O Corbulo, I will preach the religion of humanity to the chain-kings of Italy. Once more the proud citizens of the Seven Hills shall hear the despised story of Calvary. Ay, Paul will uphold the Cross of the Nazarene in the very Forum of Rome!

"Rebuke not thy friend.

"Peace to thee, Corbulo. Again, farewell.

"PAUL."

This letter the Roman re-read, then placing it carefully away, proceeded on his way. A group of Senators greeted the General as he emerged into a more crowded street of the city, and together they hurried off to attend the funeral rites at the palace of the Emperor. Magnificent they were; royal and imperial!

Many days were consumed in the performance of these rites of the dead. Under the care of a body of functionaries, called pollinctores, the body was prepared for burial or cremation, according to the wishes of the deceased or his friends, and these preparations were on a scale commensurate with his imperial position. On the eighth day the body was conveyed to the mausoleum on a golden bier amid the sorrowful music and lamentations of a whole nation. In the cortege were thousands upon thousands of the Roman princes and aristocracy. The sons of the deceased went veiled and the women beat their breasts. The capital was plunged in gloom while these ceremonials lasted, and during the period of sorrow after the interment, when the days of mourning were concluded, a funeral feast was spread and the nation then resumed its wonted serenity.

Zerola, at the hour these solemn ceremonies were drawing to a close, was lying on the floor of her prison, her head resting in calm repose against the iron bars across the crack in the wall.

"Whether it is nobler," the girl was thinking, for she was no passionless angel, "to bear the troubles of misfortune, or to strive for freedom? But I will, I will be free! Had I liberty, I might again labor among the poor in Jerusalem—as on that fateful morning. Had I liberty, I might again help my mother in our home at Nazareth. And more, I might again return the fond greeting—why should I be ashamed to say it?—the kiss of my lover, and walk with him by the blue hills and laughing streams of Galilee. Where thou art now, my beloved, I do not know: nor do I suppose that thou can'st tell where is thy Zerola. Yet I feel that supreme happiness, the consciousness that I am loved by the one I love. Still, sometimes I fear that we have been separated forever! But, to-night, as the changeless stars look down upon us, I know that thou art thinking of me. For I love thee: I love thee Thæon, more than —"

Suddenly Zerola was aroused from these reflections. She shrank from the bars in very terror. The girl thought she heard again the dread tones of that voice which she last had heard urging on the mob in Jerusalem.

The voice was drowned a moment in the shouts of the people. Again the Forum was silent.

Had that man of so princely an appearance come also to Rome to persecute? Surely Zerola had suffered enough!

ZEROLA IN PRISON.

The girl creeps closer to the bars. Listens!

The man is addressing the populace. In the tumult she can hear only here and there a phrase or sentence:

"As a greater than I hath said, Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. . . . As an Athenian poet —"

"Quote no Greek in Rome!" shouted one of the crowd, whom the speaker, could he have seen, would at once have recognized as one of the leaders of the gladiators then so numerous in the Capital.

"As one of the poets hath sung," continued the speaker, "we are all his offspring." . . . for God hath made of one blood all nations of men. . . . The common origin of the human race, and the common yearnings of the human heart . . . therefore it is that I preach that kingdom foreseen alike by poets and philosophers, which they both join in predicting and aid in establishing. . . . a kingdom where there is neither Greek nor Jew, Barbarian nor Scythian, bond or free. . . . a kingdom whose one law is love—love to God and our fellow-men."

But Zerola seemed to feel a charm of mellowed strength about the voice of the man now addressing the people in the Forum, which in addition to his theme—the religion Jesus taught by word and deed—caused her to conclude that it could not possibly belong to the leader of the mob who had caused her imprisonment. Still, so glad was she to hear the Gospel of the Nazarene, she again listened eagerly.

The Forum now thronged with a vast crowd, over whom the speaker was gaining that mysterious power of eloquence, as he continued:

"As time sweeps on, the false passes away, and the true climbs upward to the throne. And he that wears its crown rules with more than any monarch's power.

"But against the world's progress the palace and the temple are linked in solemn league. The friends of might, the foes of right are prince and priest—who win life's bread by swinging sceptre and censor. Doves and robes are for them, rags and scorpions for the people.

"But both are doomed to perish. As in the physical world, so in the religious, there is decay and growth. And ever from the grave of buried shrines and the wreck of ruined thrones shines out the light of truth, speaks out with thunder tones the voice of right.

"Night is the pledge of coming day, and in due course its beams illumine the world.

"From out the darkness always gleams the morning sun. The hated and despised of one age are sometimes destined to become the mind-kings of the next. And their very name is worshipped. Thus let it be with the Imperial Nazarene.

"Men and matrons of Rome, look now across the darkening sky of the Campagna! See ye yon cloud, warning of a coming storm? Behold therein is a picture of your destiny—ay, a prophecy of your doom! Already the forests of the North swarm with men sworn to hurl death to the city of the Seven Hills.

"O, Rome, thy sun is setting in never-ending night, and thou art hastening to an eternal grave!"
